"§ 64. Effect of adoption.—Thereafter the parents of the minor are relieved from all parental duties towards, and of all responsibility for, and have no rights over such child, or to his property by descent or succession. . . . The child takes the name of the foster parent. His right of inheritance and succession from his natural parents remain unaffected by such adoption.

"The foster parent or parents and the minor sustain towards each other the legal relation of parent and child, [106] and have all the rights and are subject to all the duties of that relation, including the right of inheritance from each other, . . . and such right of inheritance extends to the heirs and next of kin of the minor, and such heirs and next of kin shall be the same as if he were the legitimate child of the person adopting; . . .

This statute continued the legal relation of parent and child established by the laws of 1873-1887, which imposed upon the foster parent or parents a legal obligation to support, maintain and educate the child, and in return to be entitled to the custody and services of the child as well as the liability on the part of the child to render service and in certain cases to respond to the support of such parent or parents.

Additional provisions were embodied in the Domestic Relations Law not contained in the earlier laws. The natural parents were excluded from any rights over the child or to his property by descent or succession, though the child's right of inheritance and succession from his natural parents was to remain unaffected by such adoption. In view of that provision it is clear that the natural father of the intestate was excluded as a next of kin of the decedent. The law quoted also provided that the parental relations should include the right of inheritance between the adoptive parent or parents and the adopted child, which right of inheritance was to extend to the heirs and next of kin of the minor, and that such heirs and next of kin should be the same as if he (the minor) were the legitimate child of the person adopting him.

It is argued by appellant that the omission of the legislature to provide that the right of inheritance extends to the heirs and next of kin of the adoptive parents is significant, as the right of inheritance possessed by the child and which passes to his next of kin was the right of inheritance from the foster parents. Reading the several laws enacted in this state the conclusion is irresistible [107] that the policy of the legislature has been to extend the artificial relations created by adoption to the relation existing by nature. We do not think that the statute is susceptible of the construction urged by appellant. The death of the foster parent did not re-establish the relation of parent and child between the natural parents and the intestate. The natural parents had surrendered all paternal and maternal ties to the adoptive parent pursuant to the law of the state which defined the legal rights of all of the parties and by which they were severally bound, unless the adoption was abandoned or changed pursuant to law for which ample provision was made. When the legislature provided that the heirs and next of kin of the adopted child shall be the same as if he were the legitimate child of the person adopting, it clearly used the words "legitimate child" in the well-established meaning of the term as a child born in lawful wedlock, and effectively embodied in the law of descent a provision that the adopted child was the heir at law and next of kin of the adoptive parent to the same extent as though the adoptive parent in this case had borne the adopted child, with all that the term "mother" implies.

As was said by Judge Vann, writing for this court, in In re Cook, 187 N. Y. 253-260, 79 N. E. 991: "The legislature has supreme control of the subject and may give heritable blood when nature did not." Had the intestate during his lifetime inherited a substantial property from his foster parent, and subsequently died in possession of the same, his natural parents having been inhibited from a right to inherit from him, the argument of appellant would, if adopted, result in the adopted child dying without heirs and next of kin and the property owned by him derived by inheritance from his foster parent would escheat to the state.

Such construction of the statute would be repugnant to the policy of the law, if any other reasonable interpretation [108] is permissible. When the legislature provided that the heirs at law and next of kin of the adopted child should be the same as if he were the legitimate child of the person adopting, the adopted child, in a legal sense, became the natural child of the adoptive parent. It is not to be presumed that the legislature intended to render well-established principles of law nugatory and to provide additional grounds for escheat, to enable the state to take the property of the intestate where he survived the adoptive parent and still give to him a right of inheritance where the adoptive parent predeceased him. Such construction of intention would be contrary to the rule that in case of failure of descendants capable of taking, the inheritance should go back to the kinsman from whom it came. That rule was founded upon justice and equity, and it cannot be presumed that the legislature intended to create an exception to that rule, where it had surrounded the relation of foster parent and child with all the safeguards, rights and privileges of the relation of parent and child by blood, for the purpose of acquiring by escheat to the people the property of an adopted child in a case like the one at bar.

We have examined the cases cited from other jurisdictions and do not deem it essential to take the time to point out the distinguishing features of the laws of the various states as compared with the statute before us in this state. Numerous cases are also to be found in other states, in addition to those cited, bearing on the subject under consideration. While the question presented here has not been directly considered by this court, several cases have been decided involving principles of law having a direct bearing upon the subject which seem to justify the conclusion reached in this case. Gilliam v. Guaranty Trust Co. 186 N. Y. 127, 78 N. E. 697, 116 Am. St. Rep. 536; In re Cook, 187 N. Y. 253, 79 N. E. 991; Dodin v. Dodin, 16 App. Div. 42, 44 N. Y. S. 800, affirmed 162 N. Y. 635, 57 N. E. 1108; In re MacRae, 189 N. Y. 142-147, 12 Ann. Cas. 505.

We, therefore, conclude that the brothers and sisters of [109] decedent's foster mother are the next of kin of the decedent.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

NOTE.

Right of Inheritance from Adopted Child as between Natural Parents and Adoptive Parents or Their Descendants.

It is the purpose of the present note to discuss only those cases which deal with the right of inheritance from an adopted child where it appears that the property which is to be distributed came to the adopted child from some source other than the adopting parents. The right of succession to an estate inherited from a foster parent by an adopted child is discussed in the notes to Lanferman v. Vanzile, Ann. Cas. 1914D 563, and Russell v. Jordan, reported post, this volume, at page 760. As to the right of the child of an adopted person to inherit from the adoptive parent, see the note to In re Walworth, Ann. Cas. 1914C 1223.

From the cases hereinafter cited, it is apparent that the right of inheritance from an adopted child is entirely dependent on the interpretation of the various statutes affecting the question of adoption and descent in each jurisdiction. However, the proposition may be said to be supported by the weight of authority that unless the statutes specifically confer the right of inheritance on the adopting parents or their descendants, the natural parents of an adopted child or their descendants, will succeed to his estate. White v. Dotter, 73 Ark. 130, 83 S. W. 1052; In re Namaau, 3 Hawaii 484; Edwards v. Yearby, 168 N. C. 663, 85 S. E. 19, L.R.A.1915E 462; Upton v. Noble, 35 Ohio St. 655; Daisey's Estate, 15 W. N. C. (Pa.) 403; Com. v. Powel, 16 W. N. C. (Pa.) 297, 20 Cent. L. J. 343; Hole v. Robbins, 53 Wis. 514, 10 N. W. 617. Thus in the case last cited, it appeared that the intestate, an adopted child, died seized of certain property inherited from his natural father. He was survived by his adoptive parents and brothers and sisters of his natural father. The property was awarded to the brothers and sisters of the natural father, the court saying: "Both by the common law and by the statutes of this state inheritance is confined to the blood of the deceased, the only exception made being in favor of the wife of the deceased. . . . After carefully considering all the provisions of the law regulating the adoption of children, we are of the opinion that there was no intention on the part of the legislature to change the general law upon the subject of inheritance from an adopted child. . . . The adopting parent is of full age, and enters into the engagement with full knowledge of its effect. The child, in most instances, is entirely unable to comprehend the relationship made by the process of adoption, and can give no legal consent to any change of his rights by such adoption. If the adoption is to work a radical change as to the right of inheritance to his estate, it would seem to require an explicit declaration to that effect. The seventh section, above quoted, which undertakes to define what rights of the natural parents of the child adopted shall be taken away by such adoption, fails entirely in taking away the right of inheritance from such child in case he should die without issue or descendants and leaving no widow. It merely declares that the order of adoption shall deprive the natural parents 'of all legal rights whatsoever as to the child, and the child shall be freed from all legal obligations of maintenance and obedience as respects his natural parents.' These words refer solely to the right of the natural parent to the personal control, education and maintenance of the child. The rights of which the natural parents are deprived respect the child itself, and not his property or their right to inherit from him. The statute having expressly declared that the adopted child shall inherit from the adopted parent, and having omitted to declare that the adopted parent shall inherit from the child, we think it must be held, according to the rules of construction, that the general law of inheritance was not intended to be changed in favor of the adopted parent, and that the estate of the adopted child, upon his death without a will, must descend to his kindred of blood as prescribed by section 1, ch. 92, R. S. 1858, as amended. That the word 'parents,' in subdivision 2 of section 1, ch. 92, means natural parents, and not parents by adoption, cannot be doubted. All the other provisions of the section refer to kindred of the blood of the deceased; and the word 'parents,' both by derivation and common understanding, means the natural parents." In Edwards v. Yearby, 168 N. C. 663, 85 S. E. 19, L.R.A.1915E 462, it appeared that the decedent, who died possessed of the property in dispute, had inherited the same from his natural mother. He was the natural son of the plaintiff and the adopted son of the defendant. In passing on the right of inheritance from the adopted child the court said: "Our general statute on descents of real property, founded on and, to a great extent, embodying the principles of the common law, would give this property to the natural father (Revisal, c. 30, rule 6), and this present law of adoption (Revisal, c. 2, § 177) having in express terms conferred the right of inheritance only on the child, it should, by correct interpretation be confined to that, and create no other interference with the general law that the statute itself declares. . . . The question does not seem to have been hitherto presented to this court, and there is some variety of ruling on the subject in other jurisdictions, owing largely to differing phraseology of their statutes; but the view we adopt is supported, we think, by correct principles of interpretation and is in accord with many authoritative decisions elsewhere construing laws which more nearly resemble our own, many of them expressed in terms much more favorable than ours towards the rights of the adopted father." In White v. Dotter, 73 Ark. 130, 83 S. W. 1052, it appeared that the right of inheritance to certain property was litigated between an adoptive mother and the children of the natural father by a second marriage. The property in question had been given to the deceased adopted child by the adoptive mother in accordance with a desire expressed by the adoptive father prior to his death. It further appeared that a special act had been prepared and submitted to the legislature which was intended to change the name of the decedent and constitute her the lawful heir of the plaintiff and her husband. The journals of the legislature recorded the fact that the bill had passed the House and was twice read in the Senate but there was no evidence that it ever became a law. The plaintiff testified that she had made the gift under the impression that the decedent had been legally adopted by her. The court said: "Under the circumstances, the court must treat these parties as if the act had passed, and the exact effect should be given it that was intended by (the foster parents) viz., that the child's name be changed to theirs, they given legal control of her, and she given the right to inherit from them. There was nothing in that act giving (the foster parents) the right to inherit from the adopted child. It may be safely assumed that, in desiring that act passed, neither of these adoptive parents ever contemplated a contingency arising in which they would inherit from this waif, who had come to them almost as flotsam cast up from the river. The law is settled that adoptive parents do not inherit from the adopted child." In Upton v. Noble, 35 Ohio St. 655, the action was brought by an administrator to determine, as between conflicting claimants, the rightful distribution of the assets in his hands. The plaintiff's intestate was the illegitimate child of one of the claimants and the adopted daughter of another of the claimants. The estate to be distributed was derived from her putative father, in settlement of a proceeding in bastardy. The court made a decree in favor of the natural mother on the ground that the statute providing for the adoption of children did not specifically give the adoptive parents the right to inherit from the adopted child and in so far as it changed the general course of descents and distribution of intestate property it should be strictly construed. In Com. v. Powel, 18 W. N. C. (Pa.) 297, 20 Cent. L. J. 343, the court quoted with approval the opinion of the lower court as follows: "The adopted child can inherit equally with children by nature from the adopting parent, because the law expressly so declares; and provides; also, that 'if such adopting parent shall have other children, he, she, or they shall respectively inherit from and through each other, as if all had been lawful children of the same parent.' Yet it has been held that such adopted child cannot take under a devise to the 'children' of the parent by adoption; for it is not a child by nature. . . . Neither can the parent by adoption inherit from the adopted child, for the Act does not so declare; whilst it does in express words confer the inheritable qualities mentioned upon the adopted child. However reasonable it might seem that the adopting parent, who acted the parent's part in cherishing, maintaining, and educating the child during infancy, and conferring upon it by adoption the rights of inheritance, should in turn be capable of inheriting from it, rather than the parent by nature, who surrendered the rights and duties of a parent towards it, this is an argument to be considered only by the law-making power. It is to the law of inheritance laid down by our Intestate Act that we must look for the heir of one who, possessed of personal estate, dies unmarried and intestate, leaving a parent surviving. The law casts the inheritance in such case upon the father and mother, or the survivor of them. (See section 3 of Act of April 8, 1833, P. D. 807, pl. 15.) Construing the words of the act strictly, as we are taught to do in the adjudications referred to as applied to the other Act we have been considering, the terms 'father' and 'mother' can be applied only to the father and mother by nature. The estate of the decedent, therefore, in this case, goes to the surviving father."

Practically the identical questions passed on in the reported case, was considered by the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals in Heidecamp v. Jersey City, etc. St. R. Co. 69 N. J. L. 284, 55 Atl. 239, 101 Am. St. Rep. 707. This is apparently the only decision on all fours with the reported case, and under the New Jersey statutes a contrary decision was reached. It appeared that the suit was brought under the Death act, for the benefit of the next of kin, to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's adopted daughter. The trial court held that the adopting father was not the next of kin, and that the natural mother could recover nominal damages only, and a verdict was rendered accordingly. On appeal the court said: "Our Death act, under which this suit is prosecuted, provides that the action shall be for the exclusive benefit of the widow and the next of kin of such deceased person, and the sum recovered shall be distributed to such widow and next of kin in the proportion provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal property left by persons dying intestate. The next of kin in this act must be held to mean the next of kin by blood, unless the 'Act concerning the adoption of infants' impresses upon the term a different meaning as applicable to this case. Our 'Act concerning adoption' (Gen. Stat. p. 1714, pl. 17) provides 'that, upon the entry of the decree of adoption, the parents of the child, if living, shall be divested of all legal rights and obligations due from them to the child or children or from the child or children to them; and the child or children shall be free from all legal obligations of obedience or otherwise to the parents; and the adopting parent or parents of the child or children shall be invested with every legal right in respect to obedience and maintenance on the part of the child or children as if said child or children had been born to them in lawful wedlock; and the child or children shall be invested with every legal right, privilege, obligation and relation in respect to education, maintenance and the rights of inheritance to real estate or to the distribution in personal estate on the death of such adopting parent or parents as if born to them in lawful wedlock.' The statute expressly invests the adopting parent with every legal right in respect to obedience and maintenance on the part of the child as if the child had been born to them in lawful wedlock, but it wholly fails to bestow upon the adopting parent any right to inherit the estate of the adopted child. That the draftsman of the act did not intend to confer any such property right upon the adopting parent is emphasized by the immediately succeeding provision that the adopted child shall be invested with every legal right, privilege, obligation and relation in respect to education, maintenance and the rights of inheritance to real estate or to the distribution in personal estate on the death of the adopting parents as if born to them in lawful wedlock. The statute further provides that, on the death of the adopting parent and the subsequent death of the adopted child without issue, the property of such adopting deceased parent shall descend to, and be distributed among, the next of kin of said parent and not to the next of kin of the adopted child. The adopting father is therefore excluded from inheriting, as the next of kin of the adopted child, not only by the failure of the statute to invest him with such right, but also by the declaration that, in determining who are the next of kin of the adopted child, regard is not to be paid to the fact of adoption; the next of kin of the adopted child are his next of kin by blood. I have found no authority which will justify a different interpretation of our statutes."

In harmony with the reasoning of the reported case, however, it has been held in South Dakota that it is the purpose of statutes dealing with adoption to extend the artificial relation so created to that relation which exists by nature, thereby giving the adopting parents or their descendants the right of inheritance from an adopted child in preference to the natural parents or their descendants. Calhoun v. Bryant, 28 S. D. 266, 133 N. W. 266. That case involved the right of inheritance from an adopted child. It was conceded, under the facts of the case, that the adopted mother would have been the sole heir, if the intestate had been her natural son instead of an adopted child. The court held her rights to be the same in either case and said: "It is urged that, in the absence of a statute specifically declaring that the parent by adoption shall inherit from the child adopted, there can be no such inheritance by the parent. It may be conceded that the adoptive parent cannot inherit from an adopted child in the absence of a statute conferring the right of inheritance. The exact question in this case is whether the statute of this state, creating and defining the rights and obligations between the adoptive parent and the adopted child, gives the right of inheritance to the adoptive mother. In this case, as in all the cases cited by appellant as authority, the question resolves itself into one of construction of statutory provisions. Title 2 of the Civil Code of this state treats of the relationship between parent and child. Chapter 1 of that title defines the right, duties, and obligations of children by birth, while chapter 2 of the same title provides the method of adoption of children and defines the rights, duties and obligations of parent and child created by the proceeding. Neither chapter contains any specific provision relating to the right of inheritance. But section 136 of chapter 2 provides: 'A child, when adopted, may take the family name of the person adopting. After adoption, the two shall sustain towards each other the legal relation of parent and child, and have all the rights and be subject to all the duties of that relation.' The complete assumption of a new relationship created by adoption is emphasized by the provisions of section 137 of the same chapter, which says: 'The parents of an adopted child are, from the time of adoption relieved of all parental duties towards and of all responsibility for the child so adopted, and have no right over it.' Under the provisions of the two chapters the relationship created between the adoptive parent and the adopted child is in no manner differentiated from the same relationship arising from birth. Chapter 2 expressly declares that: 'After adoption the two shall sustain towards each other the legal relation of parent and child and have all the rights and be subject to all the duties of that relation.' There are no limitations or qualifications as to the relationship created and no limitations as to the rights of each with respect to the other, which under the law grow out of the natural relation. Whatever rights the natural parent and child possess under the laws of this state are conferred and possessed equally by the adoptive parent and the adopted child, and we are unable to conceive of any refinements of reasoning which would warrant a distinction between the rights, duties, and obligations of the natural parent and child, and the rights, duties, and obligations arising between the adoptive parent and the adopted child. It seems clear to us that it was the legislative intent to give the adoptive mother all the rights of the natural mother."

In Foley's Estate, 1 W. N. C. (Pa.) 301, it appeared that the intestate died in the state of Pennsylvania leaving certain real estate. She was survived by an adoptive mother and her natural father. The Massachusetts act under which she was adopted provided as follows: "The parents of the child shall be deprived of all legal rights as respects the child, and the child shall be freed from all obligations of maintenance and obedience as respects the parents." The court said: "Both claimants were domiciled in Massachusetts, both at the time of the adoption and of the death, and the minor must be considered to have had her domicile there also. . . . The fund is therefore distributable, under the laws of Massachusetts, to the mother by adoption, who can claim it in this proceeding."

Statutes — Construction of Adopted Statute.

The construction given a statute by the courts of the state from which it was adopted is strongly persuasive, the presumption being that the construction was also adopted.

Adoption of Children — Inheritance from Adopted Child.

Rev. St. 1908, § 526, provides that after a decree of adoption the person adopted shall be entitled to inherit as if he had been the petitioner's child born in holy wedlock. Section 529 declares that the adopted child shall be to all intents and purposes the child and legal heir of the person adopting him, while section 7042 also declares that adopted children shall be legalized and entitled to inherit as legitimate children. Held, that an adopted child and his adopters do not, except in so far as provided by statute, assume the relation of parent and child, and where, after the death of the adopters, the adopted child died leaving no issue, his relatives by blood take in preference to the children of the adopting parents.

Error to Rio Grande County Court: WHITE, Judge.

Action to determine heirship. Alexander Russell et al., plaintiffs, and Catherine Jordan et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs bring error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Palmer & True, Jesse C. Wiley and Albert L. Moses for plaintiffs in error.

A. L. Jeffery and Edwin H. Stinemeyer for defendants in error.

[445] SCOTT, J.:—This is a case to determine heirship. Nathan Russell by his first wife had three children, who are the defendants [446] in error. Subsequent to the death of this wife he was again married to a widow with a minor child, named John Albers. By this marriage Russell had three children, who are the plaintiffs in error here. The second wife died and thereafter Russell, in the manner provided by law, adopted her child, John Albers, who took the name of John Albers Russell. Russell married a third time and afterwards died without issue from the third marriage. The estate of Russell, aside from the widow's share, was divided equally between all his children, including the adopted son. Later, John Albers Russell, the adopted son, died intestate, unmarried and without issue.

This proceeding is upon error to the county court ordering an equal division of the estate of John Albers Russell between the six children of Nathan Russell.

It is the contention of plaintiffs in error, that being related by blood, they alone are entitled to participate in the distribution of the estate of John Albers Russell.

It is said that by the common law inheritable interest follows the blood. That adoption was unknown to the common law, and comes from the civil law. That it rests upon statutes entirely, and while these statutes do in a degree modify and change the common law rule of descent and distribution, this change goes no further than the provision of the statute. That the property of John Albers Russell descends, as would the property of any other decedent, to the next of kin, except as our statutes change the line of descent because of his adoption by Nathan Russell. This must be conceded to be a fair statement of the law upon this subject: Webb v. Jackson, 6 Colo. App. 211, 40 Pac. 467.

It is agreed by counsel that the question here to be determined has not been considered, nor have our adoption statutes been constructed in that respect by the appellate [447] courts of this state. Our statutes upon this subject for consideration here are, Revised Statutes 1908, as follows:

Sec. 526. "A decree of adoption shall be rendered and entered by the court declaring such person the heir at law of the petitioner or petitioners and entitled to inherit from the petitioner or petitioners any or all property in all respects as if it had been petitioners' child born in holy wedlock."

Sec. 529. "The natural parents shall, by such order, be divested of all legal rights and obligations in respect to the child, and the child be free from all legal obligations of obedience and maintenance in respect to them; such child shall be to all intents and purposes the child and legal heir of the person so adopting him or her, entitled to all the rights and privileges and subject to all the obligations of a child begotten in lawful wedlock; but upon the decease of such person and the subsequent decease of such adopted child without issue, the property of such adopting parent shall descend to his or her next of kin, and not to the next of kin of such adopted child."

Sec. 7042. "Legally adopted children shall be to all intents and purposes, children and legal heirs of the person so adopting them, entitled to inherit as fully as children of the foster parents begotten in lawful wedlock, and in case any such adopted child shall die, leaving no husband, wife or children, then the foster parents shall inherit as though such adopted child had been a child of such foster parents born in lawful wedlock."

Sec. 526 was enacted in 1885, and appears to have been adopted bodily from the Ohio statutes. The statute was constructed by the supreme court of Ohio before it was enacted by our legislature. It has been held by this court that prior construction under such circumstances is at least strongly persuasive upon the courts of this state, [448] for the reason that the presumption is that the law was enacted in the light of the construction given it by the courts of the state from which the statute was taken.

The supreme court of Ohio in an opinion rendered in 1880, in the case of Upson v. Noble, 35 Ohio St. 655, in construing the statute that now constitutes our Section 529, Rev. Stat. 1908, said:

"This statute, in so far as it changes the general course of descents and distribution of intestate property, and ignores all merit on account of blood, should be strictly construed. And while we find in it a clear declaration that the adopted child shall be the 'legal heir' of its adopting parents, there is no express provision that it shall be capable of inheriting from any other person, or of transmitting an inheritance to any one. It is true that it is declared to be the 'child,' to all legal intents and purposes, of the adopters, as if begotten in lawful wedlock; but if the relation thereby created was intended to bring the parties to it within the operation of the general statute regulating descents and distribution of estates, the additional words, 'and legal heir of his or her adopted or adopters,' would have been entirely superfluous. Now, as we cannot assume that these additional words were not intended to have an operation, which the statute without them would not have, their use suggests that the word 'child' was not used in the sense of 'heir' within the meaning of the general statute relating to descents and distribution. And when we consider the context the truth of the suggestion is made quite palpable. It is declared that by such order the natural parents shall be divested of all legal rights and obligations in respect to such child, and the child shall be free from all legal obligations of obedience and maintenance in respect to them, and shall be, to all intents and purposes, the child . . . of his or her adopter, [449] thus showing that the legislature was dealing with personal rights and duties growing out of the relation of parent and child, by transferring them from the natural to the adopted relation."

The doctrine of this case was later affirmed by the same court in the case of Phillips v. McConica, 59 Ohio St. 1, 51 N. E. 445, 69 Am. St. Rep. 753, and wherein further reasons were advanced in support of it. The court said:

"True, section 3140, Rev. Stat. provides that such adopted child 'shall be to all intents and purposes the child and legal heir of the person so adopting him or her, entitled to all the rights and privileges, and subject to all the obligations, of a child of such person, begotten in lawful wedlock.' But this is far from providing that such adopted child shall be the issue of the adopter, and of his blood and of the blood of his ancestors. It was well said in Upson v. Noble, 35 Ohio St. 658, that in passing the adopting statute 'the legislature was dealing with personal rights and duties growing out of the relation of parent and child, by transferring them from the natural to the adopted relation.' The statute enables the adopted child to inherit from its adopter, but not through him. The statute does not make the adopted child the heir of the ancestors of its adopter, and the right of the adopted child to inherit cannot be extended beyond where the statute has fixed it. The statute in this regard must be strictly construed, as held in 35 Ohio St. 658. Adoption does not change the law of descent and distribution as to the property of the ancestors of the adopter. Quigley v. Mitchell, 41 Ohio St. 375. The ancestors of the adopter are presumed to know their relatives by blood, and to have them in mind in the distribution of their estates, either by will or descent, but they cannot be expected to keep informed as to adoption proceedings in the probate courts of the counties of this state; and to [450] allow an adopted child to inherit from the ancestors of the adopter would often put property into the hands of unheard of adopted children, contrary to the wishes and expectations of such ancestors."

It will be seen that the conclusion reached in these cases, the relation created by adoption is regarded as personal between the adopting parent and adopted child. That while the statute makes the adopted child an heir of the adopting parent, and provides that if the adopted child shall die without marriage or issue, his estate shall go to the adopting parent, the provision does not apply to the heirs of the adopting parent, and in such case the general law of descent applies.

The doctrine of the Ohio cases is supported by the following among other authorities:—Helms v. Elliott, 89 Tenn. 446, 14 S. W. 930, 10 L.R.A. 535; Hockaday v. Lynn, 200 Mo. 456, 9 Ann. Cas. 775, 98 S. W. 585; 118 Am. St. Rep. 672, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 117; Boaz v. Swinney, 79 Can. 332, 99 Pac. 621; Hole v. Robbins, 53 Wis. 514, 10 N. W. 617; Van Derlyn v. Mack, 137 Mich. 146, 100 N. W. 278, 66 L.R.A. 437, 109 Am. St. Rep. 660, 4 Ann. Cas. 879.

But the statutes of the several states are widely different in the matter of adoption of children and there is likewise striking want of uniformity of opinion concerning similar statutes.

The following cases among others, take a contrary view from that adopted in the above cited cases.—Humphries v. Davis, 100 Ind. 274, 50 Am. Rep. 788; Hilpire v. Claude, 109 Ia. 159, 80 N. W. 332, 46 L.R.A. 171, 77 Am. St. Rep. 524; Flannigan v. Howard, 200 Ill. 396, 65 N. E. 782, 59 L.R.A. 664, 93 Am. St. Rep. 201; Calhoun v. Bryant, 28 S. D. 266, 133 N. W. 266; Swick v. Coleman, 218 Ill. 33, 75 N. E. 807.

For the reasons above stated, and because of the seeming weight of authority in support thereof, we have adopted the reasoning of the Ohio authorities.

[451] The judgment is reversed. Former opinion withdrawn.

NOTE.

Succession to Estate Inherited from Foster Parent by Adopted Child Who Dies without Issue.

The earlier cases discussing the right of succession to an estate inherited from a foster parent by an adopted child who dies without issue are collected in the note to Lanferman v. Vanzile, Ann. Cas. 1914D 363. The present note reviews the few recent cases on this point. The right of inheritance from an adopted child as between natural parents and adoptive parents or their descendants, where the estate is derived from some source other than the adoptive parents, is discussed in the note to Carpenter v. Buffalo General Electric Co., reported ante, this volume, at page 754. As to the right of the child of an adopted person to inherit from the adoptive parent, see the note to In re Walworth, Ann. Cas. 1914C 1223.

The decision in the reported case construes, apparently for the first time, the statute of Colorado with reference to the succession to the estate of an adopted child. It is in harmony with the cases holding that in so far as such statutes modify the common-law rule of descent and distribution the change goes no further than the express provision of the statute, and holds that a provision that if an adopted child shall die without marriage or issue, his estate shall go to the adopting parent, does not apply to the heirs of the adopting parent, and that the brothers and sisters by blood of the adopted child are entitled to participate in the distribution of his estate to the exclusion of the children of the adopting parent though the estate was derived from the parent. Likewise in Fisher v. Browning, 107 Miss. 729, 66 So. 132, it was held that the brothers and sisters of an adopted child inherited her estate to the exclusion of her adoptive mother. The court said: "We cannot subscribe to the doctrine that an adoptive parent inherits from an adopted child to the exclusion of its blood relatives. We think that the property inherited by an adopted child goes to the child in fee simple, and upon its death the property descends according to the law of descent and distribution of this state, which would be to its blood relatives. . . . The law on adoption of children is in derogation of the common law, and unless the statute of the state provides for descent and distribution from an adopted child to go to the adoptive relatives in preference to the natural relatives, we are of the opinion that the natural relatives or blood kin inherit in preference to the adoptive kin."

However, in Warner v. King, 267 Ill. 82, 107 N. E. 837, the court construed a statute relating to the succession of an estate of an adopted child providing as follows: "The parents by adoption and their heirs shall take by descent, from any child adopted under this or any other law of this state for the adoption of children, and the descendants, and husband or wife, of such child, only such property as he has taken or may hereafter take from or through the adopting parents, or either of them, either by gift, bequest, devise or descent, with the accumulations, income and profits thereof; and all laws of descent and rules of inheritance shall apply to and govern the descent of any such property, the same as if the child were the natural child of such parents; but the parents by adoption and their heirs shall not inherit any property which such child may take or have taken, by gift, bequest, devise or descent, from his kindred by blood." It was held that the foster mother inherited the estate of the decedent to the exclusion of her natural parents. The principal point discussed, however, was whether the intestate could be considered an adopted child under the statutes of Illinois.

SMITH

SMITH ET AL.

South Carolina Supreme Court—April 23, 1914.

97 S. Car. 242; 81 S. E. 499.

Judicial Sales — Rights of Purchaser — Time to Examine Title.

A master in chancery in selling land under a decree only allowed the purchaser three hours in which to comply with the terms of sale, and, upon noncompliance within that time, resold the property. Held, that the purchaser was not allowed a reasonable time to examine the title, and hence the resale was a nullity.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court, Walterboro: DEVORE, Judge.

Action to sell lands to pay debts. Perry G. Smith, administrator, plaintiff, and Owens H. Smith et al., defendants. From judgment rendered, defendant Sophia A. Stack appeals. REVERSED.

[242] The facts are thus stated in the decree of his Honor, the Circuit Judge:

"This was an action by Perry G. Smith, administrator of Ann E. Murrell, and in his own right, against the defendants, as her heirs at law; the object being, among other things, to obtain the sale of certain real estate owned by the intestate for the payment of her debts, and for the partition and distribution of the proceeds of sale among the parties, according to their respective rights. The cause was heard originally before presiding Judge T. S. Sease, and his decree was filed on February 3, 1912. This decree, among other things, contained this provision: That the two tracts or parcels of [243] land, situated and located in the county of Orangeburg, be sold by C. G. Henderson, Esq., master, on sales day in March, 1912, or some convenient sales day thereafter, to be named by plaintiff's attorneys, at the courthouse at Orangeburg, S. C., at the usual hour for making public sales, for one-half cash, balance on a credit of one year, and be secured by bond and mortgage of premises sold, with interest from date of sales. That in the event of the failure of the purchaser or purchasers to comply with the terms of sale, that the said master do resell the same on the said sales day, or some convenient sales day, to be named by plaintiff's attorneys, until compliance be had.

"Soon after the filing of the decree, these lands were duly advertised for sale on sales day in March by the master for Colleton county. Within the time allowed by law, notice of intention to appeal on the part of the part of the defendants, Stacks, was served upon the plaintiff's attorneys. No further step was taken until the latter part of February. At that time, but on what particular day does not appear, the attorneys for the Stack defendants, who had given notice of their intention to appeal to the Supreme Court, gave the plaintiff's attorneys notice that on March 2d, they would move before Judge Robert E. Copes, at Orangeburg, S. C., for an order fixing the amount of the undertaking to be given by the appellants in order to stay the sale.

"Judge Copes made an order fixing the amount of the undertaking at $1,000, and providing that the same should be approved by the clerk of Court in order to stay the sale of the real estate aforesaid, as provided by statutes in such case made and provided. On Monday morning, March 4th, the day on which the sale was to be had at Orangeburg, the appellant's attorneys handed to the clerk of the Court for Colleton county the undertaking; such undertaking being in the sum of $1,000, made payable to the clerk of Court for Colleton county, and approved by the clerk of Court for Orangeburg county, and dated on February 29, 1912.

with the decree of Judge Sease. Before the bidding commenced, he made public announcement that, 'under the terms of the decree, I should require compliance with the terms of sale within three hours, and that I would be at the office of Glaze & Herbert, where compliance could be made, and, if compliance was not had at that time, the property would again be offered for sale on the same day, at the risk of the former purchaser, as provided in the decree.' The property was then offered for sale, and was bid in by A. J. Hydrick, Jr., Esq., an attorney, for Sophia A. Stack, the wife of D. D. Stack, one of the defendants, for the sum of $6,000. The purchaser did not comply with the terms of the sale within the time stipulated by the master, and made no offer to comply, and at the expiration of the time specified by the master he again offered the property for sale, and the same was bid off by W. B. Gruber, Esq., one of the plaintiff's attorneys, for the sum of $1,200. Mr. Gruber subsequently assigned his bid to J. G. Padgett, Esq., and Mr. Padgett complied with the terms of the sale, and the master executed title to him. From the proofs submitted to me on the hearing, I am satisfied, as a matter of fact, that Mr. Hydrick's bid for Sophia A. Stack was at the request of the attorneys for the Stacks, and that that bid is not entitled to be treated as a bona fide offer for the property. . . ."

His Honor, the Circuit Judge, concluded his decree by ordering that the master's report of sale be confirmed.

Mr. A. J. Hydrick, Jr., made the following affidavit, which shows what took place when the property was sold: "Personally appeared before me A. J. Hydrick, Jr., who, being duly sworn, says that he is and was at the times hereinafter mentioned a practicing attorney at the Orangeburg bar, in the county of Orangeburg, in said State. The deponent was present when C. G. Henderson, master of Colleton county, offered for sale certain real estate in the above entitled, [245] cause in front of the courthouse at Orangeburg, S. C., at about 12 o'clock m., on sales day in March of 1912, and that at said sale he became a purchaser of said property as attorney for Mrs. Sophia A. Stack; that, immediately prior to the time when the said master offered the said property, certain notices protesting and objecting to the sale were offered and made known to the bidders, and to Messrs. Brantley and Zeigler and W. C. Wolfe, attorneys for certain of the parties in said cause; that these notices were read either by M. E. Zeigler, Esq., Thos. F. Brantley, Esq., or W. C. Wolfe, Esq., or by two of them. Deponent does not remember and cannot say positively which one or two of these gentlemen actually read the notices, but remembers that certain protests were read. . . . Deponent further remembers that the master demanded of him an immediate compliance on the part of his client, whereupon deponent stated that he could not advise his client to comply until he had an opportunity to examine the title to the said property, whereupon the master announced, if the bids were not complied with by 2 o'clock p. m. of that day, that he would resell the property; that deponent did not attend a resale of the property at 2 o'clock p. m., nor was he among the bidders at that time, nor did he make any bid or bids thereon. (Signed) A. J. Hydrick, Jr."

There are other affidavits substantially to the same effect.

A. J. Hydrick, Jr., Robert E. Copea, W. B. Martin, Brantley & Zeigler and Wolfe & Berry for appellant.

Howell & Gruber for respondent.

[246] GARY, C. J. (after stating the facts).

—The practical question is whether there was error in the resale of the property after it was bid by Mr. A. J. Hydrick, Jr., as attorney for Mrs. Sophia A. Stack.

In Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. v. McLucas, 87 S. C. 350, 69 S. E. 670, the Court says: "The principle is well settled in this State that a purchaser of land, under a decree rendered by the Court, in the exercise of its chancery jurisdiction, is entitled to a reasonable time, after bidding off the property, to ascertain whether the title is definite"—citing the case of Mitchell v. Pinckney, 13 S. C. 212. To the same effect is the case of Fuller v. Missroon, 35 S. C. 314, 14 S. E. 714, in which the Court announced the principle that a purchaser at a sale for partition is entitled to have the title examined, and a report made thereon by the master.

—The facts unquestionably show that Sophia A. Stack was not allowed a reasonable time within which to examine the title, and the authorities just cited sustain the proposition that the resale of the property by the master was a nullity.

It is the judgment of this Court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that Sophia A. Stack, appellant, be allowed 20 days after the remittitur is sent down within which to comply with the terms of the sale under which property was sold; that, if she fails to comply with the terms of sale within that time, then the property shall be resold upon the terms mentioned in the decree.

Fraser, J., concurs in the result.

(Ire.) 189; Dunscomb v. Holst, 13 Fed. 11; Beavers v. Nelson, 152 Ky. 319, 153 S. W. 428. Thus in Buell v. Kanawha Lumber Corp. supra, an order forfeiting a deposit made in connection with a bid was set aside. The court said: "It is quite apparent that there were defects in some of the titles to the lands sold, and as the purchaser had been given reasonable time to investigate said titles, and as the practice under the procedure in the district of South Carolina recognizes the right of a purchaser to show defects in title, and, if shown, to be excused from complying with the purchase, we think the appellant should not have been decreed to comply with its bid." And in Mitchell v. Pinckney, 13 S. C. 203, the court said tersely: "Reasonable time is always given for the examination of titles, and, if necessary, a reference will be ordered." So in People's Bank v. Bramlett, 58 S. C. 477, 36 S. E. 912, 79 Am. St. Rep. 855, the court said: "The general doctrine is, that one who agrees to purchase land will be allowed a reasonable opportunity to investigate the title, and if he finds that the title falls as to a portion, or there is a defect in the title, he will be allowed to rescind the trade or an abatement from the purchase price." See to the same effect Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. v. McLucas, 87 S. C. 350, 69 S. E. 670.

In substantial accord with the foregoing cases is Beavers v. Nelson, 152 Ky. 319, 153 S. W. 428, wherein, while it was not held explicitly that a purchaser should have a reasonable time for examining a title, the court said: "Purchasers at judicial sales are not required to examine the title to the property before they bid. Were this the rule many persons would be deterred from bidding." And in Dunscomb v. Holst, 13 Fed. 11, it appeared that the purchaser of land at a marshal's sale declined to complete the purchase under the advice of counsel, who examined the title to the land for him. Holding that the purchaser should be relieved from complying with his bid the court said: "Under such circumstances a purchaser has a right to require a good title, and will not be compelled to complete his purchase if such title cannot be given. The usual course in such cases is to direct a reference, as has been done here, and if it appears that the title is not good, and cannot be made perfect by deeds from the parties in the suit before the court, to relieve the purchaser from his bid and order a resale of the property."

In Fuller v. Missroon, 35 S. C. 314, 14 S. E. 714, the court upheld a sale made by the agent of a master wherein it appeared among other facts that two weeks had been allowed to the purchaser for the examination of the title.

DOLLIVER

v.

GRANITE STATE FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Maine Supreme Judicial Court—December 10, 1913.

111 Me. 275; 89 Atl. S.

Fire Insurance — Forfeiture for Vacancy — Effect of Subsequent Occupancy.

Fire insurance policies in the Maine standard form, expiring in December, 1913, and December, 1914, provided that they should be void if the premises should become vacant and so remain for more than 30 days without the previous assent of the insurer in writing. The premises were vacant without such assent from January 31, to June, 1912, after which they were occupied until July 28, 1912, when the loss occurred. Rev. St. c. 1, § 6, par. 1, provides that words and phrases shall be construed according to the common meaning of the language. Held, that the word "void" meant null, of no effect, and that the force of the provision did not depend upon an increase of risk, but that the vacancy worked a forfeiture and not merely a suspension of risk, so that the subsequent occupancy did not revive the policy.

[See note at end of this case.]

Waiver of Forfeiture.

An insurer may waive a breach of a provision for forfeiture in case of vacancy without its assent.

On report from Supreme Judicial Court, Hancock county.

Action on fire insurance policies. Clifton E. Dolliver, plaintiff, and Granite State Fire Insurance Company, defendant. Case reported to Law Court. The facts are stated in the opinion. JUDGMENT for defendant.

Edward S. Clark for plaintiff.

John E. Nelson for defendant.

[276] CORNISH, J.—Several questions are raised in defense to this action on two fire insurance policies, but it is necessary for this court to consider only one, namely, the legal effect of the breach of contract as to occupancy.

The policies were dated respectively December 8, 1909, and December 13, 1911, were issued for a term of three years, and covered farm buildings in the town of Trenton. When the first policy was issued the plaintiff was living with his family upon the premises and making his home there. In June, 1910, he moved with his family to Bar Harbor and has since resided in that town but he claims to have kept workmen as tenants in the insured premises until [277] about January 1, 1912, and we think the evidence fairly supports this contention. The buildings therefore were occupied when the policies were issued.

On January 1, 1912, the premises being then unoccupied, the plaintiff secured thirty-day vacancy permits from the defendant's agent, which expired January 31, 1912. But the premises remained unoccupied until June 18, 1912, when other workmen for the plaintiff entered into possession and continued to occupy the buildings until July 28, 1912, when the fire occurred.

The policies were of the Maine Standard form adopted by the Legislature in 1895, and each contained the usual provision: "this policy shall be void . . . if the premises hereby insured shall become vacant by the removal of the owner or occupant, and so remain vacant for more than thirty days without such assent," such assent having been previously defined as "in writing or in print of the Company." It being conceded that the written assent to vacancy issued on January 1, 1912, expired on January 31, 1912, and that no other permit was given, it follows that by their own terms the policies were rendered void, because of the subsequent vacancy extending to June 18, 1912, unless as claimed by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, the re-occupation begun on June 18, and continued till the time of the fire, of itself, revived the contract and restored the plaintiff to his former rights. Did it have that legal effect?

This is a question raised sharply for the first time in this State and because of its consequences is deserving of the most careful consideration. Especially is this true because the decisions in other jurisdictions are not in harmony.

The policy contains eleven distinct conditions, the violation of any one of which, renders it void. One of these, false representation in the application, relates to matters antedating the policy; nine others, viz.: other insurance, removal, increase of risk, sale, vacancy for more than thirty days, manufacturing establishments running later than nine o'clock P. M., or ceasing operations more than thirty days; keeping of gunpowder or other like articles contrary to law; keeping of camphene, benzine, naphtha or other chemical oils, all relate to matters while the policy is in force; while the eleventh, fraud, relates to acts either before or after the loss.

[278] An examination of the authorities reveals the fact that in some states the courts have held that the breach of these conditions does not render the policy void but merely suspends its operation, and when the breach ceases, the policy again attaches. They make it a case of suspended animation rather than of death. But it would seem that in order to do this they ignore the plain words of the contract and seek to reach a conclusion which under the circumstances might seem fairer to the assured, working out what they conceive to be "substantial justice."

The reasons given for these decisions do not commend themselves to our judgment. In some cases the later decisions are based upon earlier ones arising under a different form of policy where the temporary suspension was expressly provided for, but the distinction is not noted, or if noted, the earlier is followed, notwithstanding the changed contract.

For instance, three early cases are often cited as authority for the doctrine of revivification, viz.: Lounsbury v. Protective Ins. Co. 8 Conn. 459, 21 Am. Dec. 686 (1831); Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 9, 81 Am. Dec. 521 (1862), and U. S. Fire, etc. Ins. Co. v. Kimberly, 34 Md. 224, 6 Am. Rep. 325 (1870) but in each of them the policy provided, not that it should be void in case the property were used contrary to the conditions specified, but that "so long as the same shall be so appropriated, applied or used, these presents shall cease and be of no effect." It is obvious that under that plain language the policy was suspended by its own terms, but when that language was abandoned and it was provided that the policy should be "void," it is difficult to see how these early decisions form any precedent in favor of the doctrine of suspension. In fact they are authorities against it. Yet these decisions among others are cited as authorities in Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. Toney, 1 Ga. App. 492, 57 S. E. 1013 (1907), one of the more recent cases that adopts the theory of suspension and revivification.

Along the same line are the decisions in Illinois. The earliest case on this subject in that state, and the one often cited by that court as the leading case, is New England Fire, etc. Ins. Co. v. Wetmore, 32 Ill. 221 (1863).

[279] But the policy in that case provided, as in the other early cases before referred to, that if the premises should be appropriated to any prohibited use then "so long as the same shall be so appropriated, applied, or used, these presents shall cease and be of no force or effect," and the court say: "The import of this language it seems to us, is most clear, not that this policy should be absolutely void to all intents and purposes, if the premises are misappropriated, but only while they are so improperly used, the insurance shall have no effect." With this construction we can have no quarrel because plain words are given their plain meaning.

But following this the Illinois court has extended the doctrine even to cases where the policy contains the word "void," as in Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Klewer, 129 Ill. 599, 22 N. E. 489 (1889), and Traders' Ins. Co. v. Catlin, 163 Ill. 256, 45 N. E. 255, 35 L.R.A. 595 (1896).

In Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Klewer, supra, the court went so far as to hold that while the policy provided that it should be void in case of other insurance existing at the time the policy was taken out, the legal effect was, not to avoid the second policy, the one in suit, but to suspend it until the expiration of the prior policy and then it would come into full force.

Our court has squarely rejected such a doctrine in a case arising under the same clause, and presenting the same point; Bigelow v. Granite Ins. Co. 94 Me. 39, 46 Atl. 808. The opinion concludes: "By the express terms of the policy in suit, the defendant company is absolved from all liability thereunder." To the same effect are Jersey City Ins. Co. v. Nichol, 35 N. J. Eq. 291, 40 Am. St. Rep. 625; Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Rosenfeld, 95 Fed. 358, 37 C. C. A. 96, and Carleton v. Patrons' Androscoggin Mut. F. Ins. Co. 109 Me. 79, 82 Atl. 649, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 951.

In Traders' Ins. Co. v. Catlin, supra, the question arose over changes in the property that increased the hazard, and the court held that if the changed conditions had ceased to exist before the fire, leaving the risk no more hazardous than before, the policy again became in force. The court say: "If a loss occurs during the increased hazard, it would defeat a recovery. If a former increase of hazard has ceased to exist; and that increase of hazard at that former time in no way has affected the risk when the loss occurs, no reason exists why a forfeiture should result from a cause which occasions no damage."

This clearly shows the reasoning of the Illinois court. It is based upon increase of risk at the time of the fire and whether or not the [280] specific conditions have in the meantime been broken they hold to be of no consequence providing the situation has been restored. They applied the same rule by way of dictum in case of vacancy in Insurance Co of North America v. Garland, 108 Ill. 220, and it is the rule of the early case of New England Fire, etc. Ins. Co. v. Wetmore, supra, applied to an entirely different policy.

This same idea of construing the policy, not according to its own plain terms but according to an arbitrary and unauthorized standard of increase of risk at the time of the loss, forms the basis of many of the decisions which hold to the doctrine of intermittent liability.

In Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. Toney (Ga.), supra, after citing the early decisions before referred to and others including decisions from Illinois, the court say: "We place our decision squarely on the proposition that the violation of the condition as to vacancy in this case in no wise contributed to the loss. The increased hazard existed while the house was vacant, but when the house was reoccupied the danger from vacancy terminated, and the policy again attached and became of binding effect, and the company was liable for the loss." The same reason is given in Born v. Home Ins. Co. 110 Ia. 379, 81 N. W. 676, 80 Am. St. Rep. 300 (1900), when construing the clause against incumbency, and in North America Insurance Co. v. Pitts, 88 Miss. 587, 9 Ann. Cas. 54, 41 So. 5, 117 Am. St. Rep. 756, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 627 (1906), when construing the clause as to vacancy.

Here again our own court has taken the directly opposite view and has rejected the doctrine that the effect of vacancy, under the present form of policy depends upon the increase of risk.

Prior to the enactment of the standard policy in this State in 1895, there was a general statutory provision (passed in 1861) of this tenor: "A change in the property insured or in its use or occupation, or breach of any of the terms of the policy by the insured, do not affect the policy unless they materially increase the risk." R. S. 1883, ch. 49, sec. 20.

And under this statute it was held that the breach of the condition as to vacancy did not in the absence of fraud, affect the contract of insurance unless the risk was thereby materially increased. Cannell v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 59 Me. 582; Thayer v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 70 Me. 531. It is evident that in such cases reoccupancy would keep the policy valid.

But the enactment of the Standard form of policy repealed the general statute of 1861, supra, so that the question of increase of [281] risk no longer affects the condition as to vacancy, Knowlton v. Patrons' Androscoggin F. Ins. Co. 100 Me. 481; 62 Atl. 289, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 517. The court made use of this emphatic language which is significant in the case at bar:

"In the light of experience it was practicable to specify ten conditions or changes in the situation of the property, each of which would render the policy void without opening to actual inquiry the question of the increase of the risk. The language of the standard policy is not to be construed to mean that an issue of fact is to be raised upon the question of increase of risk under each of the independent clauses in question. It would not be reasonable to suppose that the legislature contemplated a judicial inquiry under the clause relating to the keeping of gun-powder, or naphtha, or under the clause respecting other insurance on the property, or the clause in regard to the sale of the property and the assignment of the policy without the assent of the company as there specified. With no greater or better reason can it be claimed that the question of increase of risk is open under the clause rendering the policy void for vacancy or non-occupancy. It is an independent and absolute stipulation that the policy shall be void if the premises become vacant, and remain so for more than thirty days as there specified. It is not qualified by any other clause in the policy."

It is unnecessary to further analyze or comment upon the decisions holding that the violation of the plain terms of the contract as to vacancy creates only a suspension of liability. Such a construction would seem to be a perversion of the clear and explicit terms of the contract, a creation rather than an interpretation.

In our opinion no better statement can be made of their lack of convincing power than that by Ostrander on Insurance, 2d ed. sec. 145, viz.: "Regarding the purpose of this provision to be the protection of the insurer from such changes in the circumstances of the risk as would increase the hazard of fire, the courts have sometimes held that although the building becomes vacant and unoccupied during the term of the policy, if it was actually occupied when the fire occurred, the insurer would be held. These decisions appear to be based on the principle, which is not exactly cardinal in the law, that 'substantial justice' need be secured at all hazards. It must be admitted that if no harm comes to the risk during the period of its abandonment and if it is in the care of an occupant at the time [282] of the loss, no important interest of the insurer is prejudiced on account of the temporary vacancy, and in such case there is an apparent hardship to the honest claimant, if the insurer is excused from paying the loss. But may the courts properly interfere to prevent the execution of a contract, which the parties were competent to make and did make in the exercise of their natural and constitutional rights? The policy plainly enough provides that on the happening of a certain event it shall be void. The event occurred and the obligation of the Insurance Co. then terminated. Unless the court has the power to create for the parties a different contract than the one they created for themselves, it can do nothing to relieve the situation; and when the courts undertake to correct mistakes of persons by taking away their right to make contracts, the well meant effort, in the long run is likely to produce more evil than good."

Let us now turn to the line of authorities holding that the contract should be interpreted as meaning what its language clearly expresses, that a violation of its conditions works a forfeiture and not merely a temporary suspension. The Supreme Court of the United States in Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Cook County, 151 U. S. 452, 14 S. Ct. 379, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 231, had under consideration a clause rendering the policy void if "mechanics are employed in building, altering or repairing the premises," and in an exhaustive opinion held that the violation of this condition relieved the insurer from responsibility although the fire did not occur in consequence of the alterations or repairs. The reasons are stated as follows: "Contracts of insurance are contracts of indemnity upon the terms and conditions specified in the policy or policies, embodying the agreement of the parties. For a comparatively small consideration the insurer undertakes to guarantee the insurer against loss or damage, upon the terms and conditions agreed upon, and upon no other, and when called upon to pay, in case of loss, the insurer, therefore, may justly insist upon the fulfillment of these terms. If the insured cannot bring himself within the conditions of the policy, he is not entitled to recover for the loss. The terms of the policy constitute the measure of the insurer's liability, and in order to recover, the assured must show himself within those terms; and if it appears that the contract has been terminated by the violation on the part of the [283] assured, of its conditions, then there can be no right of recovery. The compliance of the assured with the terms of the contract is a condition precedent to the right of recovery. If the assured has violated, or failed to perform the conditions of the contract, and such violation or want of performance has not been waived by the insurer, then the assured cannot recover. It is immaterial to consider the reasons for the conditions or provisions on which the contract is made to terminate, or any other provision of the policy which has been accepted and agreed upon. It is enough that the parties have made certain terms conditions on which their contract shall continue or terminate. The courts may not make a contract for the parties. Their function and duty consist simply in enforcing and carrying out the one actually made."

In Mead v. Northwestern Ins. Co. 7 N. Y. 530, the same doctrine was held applicable to the prohibited use of camphene, which had ceased before the fire, and upon the point of revival the court say: "The only question in my mind is, whether the use of the prohibited article at one period of the time for which the policy should by its terms continue, will avoid the policy in a case where the loss occurred at a time subsequent to such use. For the purposes of this question, it should be treated the same as if the use of the camphene had been permanently discontinued before the occurrence of the fire which destroy the property. A warranty in a contract of insurance is in the nature of a condition precedent. It is settled by numerous decisions, that if the warranty is violated, it avoids the policy, and that it is immaterial whether the breach affects the risk or is connected with the loss or not. It would seem, in theory, that it was equally immaterial whether the act or thing to which the warranty related continued up to the time of the loss, or had ceased or been discontinued before. The amount of it is, the defendants undertook to indemnify the plaintiff against damage or loss by fire, etc., upon condition that certain stipulations were observed and kept by and on behalf of the plaintiff and not otherwise. If the plaintiff failed to perform those stipulations, the defendants' liability to indemnify ceased; could the plaintiff revive at pleasure by fulfilling his agreement—in this case by removing the camphene? If he could in one instance he could, for aught I see, in any number of cases. I incline to the opinion that this could not be done in any case without the [284] consent of the defendants, and that the only safe rule, is to hold the contract of insurance at an end, the moment the warranty is broken, and that it cannot be revived again without the consent of both parties, unless the insurer has by some act or line of conduct waived the breach or violation of the warranty."

In Reynolds v. German American Ins. Co. 107 Md. 116, 68 Atl. 262, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 345 (1907), a violation of a provision requiring an inventory to be taken within thirty days rendered the policy void even though one was taken within fourteen days after the expiration of the required time. "It may seem to be a hard rule," say the court, "to declare a policy forfeited for some act of omission or commission which in point of fact was not the cause of the fire, and actually did no injury to the insurer, but when parties enter into contracts which are not prohibited by law, and are declared by the courts to be reasonable regulations, upon what principle can a court revive a policy, which by its terms was null and void, simply because the insurer sustained no injury by reason of the insured's failure to do what is required of him? After this policy became null and void the insured could not by his act alone revive it so as to bind the insurer."

In Bemis v. Harborcreek Mut. F. Ins. Co. 200 Pa. St. 340, 49 Atl. 769 (1901); a provision avoiding the policy in case of a change of title was held to be violated by giving a warranty deed, although a reconveyance was made prior to the fire.

The earlier decisions in Massachusetts seem to favor the doctrine of suspension and revival on the ground of no increase of risk, but the later decisions have rather repudiated it and have taken the opposite view. In Hinckley v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 140 Mass. 38, 1 N. E. 737, 54 Am. Rep. 445, the court held that the temporary use of a bowling alley and pool room without a license, did not render the policy void but merely inoperative for the time being.

In Ring v. Phoenix Assur. Co. 145 Mass. 426, 14 N. E. 525, the same doctrine was applied to the insurance of chattels, in a house described as "occupied all the year round," when it appeared that for several weeks the house had been unoccupied, but was occupied at the time of the fire. Hinckley v. Germania F. Ins. Co. supra was cited with approval, but it should be noted that the effect of the non-occupancy upon the insurance on the house itself was not involved.

In Kyte v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. 149 Mass. 116, 21 N. E. 361, 3 L.R.A. 506, the increase of risk clause was under consideration, the insured having used the premises for [285] the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors during a substantial portion of the term of the policy, but afterwards, and before the fire, having obtained a license therefor. The court below instructed the jury that if the use of the premises which increased the risk, was merely temporary and ceased before the fire, the plaintiff could recover. The Law Court reversed this ruling and held that the policy was not merely suspended but might be treated by the company as wholly void. The court also took occasion to refer to Hinckley v. Germania Ins. Co. supra, and to say that the court in that case should have rested its decision upon another ground, "leaving it an open question whether a departure from the terms of the provision of a policy, without an increase of risk, may be deemed merely to suspend and not absolutely to avoid the policy." This rule that an increase of risk absolutely avoids the policy, even though it does not continue up to the time of the loss, applies in principle to a vacancy because under our decisions vacancy is presumptive proof of increase of risk, White v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 85 Me. 97, 26 Atl. 1049; Jones v. Granite State F. Ins. Co. 90 Me. 44, 37 Atl. 326.

Later Massachusetts decisions follow Kyte v. Commercial Union Assur Co. rather than Hinckley v. Germania F. Ins. Co.

In Walner v. Milford Mut. F. Ins. Co. 152 Mass. 335, 26 N. E. 877, 11 L.R.A. 598, the vacancy clause was under discussion, the disputed question being whether the policy took effect on January 23, 1889, or on March 13, 1880, it being admitted that the premises were vacant up to April, 1, 1889, and occupied from that time to the date of the fire May 12, 1889. The court unequivocally held that if the policy had been in force from January 23, it was rendered void, notwithstanding re-occupancy, but also held that it took effect from March 13, and therefore the vacancy had not existed for the prohibited and fatal period of thirty days.

Hill v. Middlesex Mut. Assur. Co. 174 Mass. 542, 55 N. E. 319, involved the material alteration clause and the fact that the alterations were completed long before the fire was held to have no curative power. "The fact that a breach of condition is past," say the court, "and did not contribute to the loss does not necessarily put an end to the right of the insurer to avoid the policy." This case was cited with approval in Stuart v. Reliance Ins. Co. 179 Mass. 434, 60 N. E. 929, where the temporary alienation of property was held to avoid the policy notwithstanding reconveyance. [286] It would seem that reoccupancy should have no greater power to rehabilitate the contract than reconveyance. The court in Massachusetts can therefore be considered as against the doctrine of temporary suspension in a case like the one at bar.

Without prolonging the discussion further it is sufficient to add that the following cases, all involving the question of vacancy and reoccupancy, hold that the policy is not revived; Moore v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 62 N. H. 240, 13 Am. St. Rep. 556; East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Kempner, 87 Tex. 229, 27 S. W. 122, 47 Am. St. Rep. 99 (1894); Hardiman v. Philadelphia F. Assoc. 212 Pa. St. 383, 61 Atl. 990 (1905); Hoover v. Mercantile Town Mut. Ins. Co. 93 Mo. App. 111, 69 S. W. 42 (1902); German Ins. Co. v. Russell, 65 Kan. 373, 69 Pac. 345, 58 L.R.A. 234 (1902). See also 19 cyc. p. 709.

These authorities, in our opinion rest on the correct principle. It is not a question whether the insurer has been injured by the breach of the contract but whether the contract itself has in fact been broken. It either has or has not been. If not, the rights of the parties remain unchanged. If it has, then by its own terms the contract is rendered "void." And this word "void" being neither ambiguous, nor technical, should be "construed according to the common meaning of the language," R. S. ch. 1, sec. 6, Par. I. It means null, of no effect. The Legislature has seen fit to prescribe this as the form to be used. If a change is desirable or expedient that change should come by way of legislative amendment rather than by judicial wrenching. The insurer has the right to insist that the conditions surrounding and affecting the property shall continue and remain the same as at the date of insurance. If "void" means "temporarily suspended" then under a policy running three years, the premises might become vacant on the next day after its issuance, remain vacant for nearly the entire term, without the assent of the company, but if reoccupied on the day before the fire, the indemnity would again spring into existence. The contract prescribed by the Legislature clearly forbids any such intermittent rights, and liabilities.

We are, of course, not to be understood as holding that the insurer cannot waive this provision of the policy. It is well settled that he can so waive it, but that question needs no discussion here as there are no sufficient facts to warrant it.

The entry must be,
Judgment for defendant.

NOTE.

Revival of Fire Insurance Policy by Occupancy after Vacancy.

The earlier cases passing on the question of the revival of a fire insurance policy by the occupancy of the insured premises after they have been vacant for a length of time prohibited by the express terms of the policy, are collated in the notes to Insurance Co. of North America v. Pitta, 9 Ann. Cas. 54, and Born v. Home Ins. Co. 80 Am. St. Rep. 300. This note presents the recent cases on the subject.

Following the rule of construction that of the two parties to a fire insurance policy, the insured is always to be favored in determining whether there has been a compliance with the terms of the policy, it has been held in a few recent cases that the vacancy of the premises during the term for which the policy is issued merely operates to suspend the policy and a subsequent occupancy of the premises revives the policy and puts it in full force again. Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. Toney, 1 Ga. App. 492, 57 S. E. 1013; Silver v. London Assur. Corp. 61 Wash. 593, 112 Pac. 666. Thus, in Silver v. London Assur. Corp. 61 Wash. 593, 112 Pac. 666, the court said: "The testimony shows that, after the policy was issued, both buildings were unoccupied for a period of more than ten days. As we have said, it also shows that one of the buildings was in the possession of a tenant at the time of the fire, and that there is no direct evidence that the other buildings were not in the possession of the watchman within ten days preceding that date. It is contended that a vacancy for the period of ten days terminates the policy, and that its operative force is not restored by a reoccupancy. Several authorities are cited which support that view. The question, however, is no longer an open one in this state. In Port Blakely Mill Co. v. Springfield Fire, etc. Ins. Co. 59 Wash.

501, 110 Pac. 36, this court, after an exhaustive review of the cases, announced the rule that a provision in a policy of insurance, to the effect that the policy shall be void upon the doing of a prohibited act or the failure to do an act agreed to be performed by the insured, only suspends the operation of the policy while the condition is broken, and has no application to a loss occurring at a time when there is no breach of the contract." And in Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. Toney, 1 Ga. App. 492, 57 S. E. 1013, in holding that a policy was not rendered void by a vacancy which had been terminated before the occurrence of the fire, the court said: "We cannot believe that the parties to this insurance contract intended that a temporary vacancy for a reasonable periodical beyond the ten days should result in a forfeiture of the insurance. The policy was taken out for a term of three years, from July 2, 1905, and the premium was paid for the entire three years in advance. The vacancy existed for thirty days, from December 7, 1905. The house was reoccupied from January 6, 1906, and fire occurred February 6, 1906, after the house had been reoccupied. This left over two years of the policy still in force. If the insured had thought that this temporary vacancy destroyed the value of his policy, he would unquestionably have taken some steps to have the forfeiture waived, or another policy written; and the insurer should have declared the forfeiture, if it had known of the vacancy, and should have tendered back to the insured the unearned portion of the premium. And if such temporary vacancy was to be treated by the insurer as a forfeiture of the policy, or it had been contemplated that such temporary vacancy would forfeit the policy, the policy should have made a provision for the return of the unearned portion of the premium." In Brashears v. Perry County Farmers' Protective Ins. Co. 51 Ind. App. 8, 98 N. E. 889, it appeared that a by-law of the insurance company provided that the "vacation of any insured property for a longer period than ten days shall suspend the action of the policy, but it shall revive again when reoccupied, provided the owner shall notify the secretary of such reoccupation." At the time the policy was issued the insured was given a copy of the by-laws. The house insured had been vacant for six weeks, was reoccupied, and a few days after reoccupancy was destroyed by fire. No notice of reoccupancy was given by the plaintiffs to the secretary of the company, and he had no information from other sources of the reoccupation until after the dwelling was destroyed. The court said, in holding that the policy had been suspended during the interval of vacancy, and not forfeited: "When the house had been vacant ten days, liability on the policy became suspended, and, under the contract, would continue suspended after reoccupation until the secretary was notified. However, the policy was not made void by the terms of the contract, and had it been, the effect would have been only to make it voidable at the option of the company. An affirmative act by the company was necessary to avoid the policy. After the company learned of the violation of the condition of the insurance contract, even though this was after the loss, it could have elected to avoid the contract. A failure to make this election must be construed as an election to hold the policy valid."

On the other hand, it has been held that where the policy plainly and expressly states that it shall be void in case the insured premises are allowed to become vacant and unoccupied without the consent of the insurer, the policy becomes void by the force of its own terms on the happening of the specified event, and subsequent occupancy does not operate to revive it. Couch v. Farmers' F. Ins. Co. 64 App. Div. 367, 72 N. Y. S. 95; Hardiman v. Philadelphia F. Assoc. 212 Pa. St. 383, 61 Atl. 990. And see the reported case. In the case first cited it appeared that at Thanksgiving time or about December first the plaintiff's intestate left the house and remained away until April 22 or 23; that during that time no one either occupied the house or went into it; that the back part of the house was nailed up; and that the key was left with a neighbor. The plaintiff's intestate testified that she intended to return to the house about the middle of January, following, but was prevented from doing so by sickness. The fire occurred the day after she returned or the day following. The court said: "Under these circumstances it would seem clear that by the express terms of the policy it had become void before the fire, and that in the absence of proof of waiver or a consent on the part of the insurer to a continuance of the risk, no recovery could be lawfully had upon the contract."

RECK

v.

WHITTLESBERGER.

181 Mich. 463; 148 N. W. 247.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Review — Findings of Fact.

Under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Pub. Acts [Ex. Sess.] 1912, No. 10) p. 3, § 12, providing that the findings of fact by the Industrial Accident Board acting within its powers, shall, in the absence of fraud, be conclusive, but that the Supreme Court may review questions of law, the facts found to be conclusive must be based on competent legal evidence, and not on bare supposition, guess, or conjecture, nor on rumor or incompetent evidence; as to so determine the rights of the parties would be to act outside the authority conferred by the statute, and without jurisdiction.

Applicability of Rules of Judicial Procedure.

While the Workmen's Compensation Act (Pub. Acts [Ex. Sess.] 1912, No. 10) contemplates the prompt adjustment of controversies by summary proceedings under a simplified procedure, unhampered by the technical forms and intervening steps of regular litigation, it indicates clearly an intent that the fundamental principles of a judicial inquiry shall be observed.

[See Ann. Cas. 1916A 741.]

Admissibility of Evidence — Declarations of Injured Workman as to Cause of Injury.

In a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Pub. Acts [Ex. Sess.] 1912, No. 10), hearsay evidence should not be admitted and made the basis of findings of fact and accordingly a self serving declaration by an injured workman as to the cause of his injury is not admissible.

Harmless Error — Admission of Evidence.

In a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Pub. Acts [Ex. Sess.] 1912, No. 10), the determination of the Industrial Accident Board will not be reversed because of the admission of hearsay evidence, where competent evidence making a prima facie case is uncontradicted.

Report by Employer to Commission — Effect as Evidence.

In a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Pub. Acts [Ex. Sess.] 1912, No. 10), a report to the Industrial Accident Board by the employer, made before the death of the employee, and at a time when he had ample opportunity to investigate, and all sources of information were fresh and available, stating that the employee was injured by running a nail into his hand while throwing wood into a furnace, and a second report after the death stating that he was injured by scratching his hand on a nail, constitutes prima facie evidence that the accident and injury occurred as reported, and supports a finding of the board that such injury arose out of, and in the course of, the employment.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Board.

Claim for compensation under workmen's compensation act. Mrs. Rudolph Reck, claimant, and Frank B. Whittlesberger, defendant. Claim allowed by Industrial Accident Board. Defendant brings certiorari. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Bowen, Douglas, Eaman & Barbour for appellant.

John Dohrman for appellee.

Pursuant to section 11 of said act the industrial accident board reviewed the decision of said committee of arbitration and such records as were kept by it, including the testimony it had taken. The return to this writ states, with some slight corrections which are made, that all the material testimony is correctly [465] and sufficiently set forth in appellant's petition for a consideration of the questions raised.

The record discloses that on January 12, 1913, said Rudolph Reck, a baker by trade, died at a hospital in Detroit of septic pneumonia, which resulted, as his physician testified, from systemic sepsis developed from an infected wound in his hand, claimed to have been caused, on December 26, 1912, by a nail in some fuel with which he was firing an oven in appellant's bakery on Randolph street, in said city, where deceased was then employed.

The bakeshop or room in which deceased was working at the time it is alleged he sustained the initial injury was about 100 feet long and 40 feet wide, and on that day two other bakers were at work in the room with him, a boy also being with them in the afternoon. Deceased finished his work for the day as usual, and left at the regular quitting time, which was about 7:30 p. m. His daughter testified that he arrived home that evening a little later than his customary time, and showed her an injury where he had hurt his hand at or near the thumb, stating that he chopped up a box and "ran a nail in his thumb." He worked full time at the shop the next day and until 4 p. m. the succeeding day. During this time the men with whom he worked saw and heard nothing of any accident; neither did they observe anything unusual in his work or conduct. He did not, however, return to work after December 23d, the day on which he quit at 4 o'clock.

Dr. Smith, the only medical witness who testified, first treated deceased on January 2, 1913. At that time his employer and fellow bakers were first informed of the claim that he had sustained any injury while at his work. Dr. Smith testified, as before stated, that septic trouble originating with the wound in the hand spread generally throughout the system [466] and resulted in pneumonia, which ended fatally. This is not controverted, but it is urged that no competent evidence was produced showing where or how deceased injured his hand, or that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment.

Following a claim regularly made for compensation by the widow under said Act No. 10, generally known as the workmen's compensation act, a committee of arbitration was selected, as provided by the act, and hearings were held. One of said hearings was at the bakery where the injury was claimed to have been received. None of the employees saw the accident or were shown to have personal knowledge of when or how it occurred. The committee then threw the door wide open for hearsay evidence, and, against objection, entertained any testimony offered as to what witnesses had heard deceased and others say about it.

Appellant's assignments of error are as follows:

"First. In holding that there was sufficient proof that Rudolph Reck received a personal injury arising out of and in the course of his employment to justify a decree in favor of the claimant.

"Second. In holding that hearsay evidence offered for the purpose of proving that the deceased received a personal injury arising out of and in the course of his employment was admissible, and denying the objection of your petitioner to its admission.

"Third. In determining and ordering your petitioner to pay the said widow the sum of $2,250, and costs, as compensation for the injury and attendant death of Rudolph Reck."

The third assignment is manifestly contingent on the other two, and calls for no separate consideration. The first and second present the two questions of whether this unrestricted admission of hearsay testimony was reversible error, and whether there was any competent evidence in the case on which to base a finding that the injury complained of arose out of, and in the course of, deceased's employment.

[467] At the threshold of this inquiry we are confronted with the proposition that the board is made by the law creating it the final tribunal as to the facts, and, it having made a finding of facts legally sufficient to support the award, its decision cannot be questioned by the court.

Section 12 of part 3 of said act provides:

"The findings of fact made by said industrial accident board acting within its powers, shall, in the absence of fraud, be conclusive, but the Supreme Court shall have power to review questions of law involved in any final decision or determination of said industrial accident board: Provided, that application is made by the aggrieved party within 30 days after such determination by certiorari, mandamus or by any other method permissible under the rules and practice of said court or the laws of this State, and to make such further orders in respect thereto as justice may require."

As a legal conclusion, no one will deny that in any judicial proceeding the competency of testimony offered in support of or against any material fact is a question of law. It does not follow, however, that the appellate court in all instances must set aside an adjudication because of erroneous admission or rejection of evidence. The doctrine that prejudice is always presumed from error is not accepted by all students of jurisprudence with complacency, even in those jurisdictions where the doctrine prevails. Neither do we conceive that in reviewing decisions of this board all technical rules of law, often made imperative by precedent in reviewing the action of regularly constituted trial courts, must be applied. The board is purely a creature of statute, endowed with varied and mixed functions. Primarily it is an administrative body, created by the act to carry its provisions into effect. Supplemental to this, in order that it may more efficiently administer the law, it is vested with quasi judicial powers, plenary within the limits fixed by the statute. [468] Along the lines marked out by the act it is authorized to pass upon disagreements between employers and claimants in regard to compensation for injuries, and to that end make and adopt rules for a simple and reasonably summary procedure. Hearings are to be held upon notice to parties in interest; compulsory process for attendance of witnesses and power to administer oaths is given; the parties in interest are entitled to notice, to be heard and to submit evidence; a review, findings, a decision, and an award of compensation are provided for, though in the final test resort must be had to the courts to enforce the awards. In those proceedings the board does not act solely as a mere arbitrator. It has various plenary powers well defined, and its status is unique in the particular that it performs in combination both administrative functions and certain of the duties of a court, a referee, and an arbitration board. Its findings of facts upon hearings are conclusive, and cannot be reviewed, except for fraud, provided, necessarily, that any competent, legal evidence is produced from which such facts may be found. Facts cannot be evolved from the inner consciousness of that tribunal on bare supposition, guess, or conjecture, nor on rumor or incompetent evidence. To so determine the rights of parties would be to act outside the authority conferred by the act, and without jurisdiction.

While it was evidently the intent of this law that, by concise and plain summary proceedings, controversies arising under the act should be promptly adjusted, under a simplified procedure unhampered by the more technical forms and intervening steps which sometimes cumber and delay regular litigation, yet the language of the act, and provision for review of questions of law, indicate clearly an intent that the elementary and fundamental principles of a judicial inquiry should be observed, and that it was not the [469] intent to throw aside all safeguards by which such investigations are recognized as best protected.

The rule against hearsay evidence is more than a mere artificial technicality of law. It is founded on the experience, common knowledge, and common conduct of mankind. Its principles are generally understood and acted upon in any important business transaction or serious affair in life. In such matters men refuse to rely on rumor or what some one has heard others say, and demand the information at first hand. The common, instinctive weight usually given such evidence is illustrated by this statement of Dr. Smith, after relating what deceased told him as to how he hurt his hand, "I don't know anything about it;" and of Mrs. Taylor, a daughter of deceased, who, in connection with her testimony as to what she had been told, said, "I really don't know myself; . . . the only thing I know about this matter is that the night I went home they took him to the hospital." The danger and unreliability of hearsay testimony is well exemplified in her evidence. She testified that Haberstoh, a fellow workman in the shop, saw the accident and described it to her, as she related it while testifying. This, on the surface, would seem to be about as satisfactory and convincing hearsay evidence as could be produced. Had Haberstoh been unavailable, it would have been equally competent and uncontroversible, but it was shown by Haberstoh himself that he saw nothing of any accident, and obtained his information from Charles Ruskei, the boy who worked in the shop afternoons, who himself saw nothing, but heard deceased state how he hurt his hand.

Coming directly to this line of testimony as applied to workmen's compensation cases, it is said in Boyd on Workmen's Compensation, p. 1123:

"The statements made by an injured man as to his bodily or mental feelings are admissible, but those [470] made as to the cause of his illness are not to be received in evidence. The rule applies to statements made by a deceased workman to a fellow workman as to the cause of his injury."

And more fully in Bradbury on Workmen's Compensation, p. 403, as follows:

"The statement made by an employee in the absence of his employer, by a deceased man, as to his bodily or mental feelings are admissible in evidence, but those made as to the cause of his illness are not admissible in evidence and where there is no other evidence of an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment than statements made by a deceased employee in the absence of his employer, an award cannot be sustained."

In Gilbey v. Great Western R. Co. 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 135, where a workman at a meat market on arriving home told his wife that he had broken his rib when trying to save some meat from slipping into the dirt, the court said:

"To hold such statements ought to be admitted as evidence of the origin of the facts deposed to, I think, impossible. Such a contention is contrary to all authority."

This rule is emphasized to the extent of even holding admission of such evidence reversible error in Smith v. Hardman, 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 719, because the mind of the trial court might have been "colored by his admitting statements which are inadmissible as evidence."

We do not think, however, that under the language used in our workmen's compensation act the decisions of its administrative board must be in all cases reversed under the rule of presumptive prejudice, because of error in the admission of incompetent testimony, when, in the absence of fraud, there appears in the record a legal basis for its findings, which are [471] made "conclusive" by statute when said board acts within the scope of its authority.

As a part of the plan for a practical administration of this law, section 17 of part 3 requires each employer who elects to come under the provisions of said act to keep a record of injuries "received by his employees in the course of their employment," and within ten days after an accident resulting in personal injury to report the same in writing to the industrial accident board, on blanks printed for that purpose.

The first knowledge which came to the board of this accident is contained in the report of appellant, made by an admitted agent. It is dated January 9, 1913, and marked "First Report of Accident." It states, amongst other things, that on December 28, 1912, Reck, a baker by trade, was injured; the "cause and manner of accident" being that he "was throwing wood in furnace and a nail run in left hand inflicting a deep gash." This report was made three days before Reck's death, and indicates that the employer, or his representatives, had full notice of the injury, with ample opportunity to investigate while Reck was alive, and all sources of information were both fresh and available. A second report, after Reck's death, made on January 15, 1913, giving the same date of the accident, etc., states of its "cause and manner:"

"The injured was throwing wood in the fire and a nail scratched his left hand. He worked for two or three days after the accident, when the hand became infected, and he was sent to the hospital. After the hand had started to heal nicely he contracted broncho-pneumonia, which disease caused his death January 13, 1913."

We think that such reports from the employer, where all sources of information are at his command when the reports are made, and he has had ample opportunity to satisfy himself of the facts, can properly be taken as an admission, and, at least, as prima facie [472] evidence that such accident and injury occurred as reported.

No evidence was offered to impeach the reports or to show that the accident occurred otherwise than as stated in them. Eliminating from consideration the hearsay testimony erroneously admitted, which could not affect either way the legal significance of such reports, the record furnishes legal support for the findings of fact made. Consequently such findings are to be recognized as conclusive under the statute.

The decision of said industrial accident board is therefore affirmed.

McAlvay, C. J., and Brooke, Kuhn, Stone, Ostrander, Bird, and Moore, JJ., concurred.

NOTE.

Admissibility in Proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act of Statement by Injured Employee Respecting Cause of Injury.

The reported case, which appears to be the only American case on the point, holds that a self-serving statement made by an injured workman as to the cause of the injury is not, after his death, admissible in a proceeding by his dependents to obtain the benefits of a workmen's compensation act. A few English cases maintain the same view. Gilby v. Great Western R. Co. 102 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 202, 3 B. W. C. C. 135; Smith v. Hardman, 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 719. Thus in Gilby v. Great Western R. Co. supra, it appeared that a workman returned to his home suffering from certain injuries from which he thereafter died. On entering the house he made a statement to his wife as to the cause and occasion of the injuries from which he was suffering. The court said: "In this case the only evidence on which the applicant rests her case consists of the statements made by the deceased workman as to his having had an accident, and as to the nature of that accident. I can find no case whatever which permits such declarations to be admitted as evidence of the truth contained in the facts of those declarations. We do give, in cases like the present, considerable latitude to parties in admitting the statements of deceased persons under the head of what is called res gestae. But to admit the statements in the present case as evidence of the cause of the injury to the deceased workman would be to go wholly beyond anything which the courts have ever sanctioned, and would be contrary to the English law." But in Wright v. Kerrigan, [1911] 2 Ir. R. 301, it appeared that an injured employee told his physician that certain abrasions on his body were the result of an accident. On that declaration, together with proof of the fact that the abrasions in question, from the result of which the employee subsequently died, were such as might readily have resulted from the employment, which consisted in lifting coffins out of vans, an award of compensation was sustained. Cherry, L. J., said: "It is said that there was no evidence in this case to justify the Recorder in holding that the injuries to the deceased workman were caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The learned Recorder is said to have acted upon hearsay evidence; but hearsay evidence is in some cases admissible, and the learned Recorder appears to me to have acted strictly in accordance with the settled rules of evidence. There is no better authority on this branch of the law than the Recorder himself. He ruled out statements as to the circumstances of the accident. He admitted the statements made by the deceased man to his medical attendant, Dr. Crinion, as to his symptoms and their cause. Such statements are usually held to be admissible upon the ground that there are no other means possible of proving bodily or mental feelings than by statements of the person who experiences them. The decisions in workmen's compensation cases show, especially where death occurs, that very slender evidence may be sufficient to justify an inference that an injury has been caused by an accident in the course of the employment."

A statement as to the cause of an injury made by the injured employee who died before the hearing has been excluded though it was against his interest. Tucker v. Oldbury Urban Dist. Council, [1912] 2 K. B. (Eng.).

317. In that case the claim of the dependents was based on the theory that in the course of the employee's work a piece of steel was driven under his thumb nail from which blood poisoning resulted. It appeared that the employee came to work with his thumb bound up and that the manager asked what was the matter. Sustaining the exclusion of his answer to that question the court said: "Counsel for the appellants sought to support the appeal on two grounds, i. e., (1) that the statements of the deceased workman were admissible as admissions, and (2) that they were admissible as declarations against interest. With regard to the first of these grounds, I am of opinion that it is untenable. The applicants in the present case have as dependents a direct statutory right against the employer under Sched. I: (1844) (1.) (a); the deceased workman is not a party to the litigation, nor do they derive their title to compensation by derivation from him. No admission therefore made by him can be evidence against the present applicants. The second objection gives rise to more difficulty. To decide whether it applies one must of course know the nature of the declaration in order to judge whether or not it was a declaration against interest on the part of the deceased. We were informed that the statements were to the effect that he had a whitlow on his thumb, and that on the witness further asking him whether he had been hammering his thumb the deceased said 'No.' This ground of admissibility has nothing whatever to do with the fact that the deceased was the workman himself. It would apply equally to a declaration against interest on the part of any witness. Such declarations are admitted as evidence in our jurisprudence on the ground that declarations made by persons against their own interests are extremely unlikely to be false. It follows therefore that to support the admissibility it must be shown that the statement was to the knowledge of the deceased contrary to his interest. And it is now settled that the declaration must be against pecuniary interests (or against proprietary interests, which is much the same thing): see Perrage Case 11 Cl. & F. 85 and the judgment of Blackburn, J. in Smith v. Blakey, L. R. 2 Q. B. 326, 332. In my opinion the proposed statements fail to satisfy the requirements of the law and the evidence was rightly rejected. At the date when they were made no claim had been made, and there is no reason to believe that the workman knew that he ever would be able to make a claim. Up to that moment there had been no incapacity. He had continued working as usual and he undoubtedly was unable at that time to foresee the rapid and fatal development of the mischief. It must be remembered that if the incapacity lasts less than two weeks no compensation is payable in respect of the first week. But apart from this I am of opinion that the statements themselves were not necessarily against the interest of the deceased. The description of the trouble in his thumb as a whitlow was in the mouth of an ordinary workman, a natural description which does not seem to me to be, when properly understood, contrary to the facts of the case or inimical to a claim on his part, if he had lived to make one. A whitlow is a septic condition resembling very much the early stages of such an affection as that of which the workman died. Nor does the statement that he had not been hammering his thumb appear to me to militate against the success of any such claim. It certainly does not amount to a statement that he had not while working run a piece of iron or steel under his nail."

v.

MOUNTAIN STATES TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Colorado Supreme Court—July 8, 1914.

58 Colo. 58; 142 Pac. 165.

Telegraphs and Telephones — Duty to Serve Public without Discrimination.

Telephone companies are public service corporations, and their instruments and apparatus are devoted to a public use, and must serve the public generally, without discrimination, on compliance with their reasonable rates and regulations, being bound to conduct their business in a manner conducive to the public benefit, and subject to legislative regulation and control.

Contracts — Termination.

Under a contract for telephone service at a residence not extending to any definite time, and which plaintiff, the subscriber, could terminate at any time, the court was without power to perpetuate it for business purposes at the agreed rate for residence purposes, which might or might not be reasonable, since such contracts for fixed periods are impractical, if not impossible, from their very nature.

Regulation of Rates.

Contracts with public service corporations for specific rates, and for definite periods, are subject to legislative regulation.

[See Ann. Cas. 1912D 308.]

Same.

The power to fix a rate or regulation for a public service corporation is exclusively a legislative function, and the court may not fix a rate, but may determine the question of reasonableness only.

Error to District Court, Boulder county: GRAHAM, Judge.

Action for injunction. Edward Wolverton, plaintiff and Mountain States Telephone and Telegraph Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Howard L. Honan and W. G. Houston for plaintiff in error.

Milton Smith, Charles R. Brock, W. H. Ferguson, Joseph Sampson and Elmer L. Brock for defendant in error.

[60] SCOTT, J.—The complaint in this case alleges that the plaintiff, a citizen of the city of Boulder, had a residence telephone installed in his dwelling by the Colorado Telephone Company, on the 9th day of March, 1904. That later the defendant, the Mountain States Telephone Company succeeded to the business and rights of the Colorado Telephone Company.

The telephone remained in the house, and so in use of the plaintiff, until the 14th day of February, 1912. On that day the plaintiff removed to another place of residence, and the defendant refused to install another telephone at the new place of residence under the terms of the original contract.

The telephone was installed originally under the usual application and contract. The price to be paid under this contract was one dollar and fifty cents per month, or four dollars and fifty cents per quarter, with additional pay for excess calls, and a fee of five dollars for installation. It was provided in the contract that:

"The Colorado Telephone Company may terminate the subscriber's rights by written notice served on the subscriber or any occupant of the premises and sever his connection and remove the instrument for non-payment of the rental provided for herein or for any use of the telephone by the subscriber contrary to this request, etc."

The complaint also alleged that the defendant presented a bill for the use of the telephone on the 1st day of February, 1912, for service for that full month which plaintiff then paid, and further, that the plaintiff has complied with all the conditions of the contract.

It was further alleged in the complaint:

"That the plaintiff is engaged in the life insurance business, and during a great portion of said time maintained an agency at his residence at 1728 Grove Street, in the said city of Boulder, where said telephone service [61] was rendered as aforesaid; and that at said residence Vera Wolverton, his wife, for the joint benefit of herself and this plaintiff, maintained a fire insurance agency, and that both this plaintiff and his wife, Vera Wolverton, have built up a large business in their respective agencies in the cities, town, and localities included within the territory covered by said contract as aforesaid. That this plaintiff, and the said Vera Wolverton, and also their customers have become accustomed to transact much of the business in regard to their insurance and other business, by means of the telephone, and that this plaintiff and the said Vera Wolverton have frequent occasion to call up customers, and to transact various other kinds of business in the several towns and adjacent communities covered by said contract, and people within said territory have frequent occasion to call up plaintiff and his wife on matters of business. That the character of the business being carried on by plaintiff and his wife is such that quick, prompt and reliable service and communication is essential, and that the discontinuance of said telephone service, and the disconnection and removal of said telephone, and the refusal to furnish service under the said contract, is working and will continue to work irreparable injury to this plaintiff, by causing dissatisfaction among said customers and inevitable loss of business."

There are further allegations of repeated requests to install and maintain the telephone in accordance with the terms of said contract, and at the new place of residence.

It is also alleged that the defendant is a public utility corporation, and that there is no other service of like character being rendered to the citizens of Boulder, and none other available to the plaintiff and his wife in carrying on their business.

The prayer was for a temporary mandatory injunction to compel the defendant to install and maintain a [62] telephone instrument at the new place of residence, and render service to the plaintiff in accordance with the terms of said contract, for damages and costs.

A general demurrer was sustained to the complaint, and this is assigned as error.

It will be seen that the demand of the plaintiff is for the installation of a telephone for business purposes, and the damage claimed is for injury to plaintiff's business.

The contract with the Colorado Telephone Company was for residence purposes alone, and shows this to be an entirely different class, with different charges than for business purposes.

The complaint does not allege that the plaintiff has tendered or offered to pay, the usual and customary rate for such purpose, or the reasonable value of such service, or a reasonable rate for any service whatsoever.

Telephone companies are public service corporations and their instruments and apparatus are therefore devoted to a public use; and by reason of various valuable rights and franchises granted by the public are subject to certain well understood duties and obligations, without discrimination, to the public generally, and are bound to conduct their business in a manner conducive to the public benefit. They are likewise subject to legislative regulation and control. These companies may not arbitrarily refuse their facilities to any person desiring them, and offering to comply with their regulations, subject to the provision that rates and regulations must be reasonable.

That there is reasonably a difference in the value of such services, as between business and residence purposes, and that such difference in the rates charged by such public service companies, is common and usual, is well understood. So that in this case, even if we were [63] to hold the contract binding, for continued use as a residence phone, it cannot apply in case of use for business purposes, which appears to be the clear demand of the plaintiff.

The complaint does not allege public regulation as to rates, nor a customary rate charged for the service demanded, nor what is a reasonable rate therefor, nor a tender of any such sum. The right of the plaintiff, as a resident of the city of Boulder to have a telephone installed in his home or place of business, and to the use thereof, is not dependent upon contract, but upon the fact that the defendant is a public service corporation, with its attendant obligations to the public by reason thereof, and the plaintiff's willingness to pay the reasonable rates for such service, and to otherwise comply with the defendant's reasonable regulations, applicable to all alike, and without discrimination.

But it must be conceded that the plaintiff could at any time have terminated the contract, under its own terms, at will. There is no agreement that the contract will continue for any definite period.

It requires no argument to show that such contracts with public service corporations, for fixed period are impracticable, if not impossible from their very nature. The service is a public service and subject to a constant change of conditions.

It is clear that if the telephone company should reduce its rates for service to the public generally, it could not continue to hold the plaintiff indefinitely, under a contract for a higher rate.

The rule as to the enforcement of contracts wanting in mutuality was stated by Judge Cooley in Rust v. Conrad, 47 Mich. 449, 11 N. W. 265, 41 Am. Rep. 720; to be:

"But the court will also refuse to interfere in any case where if it were to do so, one of the parties might nullify its action through the exercise of a discretion [64] which the contract or the law invests him with. The refusal in such a case does not depend of necessity upon any irregularity, inequality or unfairness, but is sufficiently based upon the impropriety of imposing upon the judge, the labor and upon the public, the expense, of an investigation of reports, when the circumstances are such as to preclude any judgment that may be rendered from being final. No court can with reason be called upon to do a vain thing. All contracts where the party has reserved to himself, or where the law gives him, the authority to render nugatory any decree that ought to be rendered in their enforcement rest upon the same principle. This was recognized in Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 10 Wall. 339, 359, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 955, and more distinctly asserted and decided in Southern Express Co. v. Western North Carolina R. Co. 99 U. S. 191, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 319. In this last case the very strong assertion is made that a court of equity never interferes where the power of revocation exists."

As to the application of this rule in case of contracts with public utilities for service see Fowler Utilities Co. v. Gray, 168 Ind. 1, 79 N. E. 897, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 726, 120 Am. St. Rep. 344.

2, Wyman on Public Service Corporations well states the reason for the rule of non-enforcement of such contracts with public service corporations as follows:

"A troublesome problem arises when the continuing to render service at certain rates fixed by a contract which was legal when it was made, comes into conflict with new rates later scheduled, by which the public generally are called upon to pay higher rates. It once seems to have been thought that a continuing contract to take shipments must be respected when rates generally are raised. In those days it will be remembered any concessions for which anything could be said was held justifiable. But of late with the stringent law against all discrimination, [65] and the insistent enforcement of it, even a definite contract still continuing by its terms is held no justification for giving to the particular customer lower rates than those called for from all, by the present schedule. Once the policy against discrimination is well established there is no difficulty in saying that for reasons of public policy no further obligation attaches to such a contract. To the argument that the contract may have been valid when made, if it fixed the rate then charged all, and that therefore the subsequent action of the railroad in advancing rates generally could not invalidate it, the United States Supreme Court replied recently: "This contention loses sight of the central and controlling purposes of the law, which is to require shippers to be treated alike, and that the filed and published rate, shall be equally known by and available to every shipper."

And it is now held that even in case of such contracts with public utilities for specific rates and for definite periods of time, these are subject to legislative acts of regulation. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 467, 31 S. Ct. 265, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 297, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 671; Southern Wire Co. v. St. Louis Bridge, etc. Co. 38 Mo. App. 191.

In addition to what has been said, it has been held that such a judgment as is prayed for in this case, would be in effect the fixing of a rate by the court. Nebraska Telephone Co. v. State, 55 Neb. 627, 76 N. W. 171, 45 L.R.A. 113.

It is universally held that the power to fix a rate or regulation in such case is exclusively a legislative function; and that the courts may determine the question of reasonableness alone.

It is quite clear in this case that the court is asked to perpetuate a contract between the parties as it relates to a rate once agreed on, for residence purposes, and also to make it apply to a business purpose, and which [66] may or may not be at this time reasonable. Courts have no such power. Colorado Tel. Co. v. Wilmore, 53 Colo. 591.

The judgment is affirmed.

Musser, C. J. and Garrigues, J., concur.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that from the status of a telephone company as a public service corporation arises an obligation to furnish service without discrimination. Applying that rule it is held that a service contract whose continued performance would be discriminatory cannot be enforced. The earlier cases discussing the duty to supply telephone connections and facilities without discrimination are reviewed in the notes to Yancey v. Batesville Telephone Co. 11 Ann. Cas. 135; Cumberland Telephone, etc. Co. v. Kelly, 15 Ann. Cas. 1210; Vaught v. East Tennessee Telephone Co. Ann. Cas. 1912C 132 and Central Union Telephone Co. v. Falley, 10 Am. St. Rep. 114.

STATE.

New York Court of Appeals—November 10, 1914.

Eminent Domain — Relation of Parties.

"Condemnation" is an enforced sale, and the condemnor stands toward the owner as buyer toward seller.

Compensation for Fixtures.

The state condemning a warehouse for the use of a barge canal may not reject the machinery therein attached as fixtures in computing compensation, where there was nothing in the notice of appropriation excepting such fixtures.

Jackson v. State, 160 N. Y. App. Div. 110, reversed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Third Judicial Department.

Claim for compensation for condemnation of property. John J. Jackson, claimant, and State of New York, defendant. Award of Board of Claims affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Claimant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Charles Hickey for appellant.

Thomas Carmody and Joseph P. Coughlin for respondent.

[35] CARDOZA, J.—The State appropriated the claimant's warehouse in the village of Middleport for the use of the barge canal. The Board of Claims found that the value of the building was $9,000 and that of the land $1,300. The claimant had an award for those amounts. The board also found that the building contained machinery, shafting, elevators and conveyors of the value of $4,353.20. The form in which these articles were annexed to the freehold, and the purpose of the annexation, were such that, as between vendor and vendee, they would have constituted fixtures. For the enhancement of value due to the presence of these fixtures, the Board of Claims refused to award compensation to the claimant. The ruling has been affirmed at the Appellate Division on the ground that the State, after appropriating the warehouse, had the right to reject the fixtures and refuse to pay for them.

We think that the power of the State is not so great, nor the plight of the citizen so helpless. Condemnation is an enforced sale, and the State stands toward the owner as buyer toward seller. On that basis the rights and duties of each must be determined. It is intolerable that the State, after condemning a factory or warehouse, should surrender to the owner a stock of second-hand machinery and in so doing discharge the full measure of its duty. [36]. Severed from the building, such machinery commands only the prices of second-hand articles; attached to a going plant, it may produce an enhancement of value as great as it did when new. The law gives no sanction to so obvious an injustice as would result if the owner were held to forfeit all these elements of value. An appropriation of land, unless qualified when made, is an appropriation of all that is annexed to the land, whether classified as buildings or as fixtures, and so it has frequently been held. (Matter of New York, 118 App. Div. 865, 103 N. Y. S. 908, affirmed 189 N. Y. 508, 81 N. E. 1162; Matter of New York, 39 App. Div. 589, 57 N. Y. S. 657; Phipps v. New York, 69 Misc. 295, 127 N. Y. S. 260; Allen v. Boston, 137 Mass. 319.) We say "unless qualified when made," because we do not need at this time to decide whether the State, in giving notice of appropriation, may except fixtures that would retain, after severance from the soil, a substantial value as personalty, and thus restrict the payment to the difference between the value of the detached articles and the value added to the building when they were used in connection with it. (Price v. Milwaukee, etc. R. Co. 27 Wis. 98; Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. v. Getz, 113 Pa. St. 214, 6 Atl. 356.) If that may be done in any case, it can only be when the purpose is made plain in the act of appropriation. The rights of the parties became fixed at that time, and must then be reciprocal. If the State has the right, under a general notice of appropriation, to insist that title to the fixtures has passed to it with the land, the owner has the correlative right to insist upon payment. The law does not leave the title in a state of suspense. The value of the fixtures ought, therefore, to have been considered in estimating the total value of the property appropriated by the State.

We have not ignored the suggestion in behalf of the respondent that some of the fixtures were afterwards removed by the claimant, and by common consent were treated as personal property. (Tyson v. Post, 108 N. Y. [37] 217.) No finding on this subject was either made or requested, and the evidence is too vague to enable us to ascertain the truth of the transaction. The claimant's position is that he did not remove anything, but acquired by purchase from a contractor some of the fixtures which the contractor had purchased from the State. Upon another hearing this element of the controversy may be more fully developed.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

C. A. 382. "I conceive the true rule to be that, when property is taken by the right of eminent domain, the doctrine of fixtures and erections, as applicable to the relation of landlord and tenant, have no application; the question being, is the property taken of the character of real estate, and is it inherently real property? If it is, then it becomes the subject of appropriation, and not only may, but must, be taken as an entirety, as it then exists, without reference to the respective ownerships or parts of such real property. This property being of a character which is the subject of appropriation, it became the duty of the commissioners to determine its value, and award that sum to the respective parties in interest. . . . No consideration was given to the value of the fixtures in the building. As appears by the testimony, the engine and boiler were placed in a separate structure attached to the main building, resting partially upon piles driven into the ground, and partially upon the soil. There was brick-work around the boiler, with a brick arch and a brick floor,—the whole set in permanently. The engine is set upon timbers, and is connected with the shafting which is fitted into the building, and through this the power is applied which draws the ice up the galleries. All of these fixtures were placed in this structure with reference to the building, and for the particular use to which it is put. The same is true with respect to the scales for weighing ice. Within the authorities, this property is inseparable from the building, and forms an element of damage to be considered." In re Park Com'rs, 1 N. Y. S. 763.

As to the right of damages in condemnation proceedings for injury to personal property or the expense of removing it from the premises, see the notes to Bliacoe v. Choctaw, etc. R. Co. 2 Ann. Cas. 689; Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Anderson, 16 Ann. Cas. 784.

Application of Rule.

FIXTURES ATTACHED BY OWNER.

In the case of In Matter of New York, 39 App. Div. 589, 57 N. Y. S. 657, it appeared that land on which a gas plant was situated was taken by the city for park purposes. The city contended that although the machinery as it stood on the land would be a fixture as between vendor and vendee, that rule did not apply in condemnation cases, and that it was the duty of the owner to remove all machinery that could be removed without its practical destruction. The court in answering this contention said: "There is practically no dispute upon the evidence that, as between vendor and vendee, a very large portion of this machinery would have been regarded as a fixture, and, therefore, if the premises had been sold by contract between two individuals the machinery would go with the land. Does this law of fixtures apply to this class of cases? . . . The same rule exists in proceedings to take land under the right of eminent domain, and the commissioners of estimate have no right to restrict the assessment to the simple value of the land, compelling the owner to retain the fixtures on the premises, and exempting the city from an obligation to take and pay for them as a part of the land. Schuchardt v. New York, 53 N. Y. 202, 208."

In Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Anderson, 88 Ark. 129, 16 Ann. Cas. 784, 113 S. W. 1030, it appeared that a building had been erected for the purpose of installing machinery for a planing mill and that the machinery was securely fastened to the building and was intended to be a permanent accession to the freehold. In a proceeding by a railroad company for the condemnation of the land on which the building stood it was held that "the machinery became a part of the realty" so as to be considered in assessing the damages.

In Price v. Milwaukee, etc. R. Co. 27 Wis. 98, it appeared that the plaintiff had placed certain fixtures on his premises to adapt his property to use as a water-cure. Part of the premises were condemned for a railroad right of way by the defendant, its charter requiring it to pay the value of the land actually taken for the use of its road, and also the damage or injury which the owner sustained by reason of the taking. It was held that "if the defendant entered upon the plaintiff's premises in such a way as to destroy the fixtures he had put upon them for use as a water-cure, he was entitled to compensation."

In the case of In re Post Office Site, 210 Fed. 832, 127 C. C. A. 382, it appeared that an engraving plant was situated on premises which were condemned for a post office site. Compensation was allowed for the machinery of the plant, it appearing that the machinery was affixed so as to become a part of the realty and not removable without damage to it.

In White v. Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. 34 Ind. App. 287, 71 N. E. 276, it was held that where the machinery of a plant is so attached as to become a fixture and a part of the land only is taken under eminent domain all of the machinery must be considered as a part of the land in determining the compensation to be paid. The court said: "The case at bar seems to have been tried upon the theory that a part of this machinery should be considered a part of the land, while a part of the machinery might not be so considered. It is clear from the record that the improvement upon the real estate consists, not simply of certain buildings containing various pieces of machinery, but of a paper-mill—a thing complete within itself.

Such machinery as is necessary and essential to a paper-mill plant would be without value except as a part of a paper-mill. Means were provided for utilizing the water-power, buildings erected, and the machinery placed in position for the purpose of establishing a paper-mill. It is not questioned that the buildings should be regarded as a part of the land. In such case there is no more reason for saying that the machinery necessary and essential for carrying out the purpose of the mill is a mere incident or accessory to the buildings than there is for saying that the buildings are incidents or accessories to the machinery. . . . As the machinery is permanent in its character, and, being essential to the purpose for which the buildings are used, is a fixture, it must be regarded as realty, and go with the buildings. The land, water-power, buildings and machinery constitute a paper-mill plant—a unit. It has or has not a value as such, just as a building is valued, not by fixing a value on the different materials composing it but as a building. By the instrument of appropriation no building situated on the real estate is to be removed or destroyed, but it is proposed to pass over a part of the mill by means of a bridge. If a part of the land is taken, appellant is entitled to the fair market value of the land so taken. And if the market value of the remaining portion with the improvement as above indicated—that is, the market value of the paper-mill plant—after the appropriation is less than it was before the appropriation, she is entitled to that difference."

FIXTURES ATTACHED BY TENANT.

The prevailing rule is that the value of fixtures attached by a tenant and removable by him at the expiration of his term is to be considered as an element in assessing the damages sustained by the appropriation of property in eminent domain proceedings during the term of the tenancy. Gibson v. Hammersmith Ry. 9 Jur. N. S. 221, 8 L. T. N. S. 43, Drew & S. 603, 11 W. R. 209, 1 N. R. 305, 32 L. J. Ch. 337; In re New York, 192 N. Y. 295, 84 N. E. 1105, 127 Am. St. Rep. 903, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 423, modifying 122 App. Div. 890, 106 N. Y. S. 1117; Matter of Avenue A. 66 Misc. 488, 122 N. Y. S. 321; In re New York, 101 App. Div. 527, 92 N. Y. S. 8, affirmed 182 N. Y. 281, 74 N. E. 840; Matter of Willcox, 142 App. Div. 680, 127 N. Y. S. 777; Matter of Willcox, 165 App. Div. 197, 151 N. Y. S. 141; Matter of North River Water Front, 118 App. Div. 865, 103 N. Y. S. 908, affirmed 189 N. Y. 508, 81 N. E. 1162. See also Sheehan v. Fall River, 187 Mass. 356, 73 N. E. 544; Phipps v. New York, 60 Misc. 295, 127 N. Y. S. 280. Compare Schreiber v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 115 Ill.

340, 3 N. E. 427; Matter of Public Parks, 53 Hun 280, 6 N. Y. S. 750; New York Cent. etc. R. Co. v. Albany Steam Trap Co. 161 App. Div. 329, 146 N. Y. S. 674.

"The city took the entire buildings as they stood, including the trade fixtures therein, and for the purposes of this proceeding they must all be regarded as real property. That is, as between the tenant and the city, the trade fixtures were real property and must be paid for by the city the same as a building, and the tenant was under no more obligation to remove them than he would be to remove a building if he were the owner. As between the tenant and the owner, however, the trade fixtures were personalty, and could be removed, and therefore any award made for them would go to the tenant. . . . For the purpose of this proceeding the trade fixtures were . . . real property and were properly the subject of condemnation and award." Matter of Avenue A. 66 Misc. 488, 122 N. Y. S. 321.

In the case of Matter of North River Water Front, 118 App. Div. 865, 103 N. Y. S. 908, affirmed 189 N. Y. 508, 81 N. E. 1162, it was held that a tenant who had erected a building on land which was condemned by a city for the improvement of a water front was entitled to compensation to the extent of the reasonable value of machinery which he had put in the building so as to become a real part thereof.

In Schreiber v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 115 Ill. 340, 3 N. E. 427, it appeared that a railroad company instituted a proceeding to condemn land occupied by a tenant. The tenant had erected buildings and installed machinery on the land. It was held that as between the owner of the land and the tenant the buildings and the machinery were trade fixtures and that the tenant was not entitled to compensation. The court said: "The proceeding is not to condemn personal property, and the buildings, etc., could only be affected by it when they became legally a part of the soil to which they are attached, so as to pass with the title to it, as realty."

Rule in Massachusetts.

In Massachusetts the rule seems to be that the value of fixtures in assessing damages for property taken in eminent domain proceedings can be considered only in so far as they enhance the market value of the property. Edmands v. Boston, 108 Mass. 535; Allen v. Boston, 137 Mass. 319; Williams v. Com. 169 Mass. 364, 47 N. E. 115. In Williams v. Com. supra, it was said: "So far as the improvements come within the description of fixtures, they also, as between the Commonwealth and the parties owning or interested in the land and building, must be regarded, till severance at least, as part of the real estate. . . . There is nothing to show that they have been severed, or that they were not included in the taking. If they were included in the taking, then, of necessity, they must form a part of the market value of the land and building taken, and the petitioner gets all that he is justly entitled to, under the statutes or otherwise, when he receives the income of property whose value has been arrived at by taking them into account, though they may not have been regarded as enhancing it."

It has been held that where a wharf was taken under the right of eminent domain the damages which a lessee could recover for the loss of "tenant's fixtures" was the damage caused by being forced to vacate the premises before the expiration of the lease, the tenant having had the right to remove the fixtures but failing to do so. Emery v. Boston Terminal Co. 178 Mass. 172, 59 N. E. 768, 86 Am. St. Rep. 473. In Sheehan v. Fall River, 187 Mass. 356, 73 N. E. 544, the statute involved provided for the payment of damages sustained by the alteration of the grade of a street. The petitioner was the owner of a building on land held under a ground lease. A settlement had been made between the condemnor and the owner of the land for damages resulting to the property, but in the settlement nothing was paid for the injury to the petitioner's property. The court, in holding that the petitioner was entitled to damages, said: "The settlement made with the landowner did not include her damages, for he asserted no title to the building, which could have been removed at any time before her estate terminated, and she is not precluded from recovery on the ground that it had become a part of the realty. . . . On principle no sufficient reason appears why the owner of a building of the description, and held under the conditions disclosed by the report, and where it is agreed that substantial damages have been sustained by a change of grade in a public way on which it abuts, should not be treated as between herself and the public as possessing a sufficient interest in real estate to enable her to maintain a petition under the terms of a statute broad enough to include compensation. . . . We are of opinion that the words 'all damages sustained' in the statute under consideration, when applied to a change of grade in an established public way, should be held to compensation for injuries caused to a building located on the line of the street, and substantially annexed to the soil, though as between the owner of the fee and the owner of the building it is a tenant's fixture which may be removed, and thus give the petitioner a remedy to recover the damages she has suffered." JOHNSON ET AL.

WHILDEN.

North Carolina Supreme Court—May 30, 1914.

166 N. Car. 104; 81 S. E. 1057.

Judgments — Personal Judgment against Nonresident.

Despite the ordinary rule that no judgment in personam can be recovered against a nonresident, except upon appearance, unless personally served within the jurisdiction, a valid judgment may be obtained where the property of a nonresident is attached, in which case the court may, for the purpose of adjudicating the rights to the property, consider claims against the nonresident.

Attachment — Property Subject — Equitable Interest in Land.

Under Revisal 1905, §§ 767, 784, providing that the officer to whom a warrant of attachment is directed and delivered shall take into his possession the personal property of the defendant, and shall levy on so much of the real estate of the defendant as prescribed for executions, an attachment can be levied only upon property subject to execution; and hence an attachment upon the equitable interest of a nonresident defendant in lands held in trust is void, and will not support any judgment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Executions — Property Subject — Land Held in Trust.

Land held in trust for the defendant is not subject to sale under execution.

Judgments — Matters Concluded — Jurisdictional Facts.

Where a judgment in personam against a nonresident was sought to be sustained on the ground that property interests of the nonresident had been attached, the judgment is not conclusive upon the validity of the attachment for, if the attachment were invalid, the court had no jurisdiction.

Taxation — Notice of Redemption — Sufficiency.

A tax deed issued is not valid where the notice of the time for redemption was not published in accordance with Revisal 1905, § 2903, requiring such notices, and was not directed to the trustee, in whose name title was held, even though the purchaser's affidavit showed his knowledge of the fact of the trust.

Judgments — Conclusiveness — Failure to Appeal.

Where plaintiff, who held land as trustee, did not appeal from the judgment in a suit to remove a cloud from his title, he is concluded by the verdict which found that defendant was the owner of the equitable interest of plaintiff's cetui que trust.

Appeal from Superior Court, Graham county: CARTER, Judge.

Action to remove cloud on title. Fred S. Johnson et al., plaintiffs, and H. B. Whilden, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. MODIFIED.

[105] Civil action to remove cloud from title to certain lands situate in Graham County, N. C.

On the hearing, it was properly made to appear that grants for the land in question were taken out by one D. F. Goodhue, in his own name, and he having died, the legal title thereto descended to his son, Willie F.; that the Tuckaseegee Mining Company et al. instituted suit in Superior Court of Graham County, alleging that the lands had been paid for with company's money and same taken and held for the company's benefit, and, on the facts in evidence, it was, at Fall Term, 1900, among other things, decreed that Willie F. Goodhue held the lands in trust for the Tuckaseegee Mining Company, and same should be conveyed by him to one Jacob S. Burnette, as trustee for said company, in terms as follows: "It is further considered, ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court, that Jacob S. Burnette be and he is hereby appointed a trustee with full power [106] and whose duty it is to hold the legal title to said tracts of land herein described, with full power to sell said tracts of land at private sale upon such terms as he may think best and to convey the title to the same to the purchasers of the same by deeds in fee simple, and out of the proceeds of such sales to first pay off and discharge indebtedness of the Tuckaseegee Mining Company incurred both before and since the bringing of this action, and to pay over to the stockholders any surplus which may remain in his hands after discharging said indebtedness of the Tuckaseegee Mining Company, according to the respective holdings." And it was adjudged that the decree in question should operate as a conveyance of title on the trusts above stated.

Jacob S. Burnette having died, this present plaintiff, by decree of Superior Court, February, 1911, was duly appointed his successor in office, "to carry out and discharge the trust imposed upon the lands therein mentioned and to execute and perform any and all duties devolving upon the original trustee by said judgment of 1900.

In this decree it was found as one of the pertinent facts that the trustee, Burnette, had made a valid contract to sell the land to one M. E. Cozad, and that the same was outstanding and existent in favor of said bargainee, and reference was made to the claim of defendant in said land and to the proceedings by which same had been acquired, but no decision was made on the validity of the claim.

On the part of the defendant, it was shown that A. M. Frye, having a claim for services against the Tuckaseegee Company for legal services rendered to said company in 1903, instituted an action against it and J. S. Burnette, trustee, under and by virtue of the decree aforesaid, to Superior Court of Swain County, and not being able to obtain personal service of process on the company within the jurisdiction of the court or on the trustee, who was a nonresident, sued out an attachment in the cause and had same levied on the lands in controversy as the lands of the defendants, the Tuckaseegee Company and Burnette, trustee and having also caused publication of the summons and warrant of attachment to be made and filed his complaint [107] alleging that the company was indebted to him for legal services in the sum of $2,500 and that he had caused attachment to be issued and levied in the cause.

At July term, Swain Superior Court, no answer having been filed or appearance made, the issue of indebtedness was submitted to the jury and the following verdict rendered: "Are defendants indebted to plaintiffs for legal service? If so, what amount? Answer: $1,500, with interest from 7 August, 1903." And, on the verdict, after reciting the recovery, the levy of attachment, etc., it was adjudged, the present writer presiding, that defendants had been duly served with process, and, further, as follows:

"It is further considered, ordered, and adjudged by the court that the defendants, the Tuckaseegee Mining Company and J. S. Burnette, trustee, are indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $1,500, with interest on the same from 7 August, 1903, for legal services.

"It is further considered, ordered, and adjudged by the court that the several tracts of land above described, which were levied on by the sheriff of Graham County under the warrant of attachment, be condemned and sold for the payment of this judgment, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the same, with costs, and that execution issue on this judgment to the sheriff of Graham County, N. C., commanding such sale."

On execution issued, said lands were sold and purchased by A. M. Frye and deed taken from the sheriff in ordinary form, etc., referring to attachment proceedings, judgments, etc., bearing date May, 1905, and A. M. Frye and wife, by deed, with special warranty, bearing date 7 May, 1906, conveyed to defendant, H. B. Whilden, all the right, title, interest, and estate of said A. M. Frye, etc.

Defendant further offered in evidence a deed from J. A. Ammons, sheriff and tax collector, reciting a sale of lands for taxes, same having been listed in the name of the Tuckaseegee Mining Company, and failure to redeem, etc., conveyed the land to defendant, the deed dated 13 June, 1907; also an affidavit by defendant to the effect that the land having been listed for taxes in the name of the Tuckaseegee Company, and failure to [108] pay, same had been sold and purchased by defendant for $89.74, amount of taxes due, etc., and not being able upon diligent inquiry to find either the Tuckaseegee Mining Company or J. S. Burnette, the trustee, in Graham, and there being no tenant or agent of the company residing on the lands, etc., defendant had caused a notice to be published in the Cherokee Scout, a newspaper in an adjoining county, there being none published in the county of Graham, in form as follows:

To the Tuckaseegee Mining Company:

Take notice that at a sale of real estate for nonpayment of taxes, held on 7 May, 1906, in the town of Robbinsville, the following real estate was sold by J. A. Ammons, sheriff and tax collector of said county, to wit: 4,130 acres, more or less, listed in the name of the Tuckaseegee Mining Company, said lands lying in Yellow Creek Township, Graham County, being the lands embraced in State Grants Nos. 3529, 3530, 3543, 3423, 3521, 3528, 3519, 3518, 3530, 3526, 3527, 3532, 3531, 3533, 3522, 3534, 3535, and 3520, which said lands were sold for the taxes due for the year 1905, amounting to $89.74, including the cost of sale, at which sale the undersigned became the purchaser of said land.

The owner of said land will take notice that the time of redemption of said lands will expire on 7 May, 1907.

This 8 January, 1907. H. B. WHILDEN, Purchaser.

The court charged the jury, if they believed the evidence, to answer the issues as shown, and the following verdict was rendered:

1. Is the plaintiff, Fred S. Johnston, the owner of the lands described in the complaint, as trustee for the purpose set out in the decree of Spring Term, 1906, of Graham County Superior Court, in the case of Tuckaseegee Mining Company v. Willis F. Goodhue et al.? Answer: Yes.

2. Has the defendant, H. B. Whilden, any interest in said lands? Answer: No, except as to the equitable interest of the Tuckaseegee Mining Company under the decree aforesaid.

[109] Judgment on the verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Beyson & Black for appellant.

Zebulon Weaver and T. A. Morpew for appellees.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts):—It is now the well settled principle that no valid judgment in personam can be obtained against a nonresident or other for an ordinary money demand except on personal services of process within the territorial jurisdiction of the court or unless there has been proper acceptance of service or a general appearance, actual or constructive, by which the party submits his cause to the court's jurisdiction. The position is modified, or, rather, a different rule obtains, where in such an action, duly instituted and on attachment issued, there has been a valid levy of property of defendant in the jurisdiction, bringing the same within the custody of the court, in which case the question of indebtedness may be considered and determined in so far only as the value of the property may be made available in satisfaction of the claim by sale under final process or further decree in the cause; beyond this value, no judgment in personam may be entered or enforced. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 565, and 9 Rose's notes thereon, pp. 338-39 et seq.; Warlick v. Reynolds, 151 N. C. 606, 66 S. E. 657; Bernhardt v. Brown, 118 N. C. 701, 24 S. E. 527, 715, 36 L.R.A. 402.

These and other authoritative decisions are to the effect that a court may acquire jurisdiction by publication of the summons to hear and decide suits to fix the status of property situate within its territorial jurisdiction or to determine the rights or interest of parties therein, when the action is brought and prosecuted directly for that purpose.

An interesting and instructive case of this kind appears in 134 U. S. 316, 10 S. Ct. 557, 33 U. S. (L. ed.) 918; Arndt v. Griggs, that being an action to quiet title to realty, and the principle has been frequently recognized and applied in this jurisdiction, as in Bernhardt v. Brown, supra; Vick v. Flournoy, 147 N. C. 209, 60 S. E. 978, an action to redeem land under a mortgage, and Lawrence v. Hardy, 151 N. C. 123, 65 S. E. 786, 134 L.R.A. (N.S.) 976, a suit for partition, etc.

[110] It will be noted that when the action is one in personam and the jurisdiction is dependent solely on the attachment, there must be a valid levy on the property, and where, as in this State, this writ is only regarded as process ancillary to the main or ultimate relief sought, unless the statutes regulating the matter otherwise provide, there can be no valid levy except on property which can be made available by sale under final process, and while the North Carolina statutes have very much extended the scope and vigor of the writ in reference to real estate, there has been no change as to the character of the property liable to levy and sale, made by the statute, but, on perusal of sections 767 and 784, it appears that the writ, both in reference to the species of property and as to the levy and ultimate sale, is to be regarded as in the nature of an execution. This being true, it is the recognized position here and in other States having statutes of like purport, and both before and since the existence of our present civil procedure, that an attachment can only be levied on property which could be levied on and sold under execution, as the final process in the cause. Post-Glover Electric Co. v. McEntee-Peterson Engineering Co. 128 N. C. 199, 38 S. E. 831; Davis v. Garrett, 25 N. C. 459; Gillis v. McKay, 15 N. C. 172; Courtney v. Carr, 6 Ia. 238; Burns v. Lewis, 86 Ga. 501, 13 S. E. 123; Hillman v. Werner, 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 586; Lane v. Marshall, 1 Heisk. (Tenn.) 30; and see note in 11 Ann. Cas. 669, on case of Pelzer Mfg. Co. v. Pitts, 76 S. C. 349, 57 S. E. 29, at page 669; Drake on Attachments, sec. 235; Shinn on Attachment, p. 415.

In the case before us it appears that the suit of A. M. Frye against the Tuckaseegee Mining Company and its trustee was one strictly in personam to recover a sum for legal services rendered the company. No personal service was obtained upon either defendant, and the only basis of jurisdiction is the levy of an attachment on real property held by J. S. Burnette, one of the defendants in trust, to "sell, make title to purchasers by deeds in fee, and of the proceeds to pay, first the indebtedness of the Tuckaseegee Mining Company incurred both before and since the bringing this action, and to pay over to the stockholders any surplus, etc., etc."

[111] Under our statutes, and decisions construing same, such an interest is not the subject of levy and sale under execution. Mayo v. Staton, 137 N. C. 670, 50 S. E. 331; Tally v. Reed, 72 N. C. 336; McKeithan v. Walker, 66 N. C. 95. Nor could there be any valid levy made thereon under the ancillary process of attachment, and according to the authorities heretofore cited, and the principles they uphold and illustrate, the judgment in case of Frye v. Manufacturing Co. was a nullity, and no title passed to the purchaser at the sale under final process in the cause.

It is urged for defendant that plaintiff and those under whom he claims are concluded by the judgment entered in the cause, which establishes the indebtedness, declares the land levied on subject to same, and adjudges that the interest of defendants be sold and applied to payment of the judgment. The position would be undoubtedly correct if the court had jurisdiction of the parties and had acquired any right to consider and pass upon the interest of the defendants in that suit; but the action was not one quasi in rem and in which plaintiff sought to establish his debt and enforce his right against the property as a cestui que trust, or one of them, under the terms of the deeds. It was, as we have seen, a suit strictly in personam, and there having been no personal service of process on either defendant within the jurisdiction, and the levy on the attachment being of no effect, the property not being liable to service under that process, the court was entirely without jurisdiction to establish any debt in favor of plaintiff or to determine in any way the rights or interests of the nominal defendants. And the claim under and by virtue of the alleged tax title is without merit.

The affidavit filed by the purchaser shows that he was fully aware that the property was owned by J. S. Burnette, the trustee, and the notice, made an exhibit in the record, not only does not purport to give notice to the trustee, the owner, but there is nothing in the record to show that the publication was made either on the dates or the number of times required by section 2903 of the Revisal. In several recent decisions of the Court it has been held that the requirements imposed by this and cognate sections of the statute must be strictly complied with, and [112] that a failure on the part of the purchaser to give the proper notices to the owner would avoid the deed. Rexford v. Phillips, 159 N. C. 213, 74 S. E. 387; King v. Cooper, 128 N. C. 347, 38 S. E. 924; Thomas v. Nichols, 127 N. C. 319, 37 S. E. 327.

Under the principle established by these and other decisions of like kind, we must hold, therefore, that the tax deed is void, and carries no title to the purchaser. It may be well to note that the verdict on the second issue seems to establish by correct interpretation that defendant is owner of the beneficial interest of the Tuckaseegee Mining Company, under the decree establishing the trust, and plaintiff, not having appealed, is concluded by such finding, and the judgment below will be so far reformed as to declare and adjudge that such interest is had and owned by defendant. The costs of appeal will be paid by appellant.

Modified and affirmed.

Equitable Interest in Real Property as Subject to Attachment.

Introductory, 786.

General Rule, 787.

Interests Subject to Attachment, 787.

Interests Not Subject to Attachment, 789.

Introductory.

This note discusses the right to attach an equitable interest in real property. The cases dealing with the liability to attachment of an equitable interest in personal property, are treated in the note to Pelzer Mfg. Co. v. Pitts, 11 Ann. Cas. 665.

General Rule.

As a general rule, an equitable interest in real property is subject to attachment. Pratt v. Law, 9 Cranch, 456, 3 U. S. (L. ed.) 791 (construing Md. Statute); Fish v. Fowlie, 58 Cal. 373; Davenport v. Lacon, 17 Conn. 278; Laclede Bank v. Keeler, 103 Ill. 425; Wallace v. Monroe, 22 Ill. App. 602; Bullene v. Hiatt, 12 Kan. 98; Shanks v. Simon, 57 Kan. 385, 40 Pac. 774; Louisville Bank v. Barrick, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 51; Campbell v. Morris, 3 Har & McH. (Md.) 535; Wright v. Franklin Bank, 59 Ohio St. 80, 51 N. E. 876; Tucker v. Denico, 27 R. I. 239, 61 Atl. 642. And see Travis v. Topeka Supply Co. 42 Kan. 625, 22 Pac. 991; Aldrich v. Boice, 56 Kan. 170, 42 Pac. 696; Kentucky Northern Bank v. Nash, 1 Handy (Ohio) 153. Compare Lowry v. Wright (decided under previous statute) 15 Ill. 95; Warner v. York, 25 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 310. In Louisville Bank v. Barrick, supra, the court said: "But the proposition that an equitable interest in real estate owned by a non-resident is not subject to levy and sale under a general attachment is not maintainable. The provision of the Code mainly relied on by counsel for the appellee is as follows: 'An order of attachment binds the defendant's property in the county, which might be seized under an execution against him, from the time of the delivery of the order to the sheriff, in the same manner that an execution would bind it; and the lien of the plaintiff is completed upon any property or demand of the defendant, by executing the order upon it in the manner directed in this article.' (Sec. 223.) Now, it is clear that this section was intended to apply two classes of property: First, such property as might be seized under execution; and, second, any other property or demand of the defendant which is not liable to seizure under execution. The attachment binds the first class in the same manner that an execution would bind it; the lien of the plaintiff upon the second class is completed by executing the order upon it. It would be singular that the framers of the Code should have provided for a lien upon a demand of the defendant, and should have made no provisions for a lien on an equitable interest in land, or on any other property not subject to execution. In the entire chapter regulating attachments, it is evident that the word property is used in its most comprehensive sense, and is intended to embrace everything of value belonging to the defendant which by any mode of proceeding might be subjected to the payment of his debts. The plaintiff may have an attachment against the property of the defendant. (Sec. 221.) Subsequent sections—especially sec. 228—show that the word is intended to comprehend—1. Real property; 2. Personal property, capable of manual delivery. 3.

Other personal property, including debts, demands, stock in a corporation, etc., etc. The words 'real property' mean lands, tenements, and hereditaments (sec. 858); and can it be doubted that the holder of an equitable title of lands, for which the purchase money has been fully paid, is the owner of land within the meaning of the law, and, as such, liable to the summary proceeding by attachment? But furthermore, by section 474, the plaintiff in an execution returned, no property found, may institute an action for the discovery of any money, chose in action, equitable or legal interest, and all other property to which the defendant is entitled. And in such action the plaintiff may have an attachment against the property of the defendant similar to the general attachment provided for in chapter 3 of title 8. (Sec. 476.) These provisions provisions demonstrate that equitable interests must be regarded as property, and that they are subject to levy under a general attachment. There is no escaping this conclusion."

In Tennessee, it has been held that an equitable interest in real property is attachable, but only by the process of a court of equity. Lane v. Marshall, 1 Heisk. (Tenn.) 80; Hillman v. Warner, 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 586.

Under the Nebraska statute, it has been held that where the interest of the attachment debtor in real estate is purely equitable, uncoupled with possession, an attachment cannot be validly levied on that interest. Shoemaker v. Harvey, 49 Neb. 75, 61 N. W. 109. And see Westervelt v. Hage, 61 Neb. 647, 85 N. W. 852, 54 L.R.A. 333.

In New York, it has been held that an attachment is leviable only on legal interests and does not extend to equitable interests. Fiske v. Parke, 77 App. Div. 422, 79 N. Y. S. 327. Compare Higgins v. McConnell, 130 N. Y. 482, 29 N. E. 978.

Interests Subject to Attachment.

The interest of the vendee under a contract for the sale of real property is attachable. Thus in Fish v. Fowlie, 58 Cal. 373, the court said: "Fowlie had not the legal title to the land. He had nothing more than an interest derivable under a contract of sale made on the 15th of June, 1875, between himself and one W. J. Gunn, who was the legal owner. By that contract Gunn contracted to convey the land to 'Fowlie, his heirs or assigns,' upon payment of a balance of unpaid purchase money 'on or before the 15th of September, 1876.' No personal obligation was given by Fowlie for the payment of the purchase money; and it does not appear that Fowlie obtained possession under the contract, or that he was in possession at the time of the levy or sale. Yet he had agreed to purchase the property, and had paid part of the purchase money, and covenanted to pay the balance at a stipulated time; and he thus became vested with such an equitable interest in the land as was the subject of sale or transfer by himself; or of appropriation by execution, or in any other mode prescribed by law, by his creditors. And in Higgins v. McConnell, 180 N. Y. 482, 29 N. E. 978, the court said: "The question presented by the demurrer to the complaint is whether the interest of a defendant under a contract for the purchase of the land upon which he has made partial payments, and is in possession, and entitled to a conveyance of the land upon completing his payments, can be levied upon by virtue of an attachment duly issued in an action against him in the Supreme Court. We think it can. Section 644, Code C. P., provides that the sheriff must execute the warrant of attachment 'by levying upon so much of the personal and real property, of the defendant, within his county, not exempt from levy and sale by virtue of an execution, as will satisfy the plaintiff's demand, with the costs and expenses.' This, in terms, provides for a levy upon real property, and admits of the distinction between the property itself and an interest in the property, and suggests that the authority to levy upon the real property of the defendant is no authority to levy upon the real property of another in which the defendant has only some interest less than a legal estate. But section 645 was added; it was a new provision, and declared that 'The real property which may be levied upon by virtue of a warrant of attachment, includes any interest in real property, either vested or not vested, which is capable of being aliened by the defendant.' The interest of the defendant under this contract for the purchase of the land comprises the actual possession, the right of possession, and the right to acquire the right of property. It is a valuable interest, and is alienable." But see Sheehy v. Scott, 128 Ia. 551, 104 N. W. 1139, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 365. The interest of a debtor who holds a contract for the conveyance of real property may be attached, but not if he has assigned the contract to a bona fide purchaser before attachment. Lambard v. Pike, 33 Me. 141. While any of the purchase money remains unpaid, the vendor has a beneficial estate in the lands to that extent, and this equitable interest is subject to attachment. Coggeshall v. Marine Bank Co. 63 Ohio St. 88, 57 N. E. 1086.

In Wallace v. Monroe, 22 Ill. App. 602, in holding that an equitable estate for life, was attachable, the court said: "It cannot be doubted, we think, that at the time of the service of the writ of attachment, Mrs. Wallace had an equitable estate for life in the land in question. Said land was conveyed to the trustee to be held by him in trust 'for the sole and separate use of the said Celia Whipple (now Mrs. Wallace) during her natural life.' Language could scarcely have been chosen manifesting more clearly an intention to vest Mrs. Wallace with the entire equitable estate for life. While the legal estate was conveyed to the trustee, the entire beneficial interest was given to her. The subsequent portions of the deed contain various provisions directing and regulating the manner in which the trust was to be executed, but they in no way change the character of the interest vested in Mrs. Wallace as an equitable estate in the land. There can be no doubt then that her interest in said land was an equitable interest or title within the meaning of the Attachment Act, and that it was subject to attachment."

The interest of a cestui que trust in real property is attachable. Davenport v. Lacon, 17 Conn. 278. Compare Fiske v. Parke, 71 App. Div. 422, 79 N. Y. S. 827.

In Cecil Bank v. Snively, 23 Md. 253, wherein it appeared that the property, though nominally sold to a certain person, was in fact purchased for two others, who paid the purchase money in so far as it was paid at the time, and also paid the installments subsequently falling due, it was held that the latter had an attachable interest in the property to the extent of the payments made by them, as the facts established a resulting trust in their favor.

In Atwater v. Manchester Sav. Bank, 45 Minn. 341, 48 N. W. 187, 12 L.R.A. 741, the court, while holding that, a reversion in land was a legal estate and therefore subject to attachment, said obiter that, had it been an equitable interest it would have been attachable. The court said: "At common law the rule undoubtedly was that a mere equitable estate in land could not be sold on execution, for the familiar reason that courts of law did not recognize equitable estates; and could not deal with them. But a judgment creditor was not in such cases without remedy. He could file his bill in a court of chancery, which always held that, for its purposes, these equitable interests were just as much bound by the judgment as legal estates, and could be subjected to its satisfaction by equitable process; and in adjusting the conflicting rights of creditors it always followed by analogy, the rules of the common law. It is true that the courts of chancery held that the lien or right to obtain satisfaction out of the specific property sought to be subjected to sale for that purpose dated from the filing of the bill. But this was also in strict analogy with the law, for at common law the judgment was not a lien on real property, but it was the judgment creditor who first extended the land by elegit, or whose execution was first begun to be executed, who was entitled to priority; and a bill in equity to reach the property for the satisfaction of a judgment was considered as being in the nature of an equitable execution. But when the law was changed so as to make judgments liens from the date of their docketing there can be no reason why a court of equity, still following the analogy of the law, should not and would not hold that equitable interests in land were subject to the liens of judgments in the order of their priority in date."

An equity of redemption is subject to attachment. Central Min. etc. Co. v. Stoven, 45 Ala. 594; British, etc. Mortg. Co. v. Norton, 125 Ala. 522, 28 So. 31; Franklin v. Gorham, 2 Day (Conn.) 142, 2 Am. Dec. 86; Lyon v. Sandford, 5 Conn. 544; Campbell v. Morris, 3 Har. & McH. (Md.) 535; Ford v. Philpot, 5 Har. & J. (Md.) 312; Bigelow v. Willson, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 485; Reed v. Bigelow, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 281; Wiggin v. Heywood, 118 Mass. 514; Kittredge v. Bellows, 4 N. H. 424; Eastman v. Knight, 35 N. H. 561; Bryant v. Morrison, 44 N. H. 288; Templeton v. Mason, 107 Tenn. 625, 65 S. W. 25; Chandler v. Dyer, 37 Vt. 346. And see Davenport v. Lacon, 17 Conn. 278; Bacon v. Leonard, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 277. In Ford v. Philpot, supra, the court said: "It appears in itself but just, that the interest which a mortgagor has in property mortgaged by him should be liable, as well at law as in equity, for his debts, and there appears no force in the objection, that it is not at law subject to a feri facias, because it is not tangible; for the right itself, whether legal or equitable, is not tangible, but the land is; and by the sale, the interest of the party either legal or equitable, may well pass; if a legal interest, and the party in possession will not give it up, the purchaser is driven to his ejectionment; and if only equitable, to get possession he must resort to a Court of equity, where, if the sale under the feri facias passed the right, he would not only obtain the possession, but the legal estate also." Likewise, in Reed v. Bigelow, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 281, where it appeared that an equity of redemption had been sold under execution, it was held that the mortgagor had an interest remaining which he might mortgage, and that the right to redeem this second mortgage was attachable. The court said: "It was a mere equitable interest, it is true, but it was a right to redeem a mortgage of an equitable interest in real estate, and as such was made liable to attachment by the obvious construction of the statute. The right of redeeming the first mortgage, and that of redeeming the second, were distinct rights, and the sale of one was not inconsistent with the sale of the other; for although the whole legal estate passed by the first sale, an equitable interest remained, which might be mortgaged, and being mortgaged, was subject to the right of redemption; and there seems no good reason why such a right, when it is deemed valuable, may not be taken in execution for the benefit of creditors." And see Clark v. Austin, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 528. In Godfrey v. Monroe, 101 Cal. 224, 35 Pac. 761, it appeared that the owner of land conveyed the same by a deed of trust, authorizing the trustee to sell the same and out of the proceeds to pay the indebtedness of the grantor to an improvement company. The trustee subsequently executed a deed thereof to the improvement company, but as part of the same transaction the grantor trustee and improvement company entered into an agreement providing that as soon as the grantor's indebtedness was paid out of the receipts of the sale of the lands, the improvement company should deed to the grantor the balance of the property remaining unsold. It was held that the second deed and the agreement accompanying the same constituted a mortgage with a power of sale and that the interest of the mortgagor in the property thus conveyed was subject to attachment. In Herndon v. Pickard, 5 Lea (Tenn.) 702, it was held that the right of a person whose land had been sold under judicial sale to redeem the same, was such an estate or interest as could be reached by attachment.

Interests Not Subject to Attachment.

A levy of attachment for a debt of a grantor is ineffectual where the property has been conveyed, even though the deed has not been recorded. Plant v. Smythe, 45 Cal. 161; Cox v. Milner, 23 Ill. 476; Kelly v. Mills, 41 Miss. 267. See also Dumas v. Geer, 144 Mich. 377, 108 N. W. 84; Morrison v. New Haven, etc. Min. Co. 143 N. C. 250, 55 S. E. 611.

In Adams v. Mills, 126 Mass. 278, it was held that the right to redeem land from a tax sale was not an interest which was attachable in an action at law.

In Crocker v. Pierce, 31 Me. 177, in holding that an attachment was ineffectual against subsequently acquired property, the court said: "The purpose of an attachment upon mesne process is simply to secure to the creditor the property which the debtor has at the time it is made, so that it may be seized and levied upon in satisfaction of the debt, after judgment and execution may be obtained. The title to the property remains unchanged by the attachment. An attachment can operate only upon the right of the debtor existing at the time it is made. No interest subsequently acquired by the debtor can in any manner be affected by the return thereof, when none was in him at the time. If the levy of an execution would not be effectual to pass any title to the creditor at the time of the return of the attachment upon the original writ, the latter could have no effect."

In Garlick v. Robinson, 12 Ga. 340, it was held that the defendant had no interest in land subject to attachment where the title to the land was still in the state. The court said: "The defendant in execution had no interest in the land which the subject to levy and sale. All the interest he had in it, was the equitable right to acquire a title by paying the grant fees and taking a grant. That was not done at the time of the sale. The state had not at that time parted with the title. She had the sovereign right to it. The subjecting of the land to lottery was in the nature of a contract between the state and the drawer; by virtue of which, the state retaining the title, consented to convey it to the drawer, upon payment of a certain sum as a grant fee. The payment of this fee was a condition precedent to his getting a title. Whilst that was unpaid, he had no title; it was still in the state—nor had he an interest in the land, springing out of any advances, or money expended. His only right was the right to acquire a title by fulfilling a prescribed condition. That right, it is perfectly obvious, is not such an interest as was the subject-matter of a levy."

In Grover v. Fox, 36 Mich. 453, in holding that at common-law a contingent right to a conveyance was not attachable, the court said: "We then come to the other interest, the contingent right to a conveyance. This was not a legal interest. It was a mere equity, and incapable of being held by levy at common law. If liable to be subjected upon attachment and execution, it could only be so through compliance with the statute for supplementing the levies by proceedings to ascertain and determine the interest seized,—sec. 4628, C. L. The right was not proceeded against, however, as an equity." In Young v. Young, 89 Va. 675, 17 S. E. 470, 23 L.R.A. 642, it was held that a contingent remainder in real property, which was a mere possibility, was not attachable. And in Kendall v. Gibbs, 5 R. I. 525, it was held that a contingent equitable interest in real property, under an express trust, was not attachable. But see Wood v. Watson, 20 R. I. 223, 37 Atl. 1030.

In the reported case, it is held that an interest in land held by a trustee for the purpose of sale, the proceeds of which are to be applied first to the payment of the indebtedness of a certain company and the surplus to be paid to the stockholders of the company, is not such an interest as is the subject of levy and sale under an attachment.

The purchaser of an equity of redemption sold under execution has no attachable interest in the same during the year in which it may be redeemed. Thornton v. Wood, 42 Me. 282; Rogers v. Wingate, 46 Me. 436.

In Kidder v. Orcutt, 40 Me. 589, it was held that the interest which an execution creditor had in the lands on which he had levied his execution, before the expiration of a year from the date of his levy, the time allowed by statute for its redemption, was not subject to attachment.

In Chase v. York County Sav. Bank, 89 Tex. 316, 36 S. W. 406, 59 Am. St. Rep. 48. 32 L.R.A. 785, it appeared that the persons furnishing the money to purchase land, caused to be vested in a trustee the "absolute title" to the property with full power of sale, and provided that the word "trustee" as used in the deed with reference to him, should not have the ordinary effect of limiting his title or right to sell, but that he was to be trustee "for the purpose only of accounting for the proceeds arising from any sale or sales of said lands or any part thereof," and that he "should not be released from his personal obligation to account to each of them and to their assigns for the proceeds of any sale or sales of said lands or any part thereof according to their respective interests in such proceeds." The court said: "It is clear that it was the intention of all parties to so place the entire title, legal and equitable, to the land in the trustee that it would be absolutely beyond the control of either of the cestui que trusts, such cestui que trust to have only the right to demand an accounting of the trustee. The legal effect of the arrangement was to leave in each cestui que trust, not any title legal or equitable in the land, but a mere right in equity to demand an accounting of the proceeds of the sales of the land. Doubtless a court of equity would, in certain contingencies not contemplated by or provided for in the agreement of the parties, such as fraud on the part of the trustee, or a total failure of the objects contemplated by the trust, such as inability to sell the land for sufficient to defray probable expenses, or any other state of facts justifying dissolution of the trust, treat this mere equitable right of demanding an accounting under the agreement, as entitling each cestui que trust to a participation in the division of the trust property itself upon such dissolution; but in the absence of such a contingency equity could not recognize the cestui que trust as having any interest in the land, as such, without doing violence to the lawful agreement by which the cestui que trust and the trustee respectively restricted and regulated the rights of each party interested in the trust and without which it probably would not have been created. We have found no case holding such an interest subject to execution and to so hold would be going beyond the authorities."

In Piatt v. Oliver, 2 McLean 267, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11, 116, wherein it appeared that the legal title to certain lands was in the government, and that the trustee held only an equity, subject to the equities of her cestui que trusts, the court said: "There is believed to have been no statute or rule of decision in the territory at the time, which made such an interest liable, at law, to the claims of creditors. And, by the rules of the common law, we think it could not be levied on by an execution or an attachment."

BROOKLYN HEIGHTS RAILROAD COMPANY

v.

STEERS ET AL.

New York Court of Appeals—November 10, 1914.

213 N. Y. 76; 106 N. E. 910.

Street Railways — Power to Construct Side Tracks.

Where a street railroad company's franchise does not grant the right to construct spur tracks connecting with private property abutting on the street on which the tracks are laid, such right cannot be conferred by a license issued by the city's engineer of highways.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A license issued by a city's highway engineer to a street railway company authorizing it to construct a spur track connecting it with private property, even if lawful in its origin, is a revocable privilege, and is revoked by a resolution of the board of estimate and apportionment directing the railway company to remove the siding, and by the revocation of the permit by the president of the borough.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under Const. art. 3, § 18, and Railroad Law (Laws 1890, c. 565) art. 4, §§ 90-93, and amendatory statutes prescribing the matters requisite for the granting of a street railway franchise, a franchise to maintain and operate a street railroad "across, along and upon" a certain avenue and other connecting streets does not confer on the railroad company the right to construct and maintain a spur track leading from its main track in the street to abutting private property for the sole benefit of the owner and the railway company.

[See note at end of this case.]

Construction of Franchise.

A franchise granted to a street railway company must be construed strictly against the grantee.

[See 12 R. C. L. tit. Franchises, p. 194.]

Brooklyn Heights R. Co. v. Steers, 158 N. Y. App. Div. 948, affirmed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Second Judicial Department.

Action by Brooklyn Heights Railroad Company, plaintiff, against Alfred E. Steers et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants at Special Term of Supreme Court. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

[78] CARDOZO, J.—The plaintiff, a street railroad corporation, has built a spur between its main tracks and a factory held in private ownership. The city of New York has ordered that the spur be removed. The question is whether it constitutes an illegal obstruction of the highway.

The Arabol Manufacturing Company is a corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of paste and similar products. It has a factory at 56 Nostrand avenue, Brooklyn. The spur or siding in controversy connects this factory through a curved turnout with the tracks in the centre of the street. It was built in 1904 by the plaintiff, the Brooklyn Heights Railroad Company, under a permit issued by the chief engineer of highways in the borough of Brooklyn. Shipments of the Arabol Manufacturing Company's products are made to its customers through the use of this siding. Shipments of goods purchased by the company are made through the same means. That is the extent of its use. The finding is that the station at 56 Nostrand avenue is not a public freight station, but a private one, maintained for the use and convenience of the Arabol Manufacturing Company exclusively.

The case of Hatfield v. Straus, 117 App. Div. 671, 102 N. Y. S. 934, 189 N. Y. 208, 82 N. E. 172, though similar in some of its features, is not decisive of this controversy. In that case the city of [79] New York had granted to R. H. Macy & Co. a license to lay a siding in the highway. R. H. Macy & Co. was not a street railroad corporation. It held no franchise empowering it to operate a railroad in the city's streets. In the language of this court: "no railroad applied for the consent in question, and no right was granted to any such corporation." The consent did not constitute, and was not claimed to constitute, a franchise. The question, therefore, was whether a license to maintain tracks in the city streets could lawfully be granted to a business corporation, and it was that question which this court then answered in the negative.

We are confronted in this case by a different problem. Here it is a street railroad corporation, holding a lawful franchise to occupy the city streets, which is before the court, insisting upon its right to maintain the siding, both by force of the license granted to it in 1904, and, irrespective of the license, as an incident to its franchise to operate its road. Recognizing the force of the distinction, as we do, we think it does not avail to make the obstruction legal.

The plaintiff's argument that it is lawfully in the highway by force of express license, apart from its rights under its franchise, may be answered in a few words. If the franchise does not carry with it the right to lay these tracks, no license granted by the engineer of highways can enlarge the plaintiff's powers. That conclusion follows as a necessary deduction from the decision in Hatfield v. Straus (supra). A license, moreover, even if lawful in its origin, is a revocable privilege. (Lincoln Safe Deposit Co. v. New York, 210 N. Y. 34, 103 N. E. 768, L.R.A.1915F 1009; Gushee v. New York, 42 App. Div. 37, 48, 58 N. Y. S. 967.) By resolution of the board of estimate and apportionment, the plaintiff has been directed to remove the siding, and the president of the borough, under the authority of that resolution, has revoked the permit. The force of the license has thus been spent.

[80] The question then remains whether the franchise to operate a street railroad carries with it the right to maintain spur tracks for such a purpose. We hold that it does not. We assume, as we did in Hatfield v. Straus, 189 N. Y. 216, 82 N. E. 172, that street railroads have the power to transport merchandise as well as passengers. We are concerned at this time, not with the things to be carried, but rather with the path of carriage. The statutes have surrounded the grant of franchises to street railroad corporations with many safeguards and limitations. (Constitution, art. 3, § 18; Railroad Law, L. 1890, ch. 563, art. IV, sections 90, 91, 92, 93, and amendatory statutes.) The route must be described; the consent of owners must be obtained; in default of consent, there must be an approval by commissioners appointed by the court; these and like conditions must be satisfied before a valid franchise can be obtained. To describe a route as passing along or through a stated avenue does not give notice to the public that offshoots will connect the tracks with the property of abutting owners. If the plaintiff under the franchise to maintain a railroad "across, along and upon" Nostrand avenue and other connecting streets, had the right to construct a siding between its tracks and the factory of the Arabol Manufacturing Company, it had an equal right to construct a siding between its tracks and every other factory. There would then be a network of lines that would engross the highway. It is incredible that property owners consenting to the presence of a street railroad could have contemplated the grant of such a franchise. The presence of spurs over which cars are run into a building, from which at times they suddenly emerge, is a serious obstruction to travel, and a menace often to the safety of the traveler. A railroad corporation cannot deduce from words of general or uncertain import a privilege so extraordinary. "It is elementary law that public grants must be strictly construed against the grantee." (Lincoln [81] Safe Deposit Co. v. New York, 210 N. Y. 34, 103 N. E. 768, L.R.A.1915F 1009.) We are not dealing here with a situation akin to the one considered in Brooklyn Heights R. Co. v. Brooklyn, 152 N. Y. 244, 46 N. E. 509. There the spur was necessary to enable the railroad to connect with a storehouse for its cars, without which its line could not be operated at all. Undoubtedly the grant of a street railroad franchise carries with it by implication the right to maintain sidings and switches under those conditions. The point of the decision was that there was a reasonable necessity for the connecting tracks in order to permit the railroad to discharge its duties to the public. We cannot find that the use of this siding bears a relation so direct and necessary to the fulfillment of the plaintiff's functions as to bring it by fair implication within the scope of the grant.

The case of Clarke v. Blackmar, 47 N. Y. 150, is without application to the facts before us. It held that, under the charter of the city of Buffalo the common council had the power by apt words of grant to authorize a connection between a private grain elevator and the main tracks of a railroad. The court found that in view of the extent of the business done by the railroad as a common carrier upon the connecting line, the purpose was a public one. It was a question of the power of the common council to make the grant. It was not a question of the interpretation of a grant already made. We are not required at this time to say that a franchise which distinctly authorized the construction of sidings such as the one complained of, would be illegal. It is enough at this time for us to hold, as we do, that no such franchise has been granted.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Willard Bartlett, Ch. J., Werner, Chase, Collin, Hogan and Miller, JJ., concur.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.Power of Street Railway to Construct Side Tracks.Without Direct Legislative Permission.

Whether a street railway company has the power to construct side tracks depends largely on the wording of the particular statute, ordinance or franchise under which the company is operating. For that reason the courts have not been able to lay down a definite rule on the subject. However, it has been held generally that where a street railway company is duly enfranchised or authorized to construct its line and operate its cars through certain designated streets, it has the implied power to construct side tracks or turnouts which are necessary to the maintenance of the road. Powell v. Macon, etc. R. Co. 92 Ga. 209, 17 S. E. 1027; Romer v. St. Paul City R. Co. 75 Minn. 211, 77 N. W. 825, 74 Am. St. Rep. 455; Stroudsburg v. Stroudsburg Pass. R. Co. 2 Pa. Dist. 35, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 124; Wyoming v. Wilkes-Barre, etc. R. Co. 8 Kulp (Pa.) 113; Wilkes-Barre v. Coalville Pass. R. Co. 8 Kulp (Pa.) 298; Houston v. Houston Belt, etc. R. Co. 84 Tex. 581, 19 S. W. 786. Thus in Powell v. Macon, etc. R. Co. supra, it was held that a street railway company which had been enfranchised to construct its line across, along, and on certain streets, etc., was impliedly authorized to construct a spur track in connection with the operation of the line. The court said: "Every electric railway needs a power-house and a shed for the storage of its cars when not in use, and of course, has a right to erect the same at a convenient place or places. They cannot be located in the streets of a city, and yet would be useless to the company unless connected with its main line. These things being so, we think the General Assembly intended that this company should have the right to construct along the street of a city a suitable spur-track for this purpose, and that the language of the charter is sufficient to effectuate this intention. To deny the right in question would be to practically prevent the company from having a power-house and car-shed within the limits of the city, and force it to erect these structures outside of the corporate limits, a result which, in our opinion, could not be reached under a fair and reasonable construction of the charter." In Brooklyn Heights R. Co. v. Brooklyn, 152 N. Y. 244, 46 N. E. 509, affirming 18 N. Y. S. 876, it appeared that a street railway company was authorized to operate its line through a certain street and to construct a storehouse with the necessary sidings, switches, etc., the location of the car barn or store house being subject to certain restrictions. The nearest practicable car barn was 1270 feet away. The court held that the company could construct the spur or connecting tracks from the main line to the power house.

But in Concord v. Concord Horse R. Co. 65 N. H. 30, 18 Atl. 87, wherein it appeared that the charter of a street railway company gave it permission to construct its road on approval of its plans by the governing body of the city and the abutting property owners, the court held that while a turnout or switch was impliedly authorized to be constructed, it could not be constructed without the sanction of the mayor and council and the abutting owners. The reported case, while recognizing the rule that a street railway company is impliedly authorized to construct such side tracks, turnouts, etc., as are incidental to the proper maintenance and operation of the road, denies to the railway company in question the right to construct a side track connecting with a private factory and not necessary to the operation of the road, in the absence of express statutory or municipal authorization. To practically the same effect as the reported case is the decision in Percy v. Lewiston, etc. R. Co. 113 Me. 106, 93 Atl. 43, wherein it was held that a street railway company could not extend a turnout or switch for the purpose of enabling a private corporation to run its freight cars over the street railway line and to connect with a railroad depot. The court said: "Lastly, the plaintiff contends that, even if the defendant has the authority to transport property in steam railroad freight cars, it has no right to use the public highway as a switching yard, and that it is not entitled to a turnout for that purpose, nor for the purpose of affording a standing place for cars. We think the contention is sound. Streets are subject only to public uses. They are made to travel in. They are not made as places for public trade or business, except business necessarily incidental to travel. They are made to enable the public, on foot, in carriages, or carts, or cars, with or without their wares and merchandises, to pass and repass. For these public uses the public has compensated the owner of the land, has constructed the road, and maintained it. To permit the transportation of passengers and freight along the way is not an additional use, but an extension of the use for which the way was laid out. But to permit the way to be used for the mere business convenience of persons or corporations would be a perversion of its proper use. It might be convenient for the defendant to use the street as a switching or shifting place for its motors and cars. It might be that its business would be facilitated thereby. But a public way was not constructed, and is not maintained, for that purpose."

Some courts have adhered to the view that specific authorization is necessary to permit a street railway company to construct side tracks. Thus in Irvine v. Atlantic Ave. R. Co. 10 App. Div. 560, 42 N. Y. S. 1103, it was held that a street railway company had no authority to construct a siding or side track unless expressly authorized by the city authorities. In that case it appeared that a street railway company, incorporated under the general railroad act, while engaged in repairing its tracks constructed a side track or turnout. This the court declared to be unauthorized, saying: "We assume, however, that under the General Railroad Act the company would have power to construct necessary sidings or turnouts, provided it obtained authority therefor from the city authorities. But such authority was a necessary prerequisite, for by sections 23 and 28 of the General Railroad Act neither could a railroad be constructed within a city, nor its location therein be changed, except by the consent of the corporation or common council; that, at least, this company could not exercise such a privilege without that consent is apparent, for section 2 of the act of 1870, granting the original franchise, provides that 'the road shall be subject to the same laws and ordinances of the city of Brooklyn as apply to horse railroads generally in said city.' Section 2, article 9 of the ordinances of the city of Brooklyn directs: 'No permit shall be granted to any railroad company for the purpose of laying any railroad tracks, sidings, switches or turnouts in the streets or avenues of said city, except upon the consent of this common council.' It is not claimed by the defendant that any such consent has been obtained from the common council." In Specht v. Central Pass. R. Co. 68 Atl. 785, affirmed 76 N. J. L. 631, 72 Atl. 356, it appeared that the defendant street railway company, was enfranchised as a single track railway under a statute providing for the construction of street railways if the consent of the abutting property owners was procured. It was held that a resolution of the city council authorizing the construction of turnouts from the track, was sufficient to authorize the railway company to build same, and that it was unnecessary to obtain the further consent of the abutting property owners. The court said: "The putting in of turnouts on a single-track road does not operate to change it to a double-track road to any extent, for turnouts are a necessary part of a single-track system. Without them the company would be limited in its operation to the running of one car back and forth upon its road, for there would be no place where cars running in opposite directions could pass one another. The power of the governing body of a municipality to authorize incidental changes in the character of a street railway, without public notice and hearing, and without the consent of abutting property owners, has been affirmed by this court in the case of Moore v. Haddonfield, 33 Vroom 386." But in that case, because of a defect in the regularity of the resolution, in that it was not submitted to the mayor, for his approval, the entire resolution was declared a nullity and the construction of the turnouts was held to be unauthorized. In Denison v. Denison, etc. R. Co. 103 Tex. 344, 127 S. W. 804, reversing 119 S. W. 115, it appeared that a street railway line, authorized by the terms of its franchise to construct double tracks but not a switch without the consent of the city, built a double track for a short distance which connected two ends of a single track and was virtually a switch or passing track. This the court held was not permissible, saying: "In Houston, etc. R. Co. v. Campbell, 91 Tex. 551, 45 S. W. 2, 43 L.R.A. 225, the meaning of the word 'switch' was presented for decision. The object of the suit was to recover penalties for a refusal or failure of the railroad company to furnish cars at 'Campbell's switch,' to be loaded with wood for transportation. In passing upon the question Chief Justice Gaines for the court defined the word 'switch' as follows: 'A switch is a mere sidetrack, so constructed as to permit the passage of cars from and to the main-track; and it is a matter of common knowledge that railroads have many switches where freight is neither received nor discharged.' This definition of a switch conforms to the testimony of the experts introduced by the city in this case and also conforms to the common knowledge of men with reference to the ordinary use of that word. . . . We are of opinion that independent of all parol evidence the very terms of the contract itself are of such definite character as to make it susceptible of but one construction, which is, that the double tracks permitted by the contract were to consist of two independent tracks, just what the language means, so as to accommodate the service of the railroad upon that street. The provisions of the contract absolutely forbid the idea that such arrangements of the rails as is represented in the design presented here should be considered 'double tracks.'" In Davis v. International R. Co. 89 Misc. 489, 152 N. Y. S. 88, it was held that a street railway company could not operate a "Y" in connection with the operation of its road in such a manner as to become a private nuisance to abutting property owners.

Under Legislative Permission.

Where there is express legislative sanction for the construction of side tracks by a street railway company, the courts have generally pursued a policy of liberal construction in enforcing the rights of the company. Thus in Eastern Wisconsin R. etc. Co. v. Hackett, 135 Wis. 464, 115 N. W. 376, rehearing denied 135 Wis. 501, 115 N. W. 1139, it appeared that a street railway company had been authorized by a city ordinance to construct switches or turnouts on a bridge over which the street cars were operated. Subsequently this bridge was torn down and a new bridge was erected and the city passed an ordinance prohibiting the erection of switches or turnouts on the new bridge or its approaches. The court held that this was an unreasonable regulation in view of the circumstances of the case, and that the traction company had the right to maintain its turnouts on the new bridge, saying: "It is no answer to this to say that the city had power, by the enactment of reasonable regulations, to compel the removal of this turnout or passing track from the bridge whenever the public interest demanded such action. Conceding the power, still it must be exercised reasonably and impartially, and an unjust or oppressive or partial exercise of such power cannot be justified merely upon the plea that the city determined that the time had arrived when the public interests demanded such action. Such determination is not conclusive because it goes to the reasonableness of the regulation in question. Such a regulation might be reasonable at one time or under one set of circumstances, and unreasonable at a time or under circumstances when it made havoc of private interests. It is a somewhat prevalent error that property devoted to public use and subject to public regulation is thereby quite out of law, or, as Blackstone says, caput lupinum. The use of such property is subject to regulation and subject to interference by the public authorities with the dominion of the owner to a far greater degree than private property because of its quasi-public character and because of the tendency to abuse or extortion in its use and management. But subject to this limitation the owner of such property has the same rights in his property as any other owner. He may insist upon his own price therefor, except as against the power of eminent domain. He may insist upon all the advantages of location and all the advantages of existing contracts so long as he does not run counter to reasonable and lawful regulations concerning the use of such property. So the Winnebago Traction Company had, as against the Eastern Wisconsin Railway & Light Company, the right to exact such compensation as it could obtain from the latter for using the east track in question in crossing Main-street bridge. And the latter company has the right to refuse it if it considers the same excessive, and by the law now existing to resort to condemnation proceedings. But the city had no right to intervene in such an exigency and in effect annul and take away such rights of the Traction Company, even if the public interest did require that the passing track or turnout be removed from the bridge, because such exercise of its police power would be unreasonable under the circumstances above shown." In Taylor v. Erie City Pass. R. Co. 37 Pa. Super. Ct. 292, wherein it appeared that a street railway company was authorized by a charter granted by the state to erect a single track street railway and the necessary turnouts, a subsequent extension of a switch from 253 feet in length to 360 feet in length was said to be reasonable exercise of the authority granted the railway company. To substantially the same effect see Detroit Citizens' St. R. Co. v. Board of Public Works, 126 Mich. 554, 85 N. W. 1072, wherein it was held that a street railway company authorized to construct all necessary and convenient tracks for turnouts, was not limited to the construction of such turnouts as were necessary at the time of the passage of the ordinance, but that it could lay out such turnouts or side tracks as the growth of the road called for. In State v. Hartford St. R. Co. 76 Conn. 174, 58 Atl. 506, it was held that a street railroad company which was authorized to construct a double track road and switches according to a certain plan, could locate a switch at a spot different from the one specified in the plan. In Cape May, etc. R. Co. v. Cape May, 58 N. J. L. 565, 34 Atl. 397, it was stated that where an ordinance permitted the laying of turnouts and sidings in connection with the construction of a street railway line, the city could not pass an ordinance condemning a small variation in the construction of the turnouts, without giving the company notice and an opportunity for hearing.

But in Harner v. Columbus St. R. Co. 11 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 807, 29 Cine. L. Bul. 387, it was held that a street railway company which originally constructed certain turnouts and switches under a franchise for the construction of its road, could not extend the switches without an additional franchise. The court said: "The question presented is whether or not a street railway company, under the authority granted to construct a street railway, and having exercised that right by laying its track, and constructing such switches or turnouts as were then deemed sufficient for its operation, can afterward extend and enlarge these switches without further municipal authority, and without obtaining the consent of abutting lot owners who may be affected by the alteration. We are clearly of the opinion that it cannot, and that neither the consent of the city authorities to change its motive power from horses to electricity, nor the assumed demand of the public for increased facilities for travel, furnishes any ground for the exercise of such right. . . . It was contended by counsel for defendant that the right to make these extensions was incident to the grant conferred to construct its track in the first instance, and the implied authority to construct such switches or side-tracks as were necessary or convenient for the proper exercise of its franchise, and especially so, under its right to operate its cars by electricity, as subsequently conferred by the city council, inasmuch as the company had the right to have constructed such switches as it now purposes to construct, in the first instance if they had been deemed necessary and convenient. Whether this is so or not, we hold that it was within the contemplation of both the city and the company under the franchise then conferred, that the company should construct its railway and switches in the manner in which they were then constructed, and having done so, it cannot make a substantial change in their location and construction, by extending its switches several hundred feet without first acquiring a new grant, and obtaining the consent of a majority of the property owners who may be affected by the proposed extension, any more than a railroad company can relocate its road, after it has once been located and constructed, and for manifest reasons—principal among which is the fact that many persons may have purchased lots and built houses, for business or residence, and made improvements with reference to this road as already located and constructed." And in Rapid R. Co. v. Mt. Clemens, 118 Mich. 133, 76 N. W. 318, wherein it appeared that a street railway company was authorized by a city to construct a "Y" on its line on condition that it should be removed later if so required, it was held that the company must observe this condition and remove the switch when ordered by the city to do so.

v.

BLEASE ET AL.

South Carolina Supreme Court—April 21, 1914.

97 S. Car. 303; 81 S. E. 668.

Civil Rights — Who Is "Colored" Person.

In view of Const. art. 3, § 33, declaring void the marriage of a white person with a negro or mulatto having one-eighth or more negro blood, the child of a union of a white person and one having less than one-eighth negro blood is entitled to exercise all the legal rights of a white man, except those arising from a proper classification, when equal accommodations are afforded.

[See Ann. Cas. 1912D 457.]

Schools — Separate Schools for White and Colored Children.

While the child of a white person and one having less than one-eighth negro blood is entitled to exercise the rights of a white man, in view of Const. art. 3, § 33, authorizing the marriage of such persons, school trustees, under Civ. Code, 1912, § 1761, subd. 3, providing that the trustees shall have authority and it shall be their duty to suspend or dismiss pupils when the best interest of the schools make it necessary, may, upon providing a school for children of this class, distinct from both the white and negro schools, suspend such child from the white schools when for the best interest of the other white pupils, who would be withdrawn if it was allowed to remain, notwithstanding section 1780, declaring that it shall be unlawful for pupils of one race to attend the schools provided for another, and Const. art. 11, § 7, providing for separate schools for whites and negroes.

Original petition for certiorari. G. W. Tucker, petitioner, and Cole L. Blease et al., constituting Board of Education, respondents. PETITION DISMISSED.

[304] The petition was as follows:

"The petition of the undersigned, G. W. Tucker, respectfully shows to the Court:

I. That the Honorable Cole L. Blease, by virtue of his office, J. E. Swearingen, D. M. O'Driscoll, C. J. Ramage, D. W. Daniel, A. G. Rembert, Lueco Gunter, D. T. Kinard and A. J. Thackston, are, and constitute the State board of education in and for the State of South Carolina, and at the times hereinafter mentioned, were performing their duties and acting in their capacity as members of said board.

II. That heretofore, to wit, on or about the 24th day of January, 1913, the wards of your petitioner were, and for a number of years prior thereto had been, in attendance upon the white schools in and for the county of Dillon, and were in such capacity pupils on the date mentioned, in the Dalcho public school, in said county, when they were, without cause, summarily dismissed from the said school and prohibited from further attending the same.

III. That thereafter, to wit, on the 20th day of January, 1913, your petitioner filed his petition with the county board of education in and for the county of Dillon, asking that his said wards be reinstated in said school, and be allowed to attend thereon, a copy of which petition is as follows:

"The petition of the undersigned, George W. Tucker, respectfully shows to the board:

I. That Dalcho public school is a school duly formed and organized under and by virtue of the public school law of the State of South Carolina, and John W. Coleman, Lawrence E. Dew and J. F. Williams, are the duly appointed and acting trustees thereof. That your petitioner has been duly appointed guardian, by the probate Court for Dillon county, of the person and estate of the above named children, Herbert Kirby, Eugene Kirby and Dudley Kirby, being fourteen, twelve and ten years of age, respectively. And at the present time and since such appointment he has had the children in his custody and charge.

[305] II. That upon the said children becoming old enough to enter the public schools of the State they immediately began attendance at the white public schools. The older one, Herbert Kirby, attending the white public school at Dothan, in the county of Dillon, for a period of about two sessions; that about four years ago the parents of the said children moved to the town of Dillon and the said children attended the public school for white children in the town of Dillon for two sessions; that upon the death of the parents of the said children your petitioner, as guardian, took them to live with him and placed them in the public school for white children at Dalcho, which said school they have been attending for two sessions and a part of the third.

III. That the wards of your petitioner have been attending the said public school at Dalcho during the present session; that they have always properly conducted themselves, and were in the proper pursuit of their duties as pupils of the said school up to and inclusive of Friday, January the 24th, when the said children were by the trustees above named summarily and without cause and without the children or guardian being given a hearing, dismissed from the school and notified that they would not be received back into the school.

IV. That the said children are entitled to attend the said school; that they have all the time been properly dressed, have properly conducted themselves, and there was no excuse for their being dismissed; that they are of the age that it is of the utmost importance that they should attend school to prepare them for their duties in life; that there is no other convenient school to which your petitioner can send the said children and by their being disbarred from the said school great and irreparable damage and injury will be done to them.

Wherefore, your petitioner prays, that this board do issue its order requiring the said John D. Coleman, Lawrence E. Dew and J. F.

Williams, constituting a board of trustees for [306] Dalcho public school, to show cause before your honorable board why the said children should not be forthwith reinstated in the said school. G. W. Tucker. Gibson & Muller, Petitioner's Attorneys."

Which petition was duly verified, and thereupon the county board issued its order authorizing and directing the board of trustees to show cause why the relief prayed for should not be granted.

IV. That the said cause came on for a hearing and the testimony was taken, upon the conclusion of which the said board filed their decision thereon, sustaining the acts of the board of trustees in dismissing the wards of your petitioner, but requiring the said trustees to furnish school facilities for children of the class to which it was claimed the wards of your petitioner belonged.

V. That within the time provided by the rules of the State board of education your petitioner duly appealed from the finding of said board, and asked that the same be reversed upon the following grounds, to wit:

(I) "Because the county board was in error in holding that according to the testimony produced at the hearing, the board of trustees of Dalcho public school district had the power and authority under the law to dismiss from the said Dalcho public school the wards of petitioner, Herbert Kirby, Eugene Kirby and Dudley Kirby.

(II) Because the county board of education was in error in holding that section 1761 of vol. I, of the Code of Laws of South Carolina of 1912, gave the said trustees power and authority in their discretion to dismiss or suspend from the public school without legal cause any child or children. The error being that the law distinctly provides for a school for the races, white and black, shall be separate, and there being no testimony in the case at bar sufficient to establish the fact that the children in question were the children of the colored race, and there being no testimony showing, or tending to show, that the children in question acted improperly or disobeyed [307] the rules and regulations of the school, they had the right to attend the white public school, and the action of the board in dismissing them was arbitrary and not in accordance with law.

(III) Because the county board of education was in error in holding and finding that the return of the trustees in this proceeding shows that the action taken by them was for the best interest of the school district and that the allegations of the return were sustained by the testimony. The error being that the testimony shows conclusively that there was no reason why the said children themselves should have been dismissed, but, on the contrary, shows that they were children of good behavior and intelligence, and there was no valid reason why they should have been so dismissed.

(IV) Because the law of the State of South Carolina with regard to the free public school provides that separate schools shall be maintained for the white and colored races, and the testimony shows conclusively that the children did not belong to the colored race, but were white and associated with white people. Their dismissal from the school, therefore, amounts and amounted to a denial to them of the benefit of the public school guaranteed to all by law, and the board was in error in not so holding.

(V) Because the testimony shows that the children in question own considerable property in the county and pay taxes thereon, including the school taxes levied in the district, and hence have the right to enjoy the benefit to be derived therefrom, and the county board of education was in error in sustaining the action of the trustees of the school district in depriving them of this right.

(VI) Because the board were in error in holding and providing that the trustees should provide separate educational facilities for the wards of petitioner and other children of like situation in the district, the error being that the testimony shows that there are only a very few, or no other children, of the same class, as the wards of petitioner, in the [308] district and such facilities could not be put into practical operation, and hence amounts to nothing more than depriving the children of their rights under the law.

(VII) Because the Constitution provides that any person with not over one-eighth of negro blood in him shall be in contemplation of law a white person and entitled to the privileges of such person, and the statutes provide that white children shall attend the white school, and the testimony showing that the children in question here were white and were of proper character to attend the white school, it was error on the part of the board to sustain the trustees of the school district in depriving them of this right.

(VIII) Because the uncontradicted testimony shows that the parents of the wards of petitioner have always associated with white people, that the father owned in his lifetime considerable property in the county and exercised all the privileges of white citizenship; that both parents were members of the first white Baptist church of Dillon; that some of the children were members of that church and others of Catfish Baptist church, also a church of white people; that the children have been attending the school in question for several sessions; that some of them attended the white public school in the town of Dillon, and other white schools in the county; all of which establishes conclusively that the children were recognized as and associated with white people, and the board was in error in not so finding and in refusing to allow them to re-enter the school.

(IX) Because the testimony shows that on several occasions the trustees of the school district have attempted to provide what they designate as separate facilities for education of children of a class alleged to be of the same class as the wards of petitioner, but in such attempts have resulted in failure, and if petitioner's wards have no other opportunity of obtaining the rights of a school to which they are entitled they will be entirely deprived of their rights and required to grow up in ignorance.

[309] (X) Because there is no sufficient testimony to sustain the action of the board of trustees, such testimony as was offered being largely from the trustees themselves and tenants on their farms and from few, if any, of the landowners in said school district, all of which shows mere arbitrary action on the part of the trustees not supported by the public sentiment of the community, and the county board was in error in not so holding."

VI. That upon the hearing of said cause by the said State board of education, the said board, without making any formal written decision in the matter, notified your petitioner, through his attorneys, that the said finding of the county board was affirmed and the appeal was, therefore, dismissed.

VII. Your petitioner further respectfully submits that the State board of education erred as a matter of law in holding and deciding:

(1) That the county board of education was not in error in holding that according to the testimony produced at the hearing the board of trustees of Daleho public school district had power and authority under the law to dismiss from the said Daleho public school the said wards of your petitioner.

(2) In holding that the said county board of education was not in error in finding that section 1761 of vol. I of the Code of Laws of South Carolina of 1912, gave the said trustees power and authority, in their discretion, to dismiss or suspend from the public school without legal cause any child or children when the error was clear, in that the law distinctly provides for a school for the races of white and black, and that they shall be separate and distinct, and there being no testimony in the case sufficient to establish the fact that the children in question were children of the colored race, and there being no testimony tending to show that the children in question acted improperly or disobeyed the rules and [310] regulations of the school, they had the right to attend the white public school.

(3) That the State board erred in not finding the county board of education in error in holding and finding that the return of the trustees in the proceeding shows that the action taken by them was for the best interest of the school district, and that the allegations of the return were sustained by the testimony; the error being that the testimony shows conclusively that there was no reason why the said children themselves should have been dismissed; but, on the contrary, shows that they were of good behavior and intelligence, and there was no valid reason why they should have been dismissed.

(4) Because the State board of education erred as a matter of law in holding that the trustees of school districts in any district could provide as many white or colored schools as they saw fit and could require any pupil in said district to go to any specific school without regard to the rights, convenience or qualifications of said child.

(5) Because the Constitution provides that any person with not over one-eighth of negro blood in him shall be in the contemplation of law a white person and entitled to the privileges of such persons; and the statutes provide that white children shall be entitled to attend white schools, and the testimony showing that the children in question were white and of proper character to attend the white schools, and it was, therefore, an error, as a matter of law on the part of the State board of education, to sustain the trustees of said school district in depriving the said children of this right.

(6) Because the uncontradicted testimony shows that the parents of the wards of the petitioner have always associated with white people; that the father owned, in his lifetime, considerable property in the county and exercised all the rights and privileges of white citizenship; that both parents were members of the first white Baptist church of Dillon; [311] that some of the children were members of that church and others of Catfish Baptist church, also a church for white people; that the children have been attending the school in question for several sessions, and some of them attended the white public school in the town of Dillon and other white schools of the county; all of which established conclusively that the children were recognized as and associated with white people, and it was an error of law on the part of the State board of education to hold, when both under the Constitution and by association, that the said children were white, that they were not entitled to attend the white schools in said district.

(7) Because the State board erred in sustaining the finding of the county board that separate school facilities should be provided for the children in question, when the testimony shows conclusively that no such facilities could be provided, and that the school in question which the children had been attending was most convenient and most beneficial for them, and in so sustaining the said finding deprived them of the rights to which they are entitled under the law.

VII. The petitioner further shows, that because of the errors of law above set forth, his wards have been deprived of their legal rights, and he has no other remedy save and except that this Court grant to him a writ of certiorari to the said State board of education, directing the said board to send up the record in said cause to the Supreme Court of the State of South Carolina to review the same as provided by law.

Wherefore, your petitioner respectively prays that a writ of certiorari be issued out of this Court to the said State board of education to the end that the Supreme Court of the State of South Carolina may be informed of all of the proceedings had in said matter, and may investigate the legal questions arising therein and determine the same in accordance with law. Geo. W. Tucker, Petitioner. Gibson & Muller, Attorneys of Petitioner."

[312] The synopsis of the testimony prepared by petitioner's attorney is as follows:

"John D. Coleman, being duly sworn, says: 'I am chairman of the board of trustees, and have held the position for about 14 years; that the facts set up in the petition are true; that the matter was brought to the attention by other children in the class attempting to come in and the petition that was filed with the trustees. The names to the petition are citizens of the community and patrons, and I know a majority of them personally. Upon the petition being filed, we called a meeting of the board of directors. Every phase was gone over, and we decided it was for the best interest of the school to dismiss them. The children nor their guardian were notified until the day they were dismissed. We had a talk afterwards with Mr. Tucker, and gave the reason for dismissal, "that the children were not white." Mr. Tucker stated that they had never been considered anything but white. It is generally known that they are not pure Caucasian blood. I knew their father for 22 or 23 years, but have only seen the children going to and from school. If these children were allowed to attend school others of the class would seek to come in, and our position was that we could not exclude others without these. Since I have been a member of the board of trustees, the trustees have been paying the tuition of children of this class anywhere they could get in school. We also established a separate school, had three teachers, one taught 2 or 3 years, and the other two a year each. The last one stayed only a week. It was not successful, and we decided to adopt the old plan. We are willing to establish a separate school. There are 10 or 12 in the class.'

"On cross-examination, he testified that they were neither white nor black, but were Croatan or mulatto. 'In dismissing them we did not investigate what mixture of blood was in them. We didn't have to do that. I have known that they are mixed for 20 years, from what I have heard people [313] say. I knew the mother of John Kirby and his brothers and sisters; most of them were only half brothers and sisters. John Kirby was the oldest of these children. Eliza Foxworth was their mother. John Godbolt was the father of John Kirby, but I could not give the lineage further back. The alleged taint in the blood came in through the Godbolts, there being two separate and distinct families of this name. From John's appearance we judge that the mixture was not very far back. These children have the appearance of white children. We had general information on which we acted in reaching this conclusion. I am a member of Catfish Baptist church, of which some of the Kirby children are members. George Tucker is not a member of this church, but goes there some time. Mr. Tucker owns some property in the school district. The children own in the county a tract of land containing 300 acres, and perhaps own some property in the town of Dillon. This is the third session they have been in school, and I have never heard of them giving any trouble. They are always properly clad as far as I know, and are average pupils. Ed Kirby went to Daleho school about 10 years ago. It has been at least 3 years since we have attempted to have a separate school. No provision was made for these children except that we offered them the same chance we made others.'

"On redirect examination, he testified that John Kirby had sisters and half brothers who associated with him who were not white. 'Mrs. Kirby had one half brother and sister who were colored. John Kirby associated with colored people. We told Mr. Tucker if he could get enough children of this class we would build another schoolhouse. As there seemed to be such a few, it would not justify us to do so. He said he would help us, but would not patronize it. Some years ago people of this class has a space set apart for them in Catfish Baptist church, as did also the negroes. We told Mr. Tucker on more than one occasion that we had raised no objection to his children. I have had John Kirby [314] work for me, and have associated with Mr. Tucker in a business way. I have known Mr. Tucker to have one of the half brothers to live with him and work for him. There are 80 some odd children in the Daleho district and 10 or 12 of this class. When these children first entered, because of Mr. Tucker, we thought it a business thing to do to let them go to school, unless their going would in some way become detrimental. We finally decided it was not for the best interest, because other children of the class would come in. Four others attempted to enter, some of whom were a good deal darker. We thought it was not best that the Kirby children should attend school, as the patrons would not want their children raised up with them.'

"J. F. Williams, being sworn, testifies: 'I have lived in this community for 18 years, and have been a trustee since last spring. I know the Kirby children and knew their father. I have always heard that he was not clear-blooded. Mr. Coleman's statement of the situation in the matter is correct. I was not on the board when these children were originally admitted. I had a talk with Mr. Tucker, and told him why we had dismissed the children, on account of their ancestry, associations, and reputation in the community. I am willing to provide another school for children of this class. No such provision has been made. The petition did not mention the Kirby children. I have heard that John Kirby owned a good deal of property in the county. I know Ed Kirby, the oldest child, and all of the children are practically of the same appearance. We did not act from appearance; so far as I know, these children have always properly behaved. They have been going to school for several sessions, and are ordinary pupils. George Tucker is a white man. The Kirby children attend Catfish church. The action taken was decided by the reputation and petition. Some of the brothers and sisters of John Kirby could not be considered white. They sometimes associated together. I think it would be detrimental to the school to reinstate them. [315] Sam Edwards carried the petition around. He had a brother who killed John Kirby. I do not know of these children associating with negroes.'

"L. E. Dew, being sworn, says: 'I have been a trustee of the school for two or three years. We considered the matter carefully when we dismissed the children. We were led into the action by frequent objections raised to these children and by others attempting to come in. I know the signers of the petition, and, to the best of my knowledge they are patrons of the school. Objections were made besides the petition. I had a talk with Mr. Tucker, and explained to him why the children were dismissed, which was because they had the reputation of not being pure-blooded. John Kirby had the same reputation. He had some brothers and sisters who had more colored blood in them than white blood. I do not know whether they associated together or not. I am willing to make provisions for these children. I think it would be detrimental to the school to allow them to be reinstated. A separate school was established, but the teacher came down and refused to teach. There were two or three of these attempted schools, but the attempts have never been successful, owing to the fact that the patrons will not stick together. We did not give their guardian a hearing. So far as I know they have always conducted themselves properly. I did hear a report that one of the children carried a pistol to school, but no investigation was made, and I have never heard of any other misconduct. We didn't have any special kick against these children. John Allen, who is not a patron of the school, made some complaint, as did Sam Edwards, who carried the petition around. I think it was mentioned by others, who claimed that we were not properly exercising our office in allowing these children to remain in school on account of their color, reputation, and family. Mr. Tucker is a white man, and owns property in the district. I have never heard of the children exercising any bad influence in school. Mrs. Tucker is an aunt of the [316] children. As a result of the reinstating of the children there would be a wholesale resigning of the trustees and a tearing up of the school. I think the only teacher we could get to teach a separate school would be one of their class.

"Chancellor Hatchell, being sworn, says: 'I have lived in the school district about 14 months, and the reputation of the Kirby children is that they are not white. I objected to these children attending school because they were not clear-blooded. I do not know the ancestry of John Kirby, but by his looks he was not pure white. His boy Ed is as white as any one in the room. I heard from my children of their rowing once. Never heard of them breaking any rules in the school and of them being punished for conduct. I don't know who was to blame for the row. If the children were reinstated, I would take my children out of school and put them to work. I do not own any land, but live on a rented place.'

"Will Baxley, being sworn, says: 'I am one of the patrons of Dalcho school and object to the Kirby children going back, because they are not white. I do not own any property in the district, but run a share crop for Mr. Coleman; am his brother-in-law. Pay $8.50 taxes in Dillon and $5 in Marion. If these children were put back, I would keep mine at home and let them plow. My objection to the children is that people say they are not white. One of them cut my boy's coat about two years ago. I don't know how or who was to blame. Mine might have been. I have never heard of them being punished at school, and, as far as I know, they are good pupils.'

Ann. Cas. 1916C.—51.

"S. T. Godbolt, being sworn, says: 'I knew Mrs. Kirby. She lived below Marion and had three brothers, who admitted that they were colored. They associated with her before she was married. She was the daughter of Liza Foxworth. She was a white woman. I am no kin to John Kirby. I did not know anything about Mrs. Kirby after she [317] was married; she moved away. I never heard of her or her children associating with negroes.'

"Ben Foxworth, being sworn, says: 'I am a half brother to Mrs. Kirby. We resided in Marion county together. She was a white woman.'

"Henry Kirby, being sworn, says: 'I am a half brother of John Kirby. We had the same mother, and were raised together. Sue Kirby was our mother. She was a white woman. John Godbolt was John Kirby's father.'

"J. E. Henry, being sworn, says: 'I am mayor of Latta, and have known John Kirby a good many years. I don't think he was considered a white man. I do not know who his father was. Sue Kirby was his mother. He associated with white people in a business way. He did not attend the white church I attended.'

"Sam Edwards, being sworn, says: 'I live in Dalcho school district; am a patron and property owner. Own some land out of the district. I took the petition around, but did not have anything to do with the killing of John Kirby, and took no part in the trial. I knew him for several years. His reputation was that he was not clear-blooded. I do not know Kirby's children, but signed the petition, for I do not think they should attend this school. It would not be for the best interest of the school to reinstate them. I dictated the petition and circulated it. I send my children to this school. I took the petition to all who would sign it. I do not know whether all who signed it had children in the school. I turned the petition over to Lawrence Dew, a member of the board of trustees. The petition was not directed at the Kirby children, who had been going to school about two years. This is the first year I have been interested in the school. I do not know how near John Kirby was a white man or whether he attended white churches.'

"John C. Hayes, being duly sworn, says: 'I have lived in this school district all of my life, and knew John Kirby before he was grown. He was not considered clear-blooded. [318] Have been patronizing the school eight or ten years, or maybe longer. Have been interested in its welfare. Am a taxpayer, and own property in the district. I signed the petition, and do not think it would be to the advantage of the school to reinstate the Kirby children. They have been attending the school for several years. I do not know of John Kirby attending a white school. I don't know John Kirby's wife, nor whether he was a member of the First Baptist church at Dillon.'

"Stephen Bethea, being sworn, says: 'I live in the district, but have no children in school. However, I am interested in its welfare. I signed the petition, and knew John Kirby for several years. He was not considered a clear-blooded white man. I do not think it would be for the best interest of the school to reinstate these children. I do not know the extent of the mixture. He associated with white people in a business way, and I have seen him at white churches. I didn't know his children were going to school until the petition was circulated. I don't remember whether Ed Kirby was attending school at Catfish when I was or not. I have seen Henry Kirby. I am a taxpayer, own real and personal property in the district.'

"G. F. Bethea, being sworn, says: 'I live in Dalcho district. Knew John Kirby, and he was considered a Croatan. I do not know what the mixture of blood was, nor whether he associated with white people, except in a business way, nor whether his children attended the white schools. Did not know his father or mother.'

"John C. Allen, being sworn, says: 'I live in this school district. Am a taxpayer, and own property in it. Have children going to school, and am interested in its welfare. I knew John Kirby, and he was not considered white. That it would be of the best interest of the school that the children be excluded. I do not remember whether John Kirby attended white schools and white churches or not, nor whether his children did so. I know his children have [319] attended the white school recently. Do not know whether they attended school at Dothan or Dillon, or whether they were members of the white churches at Catfish and Dillon. I don't know how much he lacked of being clear-blooded.'

"John C. Sellers, being sworn, says: 'I am 65 years old, son of W. W. Sellers, who wrote a history of Marion county. I helped him do the work. I knew John Kirby. His father was Big John Godbolt. He was one-eighth mixed blood. He was a soldier in the Confederate War and was badly wounded, and is now drawing a pension. His father was Long Billy Hayes, a white man. He died soon after the war. John Godbolt's mother was Martha Godbolt. Her mother was Polly Godbolt and sister of old John Godbolt, who was a white man. The family tree offered in evidence was made under my directions. I do not know who the mother of Sally Owens was. One-Arm Godbolt was the father of Martha Godbolt. He was a white man. Sally Owens was the mother of Polly Owens; she was a white woman. The mother of the Kirby children was a Foxworth; she was a white woman. The per cent. of the colored blood in the Kirby children is one-thirty-second. I knew John Kirby, and he didn't associate with negroes. I have heard that these children attended white schools and churches. My knowledge is not based entirely on tradition. I remember old John Godbolt, who died since I was married. He was my neighbor, and lived near me. I knew the Foxworth family. I did not know that John Godbolt had children who were colored. I knew Henry Kirby when he was a boy. I knew that the family was pretty badly mixed.'

"George W. Tucker, being sworn, says: 'I am guardian of the Kirby children. Live in Dalcho school district. Have had them more than 2 years. They have been attending white schools; this makes a part of the third session. Their father patronized the white schools 10 or 12 years ago, sending Ed and Lucy. I am their uncle; I married John Kirby's sister. I own a little property in Dalcho school district, and [320] the children own a plantation worth about \$15,000, and a house and lot in the town of Dillon. I have known John Kirby about 25 years. I first knew John Kirby when he was a boy. He went to school very little, but attended the white school at Kirby's Crossroads when he did go. I knew his wife, and she was said to be a white woman. What little association John Kirby had was with white people. He was a hard worker. Sent his children to Dalcho public school for 3 years about 12 years ago, and until he moved away, and then sent to Dothan white school for 5 years, and moved to the town of Dillon, where his children attended the white graded school. Six of them attended for 2 years. He and his wife were both members of the First Baptist church, and were buried by their pastor, Rev. H. A. Willis. Two of the children died while they were in Dillon, and Mr. Willis buried both of them. Ed Kirby belongs to Catfish church, which is a white church, and on the same grounds that the white school is. So far as I know, there was never any objections to the children until they were dismissed. Nothing was said to me about it until they were instructed not to return. I have seen Henry Kirby and Ben Foxworth, and they are both colored men. Henry worked for me awhile 7 or 8 years ago. He boarded in the kitchen, and ate at the table with me some of the time. I have not seen Ben Foxworth since he was a boy. I do not know Julius Foxworth, but know William, who, I think, is colored. I have been living in the Dalcho district 10 years. I have been married 22 years. My wife is a full sister of John Kirby. The property owned by the children is in the Dothan district. I talked with the trustees about dismissing the children, and told them they had nothing like an eighth ($\frac{1}{8}$) colored blood in them. I did not agree to leave the matter to the patrons. I think at the meeting the vote taken stood 13 to 1 for dismissal. All of the names signed to the petition were not patrons; 11 are. I notified some of the patrons of a meeting [321] to consider the question of reinstating the children that had been dismissed.

"Ed Kirby, being sworn, says: 'I am 20 years old, brother of the children in question. Am not now attending school, but with my brothers attended Dalcho and Dillon schools. I am a member of the Catfish Baptist church. My father and mother were members of the First Baptist church of Dillon. My sister, Lucy, who is dead, was a member of Catfish church. Mr. Willis performed the funeral rites over my father and mother.'

"H. W. Langford, being sworn, says: 'I am president of the cotton mills of Dillon, and am clerk of the First Baptist church. The membership record shows that John and Annie Kirby were members of the First Baptist church. The names of no other Kirbys appear thereon.'

"Rev. H. A. Willis, being sworn, says: 'I am pastor of the First Baptist church in Dillon, and John Kirby and wife were received by letter a short time after I came here, about four years ago. I performed the rites over them when they were buried. I am a native of Virginia, and came here from Weldon, N. C. I never hesitate to conduct funeral services. I know the Catfish church only through association acquaintance.'

[322] GARY, J.—This is an application for a writ of certiorari for the purpose of determining by what authority the trustees summarily dismissed Herbert Kirby, Eugene Kirby, and Dudley Kirby from attending as pupils the Dalcho school, of Dillon county, for white children.

The facts out of which the controversy arose, and the action taken by the county board of education, will appear from the following decision rendered by them: "On or about the 24th day of January, 1913, John D. Coleman, Lawrence [323] E. Dew, and J. F. Williams, constituting the board of trustees of Dalcho public school, dismissed Herbert Kirby, Eugene Kirby, and Dudley Kirby from the white public school of that district. This proceeding was commenced by George W. Tucket, as guardian of the above named children, by petition to this board for a rule to show cause why the wards of petitioner should not be reinstated in the white public school of the district. The rule, as prayed for, was issued by the chairman of the county board, and the trustees of said school appeared on the 14th day of February, 1913, and filed their return to the rule, on which day the hearing of the matter was commenced, and same was completed on the 24th day of February, 1913. We deem it unnecessary to discuss in detail the questions raised by the testimony. Subdivision 3 of section 1761, vol. I, Code of Laws of 1912, give school trustees the power 'to suspend and dismiss pupils, when the best interest of the school makes it necessary.' We understand, of course, that this section does not confer upon school trustees any power or authority to arbitrarily suspend or dismiss from school any child or children within their district. To the trustees of a school district is intrusted the welfare and best interests of their school, and this power to suspend or dismiss can be exercised by them in a proper case only when the welfare and best interest of such school renders such action absolutely necessary. Also the exercise of such power is always under the supervision of, and subject to review by, the county board of education, as, indeed, are all of the official acts of the trustees of a district. The return of the trustees to the rule shows, we think, that the action taken by them in this matter was for the best interest of the schools in the district. We find that all the material allegations set forth in the return are sustained by the testimony. After having given the matter careful consideration, we are of the opinion that the action of the trustees should be sustained. We think, however, proper school facilities should be provided for the wards of petitioner, and [324] all other children of the district in like situation, as soon as practicable. The return to the rule to show cause herein having been adjudged sufficient, the rule should be discharged, and it is so ordered. It is further ordered herein that the trustees of the district be required to furnish and provide proper school facilities for the wards of petitioner, along with any and all other children similarly situated within the district."

The return of the trustees shows that these children had been attending the Dalcho school two sessions prior to the session during which they were dismissed; that objection had been made at various times to their presence in the school, but, as there were no others of that class attending, the trustees had been loath to take action; that, shortly before they were dismissed, other children of the same class were attempting to enter the said school, and complaints were being made by its patrons: the trustees saw that, unless all children of that class were dismissed from the school, it would be materially injured. The return further shows that the trustees, in dismissing these children, were not actuated by any feeling of animosity towards them, but that their action was based upon what they deemed to be for the best interest of the school. They further alleged that they were ready and willing to provide a school for all children of this class in that district; that such a school had been provided in the past, but had been discontinued, because of friction among the patrons, and that, since the discontinuance of said school, the trustees had provided for the attendance of such children in other districts where they were allowed to enter the schools. The return also contains the following language: "That respondents are informed and believe that the wards of petitioners are not of pure Caucasian blood, and that this fact is generally known to the citizens of the community, and that it would not be right or proper, or for the best interest of the schools in said district, for the children to attend the white public schools, and for the further [325] reason that the environment and antecedents of the said children, and the knowledge of the public thereof, place them in a separate class from the white people of the community."

There was an appeal to the State board of education, which decided: "That the action of the Dillon county board of education be sustained, and the appeal be dismissed."

The synopsis of the testimony prepared by the petitioner's attorneys will be incorporated in the report of the case.

Section 385 of the Criminal Code, which embodies the provisions of an act passed in 1879, is as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any white man to intermarry with any woman of either the Indian or negro races, or any mulatto, mestizo, or half-breed, or for any white woman to intermarry with any other person than a white man, or for any mulatto, half-breed, negro, Indian, or mestizo to intermarry with a white woman; and any such marriage or attempted marriage, shall be utterly null and void, and of none effect; and any person who shall violate this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished."

Section 33, art. III, of the Constitution, provides that: "The marriage of a white person with a negro or mulatto, or person who shall have one-eighth or more negro blood, shall be unlawful and void."

Section 7, art. XI, of the Constitution, is as follows: "Separate schools shall be provided for children of the white and colored races, and no child of either race shall ever be permitted to attend a school provided for children of the other race."

Section 1780, Code of Laws 1912, provides that: "It shall be unlawful for pupils of one race to attend the schools provided by boards of trustees for persons of another race."

The first question for consideration is whether section 33, art. III, of the Constitution, which provides that "the marriage of a white person with a negro or mulatto, or person who shall have one-eighth or more of negro blood, shall be [326] unlawful and void," entitles the child or parents, where one of them was a white person, and the other had less than one-eighth of negro blood, to be classed as white person, in the exercise of his legal right.

The most sacred relation into which a man and woman may enter by contract with each other is that of marriage; yet the framers of our Constitution made it a part of our organic law that it should be lawful for a white person to marry another with negro blood, provided it was less than one-eighth. Such being the case, we are unable to discover any good reason why the child of such parents should not be entitled to exercise all the legal rights of a white person, except those arising from a proper classification, when equal accommodations are afforded. As, however, the right to classify is denied, the next question which naturally suggests itself for consideration is that relating to the power of classification in such cases.

We therefore proceed to determine whether the law allows a proper classification to be made between those without negro blood and those with less than one-eighth, when there is a provision for equal accommodation.

The law recognizes that there is a social element, arising from racial instinct, to be taken into consideration between those with and those without negro blood. The statutes and provisions of the Constitution hereinbefore quoted show that the law not only recognizes a classification, but makes it mandatory, and provides a penalty for failure to observe the laws in this respect, in the instances therein mentioned. The decisions prior to the abolition of slavery show that the classification between white and colored persons did not depend upon the extent of the mixed blood.

The rule was thus stated by Chancellor Harper, who delivered the opinion of the Court, in State v. Cantey, 2 Hill (S. C.) 614: "We cannot say what admixture of negro blood will make a colored person, and by a jury one may be found a colored [327] person while another of the same degree may be declared a white man. In general, it is very desirable that rules of law should be certain and precise; but it is not always practicable, nor is it practicable in this instance, nor do I know that it is desirable. The status of the individual is not to be determined solely by the distinct and visible mixture of negro blood, but by reputation, by his reception into society, and his having commonly exercised the privileges of a white man. But his admission to these privileges, regulated by the public opinion of the community in which he lives, will very much depend on his own character and conduct; and it may be well and proper that a man of worth, honesty, industry, and respectability, should have the rank of a white man, while a vagabond of the same degree of blood should be confined to the inferior caste. It will be a stimulus to the good conduct of these persons, and security for their fidelity as citizens."

The following language was used by the Court in the case of White v. Keenan, Dist. 3 Rich. L. (S. C.) 136: "It may happen that persons in equal degree from the African stock may present such different complexions and features that they would readily be assigned to different castes. Habit and education have so strongly associated with the European race the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of freedom that color alone is felt and recognized as a claim. On the contrary, a strong repugnance prevails against a participation in the rights of citizenship by any who bear in their persons the traces of their servile origin. This aversion is, however, mitigated by the deference which honesty, sobriety, and industry, and the qualities that unite in a respectable character, enforce on the mind. Whatever rules may be adopted, the question of the reception of colored persons into the class of citizens must partake more of a political than a legal character, and, in a great degree, be decided by public opinion, expressed in the verdict of a jury."

[328] In the case of Flood v. News, etc. Co. 71 S. C. 112, 50 S. E. 637, 4 Ann. Cas. 685, this Court quoted with approval, the following charge of his Honor, the presiding Judge, in Smith v. Chamberlain, 38 S. C. 529, 17 S. E. 371, 10 L.R.A. 710: "Among the citizens of South Carolina we have two distinct races. Before the law they are equal. The colored race, in our Courts of justice, stand on the same plane as the white race. Our laws bear equally on all, without regard to race, color, or previous condition. Our social conditions, however, are very different. Friends, companions, neighbors must be of our own choice. There, relations, and associations the law does not undertake to make or regulate for us. If we do not wish to associate with one class of society, there is no law that I know of which compels us to do so."

We also quote as follows from Flood v. News, etc. Co. 71 S. C. 112, 50 S. E. 637, 4 Ann. Cas. 685: "Now, it must be apparent from consulting the texts of these amendments (thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth to the Constitution of the United States), that there is not the slightest reference to the social conditions of the two races, and nothing can be imported into these amendments to give any such effect. All take pleasure in bowing to the authority of the United States in regard to these three amendments, but we would be very far from admitting that the social distinction subsisting between the two races has been in any way affected." The Court then quoted with approval the following language, used by the Court of Appeals of New York in the case of People v. Gallagher, 93 N. Y. 498, 45 Am. Rep. 232: "This end can neither be accomplished nor promoted by laws which conflict with the general sentiment of the community upon whom they are designed to operate. When the government, therefore, has secured to each of its citizens equal rights before the law and equal opportunities for improvement and progress, it has accomplished the end for which it was organized and performed all of the functions [329] respecting social advantages with which it is endowed." The Court also immediately thereafter quoted the following language from Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 16 S. Ct. 1138, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 256: "Legislation is powerless to eradicate racial instincts or to abolish distinctions based upon physical differences, and the attempt to do so can only result in accentuating the difficulties of the present situation. If the civil and political rights of both races be equal, one cannot be inferior to the other civilly or politically. If one race be inferior to the other socially, the Constitution of the United States cannot put them on the same plane."

In the case of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 16 S. Ct. 1138, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 256, the Court further says: "The distinction between laws interfering with the political equality of the negro and those requiring the separation of the two races in schools, theaters, and railway carriages has been frequently drawn by this Court. . . . A statute which implies merely a legal distinction between the white and colored races—a distinction which is founded in the color of the two races, and which must always exist so long as white men are distinguished from the other race by color—has no tendency to destroy the legal equality of the two races. . . . The object of the fourteenth amendment was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law, but, in the nature of things, it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based upon color, or to enforce social, as distinguished from political, equality, or a commingling of the two races upon terms unsatisfactory to either. Laws permitting, and even requiring, their separation in places where they are liable to be brought into contact do not necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other, and have been generally if not universally, recognized as within the competency of the State legislatures, in the exercise of their police power. The most common instance of this is connected with the establishment of separate schools for the white and colored children, which has been [330] held to be a valid exercise of the legislative power even by Courts of States where the political rights of the colored race have been longest and most earnestly enforced."

One of the earliest decisions in such cases is that of Roberts v. Boston, 5 Cushing (Mass.) 198, in which Chief Justice Shaw said: "The great principle, advanced by the learned and eloquent advocate for the plaintiff (Mr. Charles Sumner), is that, by the Constitution and laws of Massachusetts, all persons, without distinction of age or sex, birth or color, origin or condition, are equal before the law."

But, when this great principle comes to be applied to the actual and various conditions of persons in society, it will not warrant the assertion that men and women are legally clothed with the same civil and political powers, and that children and adults are legally to have the same functions and be subject to the same treatment; but only that the rights of all, as they are settled and regulated by law, are equally entitled to the paternal consideration and protection of the law for their maintenance and security."

In the case of Ex p. Plessey, 45 La. Ann. 80, 11 So. 948, 18 L.R.A. 639, the Court says: "Even were it true that the statute is prompted by a prejudice on the part of one race to be thrown in such contact with the other, one would suppose that to be a sufficient reason why the pride and self-respect of the other race should equally prompt it to avoid such contact, if it could be done without the sacrifice of equal accommodations. It is very certain that such unreasonable resistance upon thrusting the company of one race upon the other, with no adequate motive, is calculated, as suggested by Chief Justice Shaw, to foster and intensify repulsion between them, rather than to extinguish it."

While the testimony shows that the children are entitled to be classed as white, nevertheless the action of the board of trustees was neither capricious nor arbitrary, as they are willing to provide equal accommodations for the Kirby children and those in the same class with them. The testimony [331] also shows that the decided majority of the patrons would refuse to send their children to the Daleho school if the Kirby children were allowed to continue in attendance. Tested by the maxim, "The greatest good to the largest number," it would seem to be far better that the children in question should be segregated than that the large majority of the children attending that school should be denied educational advantages.

Subdivision 3 of section 1761, Code of Laws 1912, which provides "that the board of trustees shall also have authority, and it shall be their duty to suspend or dismiss pupils, when the best interest of the schools make it necessary," shows that the action of the trustees in dismissing the said children, was justified by the law of the land, and that the petition should be dismissed.

Petition dismissed.

NOTE.

Separation of White and Colored Pupils for Purposes of Education.

Introductory, 806.

In Absence of Statute, 806.

Statute Requiring Separation, 807.

Introductory.

The earlier cases discussing the question of the separation of white and colored children for the purposes of education are reviewed in the notes to Berea College v. Com. 13 Ann. Cas. 337, and Board of Education v. Purse, 65 Am. St. Rep. 312. This note presents the recent cases on the subject.

The reported case presents the novel question of the disposition for educational purposes of a child having so small a proportion of negro blood as to be entitled to the legal rights of a white person. The statutory and constitutional provisions involved provided for the establishment of separate schools for white and colored pupils and made it unlawful for pupils of one race to attend the schools provided for the other. It appeared that great dissatisfaction among the patrons of the school for white children would result from the attendance thereof of children having any negro blood. Under those circumstances the court holds that the board of school trustees were authorized to establish a third school for children of mixed blood and exclude them from the school for whites.

In Absence of Statute.

In the absence of statutory authority a school board has no power to separate white and colored children for the purposes of education. Crawford v. School Dist. 68 Ore. 338, Ann. Cas. 1915C 477, 137 Pac. 217, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 147, wherein the court said: "The question whether school districts in this state can establish separate schools for Indian children and compel them to attend such schools is not necessarily involved in this appeal, for the reason that the amended writ fails to show that school district No. 7 had provided a separate school for Indian children. However, this question was argued at the hearing, and, if the defendants should answer the writ, setting up the supposed fact that the school board had provided a separate school for Indian children and those that are partly of Indian blood, this question will then be directly involved. For this reason, and to obviate the necessity for another appeal, we will express an opinion on this subject.

The states may enact laws providing for the establishment of separate schools for colored children, whether black or red, but such schools must be equal in equipment and efficiency to the schools provided for white children; but in this state we have no statute expressly providing for the establishment of separate schools for colored children. Section 4052, subdivision 18, L. O. L., specifying the duties of school boards, says: 'They shall admit free of charge to the schools of their districts all persons between the ages of 6 and 21 residing therein, and all other persons may be admitted on such terms as the district may direct.' It is the imperative duty of all school boards of our public school system to admit to the schools within their districts all children residing therein, between the ages of 6 and 21, without discrimination as to color or race. When the state legislature has not passed an act expressly authorizing them to do so, school boards, created for carrying on the public schools of the state, have no lawful power to provide separate schools for the education of white and colored children.

There is no statute in this state expressly granting authority to school boards to establish separate schools for black or red children, and to exclude the colored children from the schools intended for white children; nor can this power be implied from any power that has been granted to school boards. We are satisfied that school boards have no such power in this state under existing laws."

In Booker v. Grand Rapids Medical College, 156 Mich. 95, 120 N. W. 589, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 447, in holding that a private institution might exclude negro students, the court said: "The statute imposes no general public duty upon respondent to admit as students any and all citizens to its capacity. There is no specific duty imposed by law to admit relators. It seems clear that private institutions of learning, though incorporated, may select those whom it will receive, and may discriminate by sex, age, proficiency in learning, and otherwise. Probably no reason need be given for refusing in the first instance to admit any student. Relators have been denied no privilege or immunity resting in positive law protected or guaranteed by the Federal or the State Constitution. Such rights as they have grow out of the relations they have established with respondent, and are no other or different than those of any citizen who has established like relations with a similar institution."

Statute Requiring Separation.

Statutes requiring or permitting the establishment of separate schools with equal educational facilities for the education of the children of different races, are constitutional. Dameron v. Bayless, 14 Ariz. 180, 126 Pac. 273; Wall v. Oyster, 36 App. Cas. (D. C.) 50, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 180; Johnson v. Board of Education, 166 N. C. 468, 82 S. E. 832, L.R.A.1915A 828; Board of Education v. Kingfisher County, 14 Okla. 322, 78 Pac. 455. See also Prowse v. Board of Education, 134 Ky. 365, 120 S. W. 307. And see the reported case. In Prowse v. Board of Education, supra, the act of the legislature involved provided that within two years after its passage there should be established, by the county board of education of each county, one or more county high schools, provided there was not already existing in the county a high school, and that, in this event, the high school might be considered as meeting the purposes of the act, without the establishment by the board of a high school. It was insisted that the act was void because it did not require a separate high school for whites and blacks, and that, if a high school was established for whites, there would be a discrimination against the blacks. The court said: "But it will be observed that the act requires the board to establish one or more high schools. The act also provides that the money derived from the taxes shall be spent by the board according to its best judgment to promote the cause of education in the county. When the board of education shall discriminate against either race, then the race discriminated against may raise that question. The act does not contemplate that there shall be any discrimination. The act is passed under the provision of the Constitution requiring the Legislature to provide an efficient system of common schools, and to maintain separate schools for white and colored children. The duty imposed by the Constitution upon the Legislature is the same as to both white and colored children, both as to separate schools and as to the efficiency of the schools. The county board holds office under the Constitution, and in discharging their duties they should administer the funds as provided by the Constitution, according to their best judgment. There is nothing in the act authorizing any discrimination."

The fact that colored children are required to travel to school further than if they attended a school for white children does not affect the validity of a statute of this nature. Thus in Dameron v. Bayless, 14 Ariz. 180, 126 Pac. 273, the court said: "The matter court said: "When the act in question is read in the light of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, its violation of same is too plain for argument. By section 1 of the act of 1908 provision is made for the establishment of an agricultural high school for the white youth only, and by section 2 of the same act this school is to be sustained by taxation on all 'taxable property'—that is, by taxes raised on the property of both white and black for the use of the white citizen only. We are not to be understood as holding that a statute could be passed which provided that the revenue raised for the support of the school could be raised by taxation only on the property of the white citizen for the white school and not be in violation of this provision of the Constitution of the United States; but we cite the method of taxation to emphasize the inequality of the law. If the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States means anything at all, it certainly means that all citizens of the United States shall stand equal before the law, and that no special privilege or benefits shall be given to one class of citizens to the exclusion of the other as a matter of statutory enactment. This does not mean that the legislature of the state cannot pass laws the object of which is to prevent a social commingling of the races; nor does it mean that an act of a legislature which in its administrative effect fails to work out an exact proportion of benefit to the two races is in conflict with this amendment to the United States Constitution; but a law is only void when its object or necessary effect is to abridge the privileges or immunities of a certain class of citizens, or deny them the equal protection of the laws. . . . Civil rights do not mean social rights, and the courts, both state and federal, recognizing this, and further realizing that no man-made law can force this condition of affairs, have steadily upheld all laws that merely had for their object this disassociation of the two races as promotive of the peace and welfare of all the citizens. . . . But, while this is true, no decision of any federal or state tribunal has yet been called to our attention, nor do we think it will be so long as the fourteenth amendment is in existence, upholding a statute taxing the property of the two races for the benefit of the one." But in Bonitz v. Ahoskie School Dist., 154 N. C. 375, 70 S. E. 735, the court said: "The Constitution of this state, art. IX, sec. 2, in providing for a 'uniform system of public schools wherein tuition shall be free of charge to all the children of the state between the ages of 6 and 21 years,' contains the requirement, 'That the children of the white race and the children of the colored race shall be taught in separate schools,' and further, 'but there shall be no discrimination in favor of or to the prejudice of either race.' In numerous and well-considered decisions this court has held that these provisions of our constitution, in regard to the two races, are mandatory, and may be disregarded neither by legislatures nor by officials charged with the duty of administering a given law. . . . If, therefore, the act in question here, in designating a certain boundary as a 'school district for the white race,' can only be construed as requiring that the funds to be raised under its provisions should be applied exclusively to the white schools within such boundary and the additional facilities afforded only enjoyed by the white children attending such schools, it would be clearly unconstitutional; but, in our opinion, such is not the necessary nor proper construction of the act. . . . The act before us (chapter 210, Laws 1909) is entitled "An act to incorporate the Ahoskie School District and allow it to vote on a special tax for schools and to issue bonds," and in the body of the act it is designated as 'Ahoskie School District, No. 11.' Then follows a description of the district by clearly defined boundaries, designating it as 'a school district for the white race.' Elaborate and specific provisions are then made for taking a vote of the district on the question of a special tax, and a separate and distinct provision for taking the sense of the voters as to the issue of bonds. Both of these provisions have been acted on, the tax voted and the bond issue approved. . . . A perusal of the act gives clear indication that its controlling purpose and, in several places, its expressed intent is to establish a 'special taxing district for the purpose, by increase of taxation and issue of bonds, of affording additional education facilities within the prescribed district, . . . and this beneficent purpose should not be frustrated because, in one of the sections, it is designated as a 'school district for the white race.' In view of the authorities cited and the principles upon which they rest, the correct construction of the statute is to uphold it in its principal purpose and declare, as we do, that, disregarding this special feature of the act, contrary, as it is, to our constitution, the money raised by taxation and by the issue and sale of bonds shall constitute a fund applicable to the school work of the district, to be administered according to law and having full regard to the constitutional provisions bearing upon it." And in Whitford v. Craven County, 159 N. C. 160, 74 S. E. 1014, the court said: "The plaintiffs attack the validity of the tax levy and the bonds proposed to be issued, upon the ground that in section 17 of the act it is provided that not more than one farm-life school shall be established in any county, and by this prohibition it is argued that the local authorities are deprived of the power to provide equal facilities for the two races; but we do not think this follows. What the statute means is that there shall not be more than one school of this kind for the instruction of both races, in separate buildings, with equal facilities. Having two or more buildings for the purpose of racial separation does not constitute two legally distinct schools. It is all one school, though consisting of two divisions, one for each race. The plaintiff contended that the principle announced in Williams v. Bradford, 158 N. C. 36, applies to this case, but we think the two cases are widely different. In the Williams case it was clear that provision was made for one race only; but in this case the statute does not provide for each race exclusively, and it might just as reasonably be argued that the benefit of the school was confined to the colored race, as it can be that it is restricted to the white race. We are not at liberty to declare a legislative act void, as being unconstitutional, unless it is clearly so beyond any reasonable doubt. There is always a strong presumption in favor of the validity of legislation, which must be overcome by some convincing reason to induce a court to declare it void. The act under consideration makes no discrimination between the races, and there is no expression in it which leads us to think that the school was intended for the exclusive benefit of the one race or the other."

In Crosby v. Mayfield, 133 Ky. 215, 117 S. W. 314, wherein it was claimed that an effort to maintain a white school by the taxation of the property owned by white persons, and to maintain a colored school by the taxation of the property owned by colored persons was a discrimination between the races, in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the court said: "The state divides equally among all the children of the state, without regard to race or color, the funds raised by taxation for school purposes. But, when the question is submitted to a local community as to whether or not the community will vote an additional tax for the betterment of its local school, this being a voluntary matter is submitted as to the white school to the white voters, and as to the colored school to the colored voters. The question of supplementing the state funds is left wholly to the vote of the locality. The voter is simply allowed to vote a tax upon himself if he wishes to do so to support his own school. While this precise question is not referred to in any of the opinions, we have in a number of cases sustained schools organized under the act and taxes on white people voted under it."

In Columbia Trust Co. v. Lincoln Institute, 138 Ky. 804, 129 S. W. 113, 29 L.R.A.

(N.S.) 53, the question was raised whether the General Assembly could prohibit the institution and maintenance of such a school as that maintained by the appellee, which was a charitable corporation organized under the laws of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, with power to establish a normal and industrial school for colored people. The court said: "If the teaching of the young to be useful, upright, Christian citizens is not inimical to the public safety, public morals, or the public health, then it must follow that an act which seeks either to prohibit it altogether or to authorize others to prohibit it must be invalid. It is difficult to find language to make plainer that which is so obvious as is the proposition before us. The purposes of the institution under discussion include the whole circle of the solid virtues with which youth may be endowed. Undoubtedly, it is a substantial good to educate the youth of the state; and such is the declared policy of the Constitution. . . . It cannot, then, be in any way injurious to the public to aid in forwarding the great educational policy which the people themselves have declared in their fundamental law—the giving of every young man and woman in the commonwealth a sound education. And, when academic education is supplemented by religious training and special instruction in the agricultural and mechanical arts and sciences, it seems to us that it is contrary to the most obvious public policy that an institution which affords such an education should be in any way blocked or impeded. It is not doubted that the legislature, under the police power, may regulate education in many respects. It may prohibit the mingling of white and colored children in the same schools, or in schools of immediate proximity. Perhaps, it may be within the police power to prohibit coeducation of the sexes, or to in any other reasonable way regulate the mere manner of educating the youth of the state; but to arbitrarily prohibit education is in direct violation of the Bill of Rights above quoted. . . . We conclude, then, on this branch of the case, that religious and scientific education, instead of being in any wise injurious or dangerous to the public safety, morals, health or welfare, on the contrary, is promotive of public virtue, intelligence, and good citizenship, and is therefore to be desired and promoted rather than prohibited or impeded; and, this being true, the act under discussion, which puts it within the power of the voters of any precinct to prohibit the establishment of such a school as that contemplated by appellee, is unconstitutional, and therefore void. Nor can the act be upheld as an amendment to the charters of such corporations as appellee."

GILLEN ET AL.

Michigan Supreme Court—July 24, 1914.

181 Mich. 509; 148 N. W. 163.

Gifts — Parol Gift of Mortgage — Validity.

A valid gift inter vivos of a mortgage may be made without a writing.

[See note at end of this case.]

Sufficiency of Evidence of Gift.

A finding of a gift inter vivos of a note and mortgage affirmed by equally divided court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Washtenaw county: KINNE, Judge.

Action to recover note and mortgage. Gideon L. Hoyt, administrator, plaintiff, and Ella Gillen et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

O'ranagh & Burke for appellant.

Arthur Brown for appellees.

[509] BROOKE, J.—The bill in this case is filed by the administrator of the estate of Matthew Shittenhelm for the purpose of securing possession of a certain note and mortgage for $1,600, made by defendant Egbert Gillen to complainant's intestate. The said note and mortgage are claimed by the defendant Ella Gillen as a gift inter vivos from complainant's intestate. Defendant Ella Gillen files a cross-bill praying that she be declared to be the lawful and absolute owner of said note and mortgage. The record shows that Matthew Shittenhelm died on the 8th day of August, [510] 1913; being at that time about 75 years of age; that he had lived in the household of defendant Ella Gillen for a great many years prior to his death. Though unrelated to her, he appears to have occupied a position in the family somewhat akin to that of a member of the household. He, however, paid board to her at the rate of $3.50 per week. In the summer of 1913 he fell ill, and it is the claim of the defendant Ella Gillen that on a day about two or three weeks prior to his death the note and mortgage in question were given to her by the complainant's intestate in part payment for the care she had bestowed upon him during the latter years of his life. The evidence of the gift is confined to the testimony given by Ruth Gillen, a young woman 21 years of age, and a daughter of the defendant Ella Gillen. It is as follows:

"Q. Some time previous to his having died, do you remember of his giving your mother any papers?

"A. One afternoon.

"Q. Do you remember the occasion?

"A. Oh, yes; I remember the occasion.

"Q. Do you remember when it was, about how long before he died?

"A. It was about two or three weeks; I don't remember the exact date.

"Q. And where had he been? Where were you sitting?

"A. I was sitting in the sitting room. Mother and I were busy sitting there sewing, and Matt was sitting in the rocking chair in the bay window, where he always sat, and he got up and went upstairs, and when he came back he had some papers in his hand.

"Q. Do you know what the papers were?

"A. No; I didn't see them. They were all together, and he handed them to Ma. I noticed they were yellow papers, but that is all.

"Q. What did he say?

"A. He said, 'Take those papers; I want you to have them.' I don't remember exactly, but he said something about their never having been put on record. 'Take these; I want you to have them.'

[511] "Q. And what time of the day was that, about?

"A. It was along after dinner, about 2 or 2:30, somewhere along there.

"Q. And where did he go to get these papers?

"A. He left the room and went upstairs."

On cross-examination the witness testified:

"Mr. Shittenhelm died in August, 1913. I do not know the date. This paper, the abstract, and other papers were delivered two or three weeks before his death. My mother and I and Mr. Shittenhelm were the only parties present at that time. He said to her that he wanted her to have those papers. He stated they were not on record. I do not remember his words. My mother took them. I saw them after she had them two or three days. Mr. Shittenhelm paid his board to my mother. He didn't work any for about, I guess it was, three or four years; he had the whooping cough, and after that he had not worked at all. He worked around to amuse himself around the house. He was a thrifty man, and the only thing I ever heard him say about giving the papers to Mrs. Gillen is what I have said.

"The Court: It seems to me that you do not repeat the language exactly, but you repeat it in substance. What was said when he handed these papers to your mother?"

"A, I don't remember the exact words, but he brought them out and told her he wanted her to have them now, and said something about their not being on record."

The record shows that complainant's intestate was accustomed to keep his valuables, papers, moneys, etc., in an unlocked trunk located in the closet of his bedroom in the Gillen house. After his death an examination of this trunk was made by his brother and others, and there was discovered therein a certificate of deposit for about $1,700 and something like $600 in cash. This property afterwards came into the possession of the complainant administrator, and, according to the inventory filed in the probate court, amounted to $2,797.98; this sum being exclusive of [512] the $1,600 note and mortgage in question. The decree of the court below dismissed complainant's bill and confirmed the title to said note and mortgage in defendant and cross-complainant, Ella Gillen, according to the prayer of her cross-bill. From this decree, complainant appeals.

In his principal brief complainant raises but one question, which is stated in the following language:

"In the present case, assuming that a manual delivery of the papers was actually made, it is admitted that no assignment was ever made of the mortgage and no indorsement upon the note. Therefore the element of the delivery of the legal title is absent. Also, under the evidence in this case, the donor might have revoked the gift at any time before his death; and further, as a matter of record and without the intervention of a decree of a court, it was not a gift executed, but required the contingency of a decree to give it even semblance of a legal transfer."

We are satisfied that the position of the complainant upon this point is untenable. There is no doubt that a valid gift of a chose in action may be made inter vivos without writing. In the case of Kimball v. Green, 148 Mich. 298, 111 N. W. 761, cited and relied upon by complainant, the evidence was examined and held to be insufficient to establish the gift, but the opinion does not hint that a written assignment of the mortgage or indorsement of the note in writing was necessary.

In Shepard v. Shepard, 164 Mich. 183, 120 N. W. 201, Mr. Justice Stone, speaking for the court, says:

"All that is necessary to constitute a valid transfer of property by parol is an expression to that effect by the donor, accompanied by a delivery of the thing to be done."

See, also, Grover v. Grover, 24 Pick. (Mass.) 261, 85 Am. Dec. 319; Hackney v. Vrooman, 62 Barb. (N. Y.) 650; Watson v. Watson, 69 Vt. 243, 39 Atl. [513] 201; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Grant, 54 N. J. Eq. 208, 38 Atl. 1060; Rinard v. Lasley, 143 Ill. App. 450; Brown v. Crafts, 99 Me. 40, 56 Atl. 213; Com. v. Crompton, 137 Pa. 138, 20 Atl. 417. Many other authorities to the same effect could readily be cited.

In his supplemental brief complainant raises for the first time the question that, as a matter of law, the evidence fails to establish a gift. That evidence we have already quoted. The rule as laid down in Cyc. is as follows:

"To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, the purpose of the donor to make the gift must be clearly and satisfactorily established, and the gift must be complete by actual, constructive, or symbolic delivery, without power of revocation." 20 Cyc. p. 1193.

The question to be determined, then, is whether the evidence of the gift is such as to warrant the decree made.

In the case of Kimball v. Green, supra, an examination of the record in this court discloses the fact that the evidence of the gift was much stronger than it is in the case at bar. There were, however, other circumstances in that case which tended to throw doubt upon the credibility of that testimony, chief among which was the fact that the person claiming the gift herself made application for the appointment of an administrator for the estate of the donor, in which she stated that the donor was at the time of his death possessed of personal property to the amount of $500 and upwards, and it appeared that, exclusive of the property claimed as a gift, the donor died possessed of less than $50. The decree of the court below in that case did not sustain the gift, and that decree was affirmed in this court. In the instant case the evidence of Ruth Gillen, inexact as it is, stands undisputed by any other testimony in the case, or any fact [514] or circumstance which would tend to cast doubt upon its credibility. The history of complainant's decedent likewise lends color to the verity of her testimony. The learned chancellor who heard her testimony evidently gave it full credence, and with him we are disposed to agree.

The decree is affirmed.

Bird, Moore, and Steere, J.J., concurred with Brooke, J.

KUHN, J. (dissenting).—I am unable to agree with the conclusions reached by Mr. Justice Brooke in this case. A careful examination of the testimony of Ruth Gillen, the only witness sworn as to the gift, leads me to the conclusion that under the authority of Kimball v. Green, 148 Mich. 298, 111 N. W. 761, it is insufficient to establish a gift inter vivos. Assuming that she testified absolutely truthfully, there is yet a lack of certainty in her evidence, which, in my opinion, is fatal. Nowhere in her testimony does she identify the mortgage and note in question with the papers delivered by complainant's intestate to her mother, and nowhere does she say that said intestate used language which necessarily imported a gift. In one place in her testimony she states the language of said decedent to have been: "Take these; I want you to have them." In another place she says, in answer to the court: "I don't remember the exact words, but he brought them out and told her he wanted her to have them now, and said something about their not being on record." In my opinion, neither statement necessarily implies a gift from complainant's decedent to Ella Gillen. While the circumstances surrounding the case are such as to perhaps indicate the truthfulness of Ella Gillen's claim, it should be remembered that the complainant's decedent kept the papers in question and all his other valuables in an unlocked trunk in his room, to which any member of the family [515] had ready access. It is unnecessary to impute dishonest motives to Ella Gillen or her daughter in this case, but I am of opinion that to hold a gift inter vivos was made out by the very meager, unsatisfactory, and inconclusive testimony of the single witness Ruth Gillen under the circumstances of this case would be to set a precedent extremely dangerous.

I think the decree of the court below should be reversed, and a decree entered in this court granting the prayer of complainant's bill.

McAlvay, C. J., and Stone and Ostrander, JJ., concurred with Kuhn, J.

NOTE.

Validity of Gift of Mortgage Inter Vivos without Writing.

The general rule is that a valid gift inter vivos of a mortgage may be made without a writing. Martin v. Martin, 170 Ill. 18, 48 N. E. 694, reversing 68 Ill. 169; Johnson v. Eaton, 51 Kan. 708, 33 Pac. 597; Donnell v. Wylie, 85 Me. 143, 26 Atl. 1092; Hagerman v. Wigent, 108 Mich. 192, 65 N. W. 756; Hackney v. Vrooman, 62 Barb. (N. Y.) 650; *Mack v. "Mortgages of real estate may be equitably transferred by gift and delivered, the same as notes, bonds or chattels." Donnell v. Wylie, 85 Me. 143, 26 Atl. 1092. "It seems to me that whether the gift be inter vivos or causa mortis, the donee acquires a legal as well as equitable title to the bond and mortgage which are the subject of the gift, by mere delivery without writing." Hackney v. Vrooman, 62 Barb. (N. Y.) 650.

In Mack v. Mack, 5 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 528, it appeared that the holder of notes and mortgages gave them to his wife with the intention of making a gift of them to her and her daughter. The court, in holding that there was a valid gift inter vivos, said: "The objection that the judgment and mortgages were not assigned in writing, we think not well taken." In Martin v. Martin, 170 Ill. 18, 48 N. E. 694, reversing 68 Ill. App. 169, it appeared that the holder of three notes and mortgages had given his niece a number of securities which she placed in a box rented by her in a safe deposit vault. Subsequently he recorded in his diary that he had put the notes and mortgages in her box. He regarded his niece with great affection, appreciated what she had done for him as a servant and companion, and expressed his intention to make ample provision for her. It was held that the notes and mortgages passed with the other securities. In Hagerman v. Wigent, 108 Mich. 192, 65 N. W. 756, it appeared that the donee delivered a mortgage to her husband with instructions to deliver it to the donees at her death and it was held that there was a valid gift inter vivos. In Johnson v. Eaton, 51 Kan. 708, 33 Pac. 597, it appeared that a father paid off a mortgage on land belonging to his daughter and had an assignment of the mortgage made to him. After the death of the father a suit was brought to recover on a note secured by the mortgage by his widow who claimed that the mortgage was given to her, but the evidence showed that it was never in her possession until after the death of the father. The daughter contended that her father paid off this mortgage voluntarily for her benefit, and as a gift to her, and that he retained possession of the papers in order to prevent her husband, from whom she had separated, from deriving any benefit from the payment, and evidence was introduced at the trial of declarations made by the deceased supporting her claim. It was held that it was the purpose of the father when he paid the amount of the mortgage, to make the payment for the benefit of the daughter, and that he took the assignment in blank of the papers merely to hold them in trust for his daughter's benefit, and that it amounted to a valid and completed advancement to her.

In each of the following cases it was held that there was no valid gift of a mortgage without writing either because no intention of the donor to make a gift was shown or because the delivery of the mortgage was sufficient. Reynolds v. Thompson, 161 Ky. 772, 171 S. W. 379; Bellis v. Lyons, 97 Mich. 398, 56 N. W. 770; Chaddock v. Chaddock, 134 Mich. 48, 95 N. W. 972, 10 Detroit Leg. N. 387; Kingsbury v. Gastrell (Miss.) 60 So. 661; Thompson v. West, 56 N. J. Eq. 660, 40 Atl. 197; Robinson v. Carpenter, 77 App. Div. 520, 79 N. Y. S. 283; Travis v. Travis, 12 Ont. App. 438.

In Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 651, 40 Pac. 8, it was contended that the interest of the assignee of a note and mortgage had passed by a gift to his daughter. It appeared that the daughter was incompetent, and that the father applied for and obtained letters of general guardianship. In the inventory of her estate, the note and mortgage were entered as the property of the incompetent. The note was exhibited to the appraisers by or at the instance of the father, and by them appraised at a valuation suggested by him. The clerk of the court testified that at the time of the application for letters of guardianship the father expressed sympathy and anxiety for his afflicted child, and said he was making provision for her and desired to make such provision while he was living. "He said he had not yet turned over any thing, but expressed his desire to do so." It was established that on one occasion, under oath, he declared the note and mortgage to be her property. It was held that there was no valid gift under a statute providing that "a verbal gift is not valid, unless the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing are given, nor, if it is capable of delivery, unless there is an actual or symbolical delivery of the thing to the donee."

In Deussen v. Moegelin, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 339, 59 S. W. 51, it was held that the gift of a note without writing to a mortgagee of the mortgage securing the note, extinguished the mortgage. See to the same effect Thomas v. Fuller, 68 Hun 361, 22 N. Y. S. 862.

In Alabama the rule seems to be that the gift of a mortgage by delivery merely is not valid where there is no delivery of the note which the mortgage secures. McHugh v. O'Connor, 91 Ala. 243, 9 So. 165. It seems also to be the rule in that jurisdiction that the gift of a note and mortgage without writing passes merely an equitable interest. O'Connor v. McHugh, 89 Ala. 531, 7 So. 749, wherein it was said: "A transfer of a note by delivery, secured by a mortgage of lands, will, in a court of equity, be deemed a transfer or assignment of the mortgage also, and effect will be given to it according to the intention of the parties. But, unless the mortgage is assigned with suitable words of conveyance, either on a separate paper, or indorsed on the mortgage, it does not operate to pass the legal estate in the lands. . . . It is apparent from the bill that both note and mortgage were transferred by delivery merely. This entitled complainant to foreclose the mortgage for her benefit, either in equity, or under the power of sale contained therein; but she acquired no estate in the land. The legal title remained in the mortgagee, clothed with a trust for the benefit of complainant. . . . Complainant obtained thereby the beneficial interest in the note, and an equity to the mortgage as an incident."

KIDWELL AND SON.

England—Court of Appeal—April 28, 1914.

[1914] 3 K. B. 135.

Landlord and Tenant — Liability of Landlord — Injury to Third Person.

The provisions of the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Act of 1909, by virtue of which a landlord is required to keep the premises in habitable condition, are for the sole benefit of the tenant, and the landlord is not liable to a third person injured by reason of the defective condition of the premises.

[135] Appeal by the plaintiff from the decision of a Divisional Court affirming a judgment of the judge of the county court of Kent holden at Rochester; reported [1913] 3 K. B. 123, Ann. Cas. 1915B 163.

[136] The plaintiff, Frances Alice Ryall, an infant, by Henry Charles Ryall, mason; her father and next friend, brought an action in the county court against the defendants to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by her on October 31, 1912, owing to the alleged negligence of the defendants in allowing the floor of a bedroom in a house known as 35, Britton Street, Gillingham, to be in a defective and dangerous condition.

Henry Charles Ryall was tenant and the defendants were landlords of the house in question, which was let by the defendants to the said Henry Charles Ryall at a weekly rent of five shillings. On October 31, 1912, the plaintiff, who had been standing on a window-sill cleaning windows, stepped from the window-sill on to a chair. One leg of the chair slipped into a hole in the floor. The plaintiff fell and sustained the injuries complained of.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendants, holding, upon the authority of Cavalier v. Pope [1905] 2 K. B. 757 [1906] A. C. 428, 5 Ann. Cas. 715, that the relation created by the statute was contractual and between the landlord and the tenant only, and therefore that the plaintiff had no cause of action. The plaintiff appealed, and the Divisional Court (Ridley and Avory JJ.) affirmed the judgment of the county court judge.

The plaintiff appealed:

C. T. Williams for appellant.

A. H. Richardson for respondents.

O. L. Richardson solicitor for appellant.

Hair and Co. solicitors for respondents.

[138] LORD READING J.—This is an appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court affirming the decision of the county court judge that the plaintiff had made out no cause of action, and that therefore the defendants were entitled to judgment. The case was presented before the county court judge and in the Divisional Court upon facts which are shortly as follows: The father of the injured girl was tenant of premises which came within the operation of Housing, Town Planning, etc. Act, 1909, and his daughter, who was living with him in the house, was injured in consequence of the want of repair in the condition of the premises tenanted by him. It was contended on behalf of the injured girl that she had a right of action against the landlord.

There is, prima facie, no such right of action at common law, nor can it be implied from the fact of the letting of the house by the landlord to the father. The point was discussed in Cavalier v. Pope [1905] 2 K. B. 757 [1906] A. C. 428, 5 Ann. Cas. 713, where the following passage from the judgment of Erle C. J. in Robbins v. Jones (1863) 15 C. B. (N. S.) 221, at p. 240, 109 E. C. L. 220,

239, was quoted by Lord Macnaghten in giving judgment in the House of Lords: "A landlord who lets a house in a dangerous state, is not liable to the tenant's customers or guests for accidents happening during the term; for, fraud apart, there is no law against letting a tumbledown house; and the tenant's remedy is upon his contract, if any."

Now, that being the common law, the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, in substance and within certain limits was incorporated into the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Act, 1909, whereby the Legislature thought fit to impose upon landlords a condition which otherwise would not have existed, namely, that in any contract of letting premises for habitation within the limits mentioned either in s. 75 of the Housing of the [189] Working Classes Act, 1890, or in s. 140 of the Act of 1909, there should be an implied condition (which has been construed in the broader meaning of a promise by the landlord) that he will keep the premises in repair. The effect of those statutory amendments is that a promise by the landlord is imported into the contract of letting which otherwise would not be in that contract. Further than that the Housing and Town Planning Act, 1909, does not go, except that it provides a remedy which is one altogether apart from the remedy given to the tenant of one of these dwellings. It seems to me quite plain that a resident tenant of such a dwelling would have the right by virtue of this statute to bring an action against his landlord for breach of the covenant implied by the statute to keep the premises in a state reasonably fit for human habitation. The promise which is imported into the contract enures for the benefit of the tenant with all the obligations it places upon the landlord, except in so far as it may be said that they are limited or restricted by the statute. No doubt Parliament saw great practical difficulty in the enforcing of such a remedy by a member of the working classes against his landlord. It may be that it was thought that he might be rather careless and would not take the trouble to enforce it, or that the costs would be too heavy for a working man to incur, and possibly also that he might not like to sue his landlord for fear of losing his right of living there by having his tenancy determined. Parliament certainly thought that it was necessary to give some other remedy, and therefore it enacted that in addition to the remedies which are implied in this statutory condition which it imposed upon the landlord, the local authority should have the right to enter the premises under certain conditions and in certain circumstances to examine them, and if it thinks the premises are not in a fit state of repair, to call upon the landlord to put them into a fit state of repair. The landlord has an option under the statute, within twenty-one days of notice given to him, to say, if he chooses, that he will close the premises absolutely as a place of habitation. If he does not do that, and if he does not put the premises into repair, then the local authority has the right to do the repairs, notwithstanding that the landlord does not wish [140] to or has not agreed to it, and to charge him with the expense. All those provisions are means given by the Legislature for the purpose of enabling the tenant to obtain the benefit of the condition which it has seen fit to impose in the letting of premises which are within the statute. Mr. Williams, who has argued this case with ability, ingenuity, and courage on behalf of the appellant, admitted that if the obligation upon the landlord is simply contractual the Divisional Court was right and this appeal must fail; but he asked the Court to come to the conclusion, upon the language of the statute and having regard to the object which the Legislature had in mind when it so enacted it, that Parliament meant to impose a statutory obligation upon the landlord arising altogether apart from contract. If he could have established that contention, he would, in my opinion, have gone far, if not the whole way, towards success in this appeal. But there lies his difficulty. In my judgment there is imposed by this statute upon the landlord no duty, such as is imposed by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Edw. 7, c. 22), upon an employer to keep his premises in a fit state of fencing or protected and guarded. That is not the character of the obligation placed upon the landlord. That obligation is limited entirely to imposing upon him the promise to keep the premises in a state of repair. That is purely contractual, and there is no further duty, such as it is sought to impose upon him by the contention on behalf of the appellant. Moreover, even if the Court came to a different conclusion it would not, in my judgment, be able to give effect to it; it would be bound to follow the decision in Cavalier v. Pope [1905] 2 K. B. 757 [1906] A. C. 428, 433, 5 Ann. Cas. 713. That decision—see especially Lord Atkinson's judgment in the House of Lords—makes it perfectly plain that there is no such duty on the landlord as is contended for in this case. There is also the further case of Middleton v. Hall, 108 L. T. N. S. 804, which was tried last year before my brother Bankes, in which he gave a judgment to the same effect as that of the Divisional Court in the present case, resting his decision upon Cavalier v. Pope [1905] 2 K. B. 757 [1906] A. C. 428, 5 Ann. Cas. 713; as did the Divisional Court. In truth, Cavalier v. Pope [1905] 2 K. B. 757 [1906] A. C. 428, 433, 5 Ann. Cas. 713, is a fence which it is impossible to [141] get over; it stands there as an insurmountable obstacle to all the arguments which have been put forward upon behalf of the appellant, and I do not therefore propose to repeat the reasoning contained in the speeches of the noble Lords in that case in the House of Lords, or in the judgments of the Court of Appeal, in which it was made clear by the majority of the Court that even if the Court might wish to impose such an obligation upon the landlord, it could not do it. We are confined, whatever our own views may be, to giving effect to the statute, and however sympathetic we might be to such a claim as that advanced on the appellant's behalf, it does not rest with judges to extend and stretch an Act of Parliament to something beyond that which Parliament has itself declared. If it was the intention of Parliament to give such an extended right as is contended for in this case, it could have done it quite simply, and without difficulty. It would not have been necessary to import a condition into the contract; Parliament could have said—as it has said in the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and in many other statutes—that the landlord shall keep the premises in repair, and if so there would have been an obligation imposed upon him by statute which would, as it appears to me, have justified the argument which has been put before us to-day. But these are not the words of the statute, the language of which is very different. Therefore in my judgment the decisions of the county court judge and of the Divisional Court were right, and Cavalier v. Pope [1905] 2 K. B. 757 [1906] A. C. 428, 5 Ann. Cas. 713—which is on all fours with this case—is a binding authority upon us in the application of its principles, and therefore I think that this appeal must fail and should be dismissed.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The social or economical mischief which seemed to me to arise in certain cases, and against which I struggled unsuccessfully to provide in Cavalier v. Pope [1905] 2 K. B. 757 [1906] A. C. 428, 5 Ann. Cas. 713, is very largely removed by the provisions of the Housing Town Planning, etc. Act, 1909, on which the appellant relies, and I have therefore little reluctance in complying with my obvious duty of following the principle laid down in Cavalier [142] v. Pope [1905] 2 K. B. 757 [1906] A. C. 428, 5 Ann. Cas. 713, in the House of Lords. I only now desire to observe that it is worthy of consideration that, having regard to s. 15 of the Act, there might be a very serious hardship upon a perfectly innocent landlord if the construction sought for by Mr. Williams on behalf of the appellant were to be applied. It is one thing to say that a landlord shall not let a house which is not fit for habitation, but quite another to say that he continuously undertakes to keep it reasonably in repair. If that is an undertaking in covenant with the tenant there is no harm done, because if the tenant complains that it is not reasonably fit the landlord puts it in repair, and if the tenant brings an action without first making a complaint to the landlord no Court would enforce the duty upon him, at any rate, without safeguarding him as to costs, because the tenant who is in possession, and who has knowledge of the want of repair, ought to give the landlord notice of it. But if third persons are to be entitled to avail themselves of this section the landlord might be in this position: he might have let the house in perfectly good repair, but it might have got out of repair by reason of the acts of the tenant, his guests, or licensees, and the landlord might know nothing about the want of repair. Then if some third person (not the individual who put it out of repair by, for instance, breaking the windows, or pulling down the ceiling, in such a case as I have tried at Liverpool, using chunks of a mantelpiece to throw at his neighbour) other than that misdoer suffered in consequence of the house being out of repair, the landlord would not be able to say, if that third person made a claim, that he (the third person) ought to have told him of the want of repair, because that third person has not a duty to do so, and it might be that the landlord would then be held responsible for something which he could not have prevented. I only throw out that consideration as a further reason why I do not feel reluctant to decide in favour of the defendant in the present case as I am compelled to do.

LUSH, J.—The appellant, in order to succeed, must shew two things: first, that the Housing, Town Planning, etc. Act, 1909, [143] imposes an absolute duty upon the landlord to repair, and secondly that the person injured is within the class of persons for whose benefit that duty is imposed. Now, the plaintiff fails to establish the first of those two propositions. All that the Act of 1909 does is to enact that if the contract between the landlord and tenant contains no warranty (I think the word "condition" is used in that sense in ss. 14 and 15 of the Act of 1909) that the house is reasonably fit for human habitation, and no undertaking on the part of the landlord that it shall be kept in a state reasonably fit for human habitation, those two terms shall be implied. But the character and quality of the obligation which is imported by the statute are none the less contractual, although the contract is derived from and owes its existence to the statute. Therefore the obligation on the part of the landlord in the present case is purely a contractual one. That is all that the statute has effected.

Now, it was decided in Cavalier v. Pope [1905] 2 K. B. 757 [1906] A. C. 428, 5 Ann. Cas. 713, that no action lies for the breach of the contractual obligation at the suit of a stranger to the contract, and that decision seems to me to dispose of the contentions which have been placed before us on behalf of the appellant. For these reasons I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE.

The reported case, which affirms the decision of the Kings Bench Division Ryall v. Kidwell (Ann. Cas. 1915B 163) holds that the implied covenant of a lessor that the premises shall be kept reasonably fit for human habitation runs to the lessee only and that a third person, such as an employee of the tenant, is not entitled to recover from the lessor for injuries sustained by reason of a defective condition of the premises permitted by the lessor to continue. The earlier cases are reviewed in the notes to Brady v. Klein, 2 Ann. Cas. 464; Cameron v. Young, 12 Ann. Cas. 47; Ryall v. Kidwell, Ann. Cas. 1915B 163, and Griffin v. Jackson Light, etc. Co. 92 Am. St. Rep. 496.

WHITEMORE ET AL.

BAXTER LAUNDRY COMPANY.

Michigan Supreme Court—July 24, 1914.

181 Mich. 564; 148 N. W. 437.

Nuisances — Definition.

A private nuisance is anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments of another.

Judicial Notice — Properties of Gasoline.

The court will take judicial notice of the dangerous character and explosive qualities of gasoline.

Nuisances — Storage of Gasoline.

For defendant to sink storage tanks on the extreme edge of its property and within a few feet of complainant's residence, in which over 20,000 gallons of gasoline were to be stored, constitutes a private nuisance, in view of the dangerous character of gasoline and the liability to explosion.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kent county: BROWN, Judge.

Action for injunction. Arthur W. Whittemore et al., plaintiffs, and Baxter Laundry Company, defendant. Judgement for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Wilson & Johnson for appellants.

Corbin & Souter for appellees.

[564] KUHNS, J.—The defendant is the owner of a laundry and dry-cleaning establishment in the city of Grand Rapids, occupying the easterly portion of a block bounded on the north by Hawthorne street, on the east by Eastern avenue, on the south by Fountain street, and on the west by Grand avenue. The complainants are the owners of property, and reside, in the westerly [565] portion of the block. With the exception of defendant's plant, the location is strictly a residence district, and the complainant Arthur W. Whittemore owns and occupies a house and lot immediately adjoining defendant's premises on the west, and the defendant's property is practically surrounded by residences costing from $3,500 to $4,500 each. In its business of dry cleaning the defendant uses about 15,000 gallons of gasoline annually, and, just previous to the filing of the bill in this case, the defendant had placed in its yards two large steel tanks of the capacity of 10,000 gallons each, and had commenced excavating preparatory to burying them in the northwest corner of its premises, which was the farthest possible point on its premises from its own buildings and immediately adjoining the property of the complainant Whittemore, the nearest tank being about 11 feet from his house. The bill of complaint filed asked for a temporary injunction restraining defendant from storing gasoline in the tanks, for the reason that such storage, under the circumstances of this case, would be a private nuisance, and also that it would be in violation of certain ordinances of the city of Grand Rapids. When the bill was filed an injunction was issued restraining the defendant from storing gasoline in the tanks, which was made permanent when the case was heard on its merits.

In Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579, 582, 36 Am. Rep. 654, the court speaking of private nuisances said:

"A private nuisance is defined to be anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments of another. 3 Bl. Com. 216. Any unwarrantable, unreasonable, or unlawful use by a person of his own property, real or personal, to the injury of another, comes within the definition stated, and renders the owner or possessor liable for all damages arising from such use. Wood's Law of Nuis. § 1, and authorities cited. The cases which are regarded as private nuisances are numerous, and the [566] books are full of decisions holding the parties answerable for the injuries which result from their being maintained. The rule is of universal application that, while a man may prosecute such business as he chooses on his own premises, he has no right to erect and maintain a nuisance to the injury of an adjoining proprietor or of his neighbors, even in the pursuit of a lawful trade. Aldred's Case, 9 Coke (Eng.) 58; Brady v. Weeks, 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 159; Dubois v. Budlong, 15 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 445; Wier's Appeal, 74 Pa. St. 230."

We may grant that the storage of gasoline on premises adjacent to or adjoining the premises of another is not a private nuisance per se. It might, however, become such, considering the locality, the quantity, and the surrounding circumstances, and would not necessarily depend upon the degree of care used in its storage. Heeg v. Licht, supra; 29 Cyc. p. 1117. We may also concede that in the instant case every precaution that human ingenuity has conceived has been made use of in the construction of the tanks as testified to by defendant's experts. Considering, however, the dangerous character of the substance and its power as an explosive, of which in this age of its wonderful development as a power to propel automobiles, traction engines, and airships, we can well take judicial notice, and also considering human fallibility, that accidents in the operation of the most perfect mechanism will occur, and all that it needs to change what is, when properly protected, a harmless agency to a most dangerous explosive is a careless person, can it be said that to have 20,000 gallons of such an agency stored within but a few feet of one's dwelling house is not sufficient to be an unreasonable interference with the comfortable enjoyment of that home? This is a purely residence district of the city, and was such before the defendant began operating its dry-cleaning business, and it must be apparent to any fair-minded person that the location of these tanks in such immediate proximity to complainant Whittemore's [567] house would necessarily damage his property. It also appears that tanks for storage purposes could have been placed on the Fountain street side of defendant's property, which would have removed them from proximity to any residence. The reason for not doing this is thus stated in defendant's brief:

"Complainants called attention to the fact that there was room enough to place them on the Fountain street side of the property. A good and sufficient reason for not placing them there is that this ground is devoted to lawn and shrubbery, upon which the company has spent considerable money, and for which it took the prize in the contest for the best-appearing manufacturing grounds."

If defendant was desirous of installing tanks to more economically conduct its business, it would seem to have been more reasonable to have disturbed and damaged its own lawn and shrubbery, however beautiful, rather than to disturb its neighbor in the enjoyment of his home and to damage his property.

Considering all the surrounding circumstances in this case, we are satisfied that the chancellor who heard the case reached a proper and equitable conclusion in determining that the storage of gasoline in the tanks was a private nuisance. In view of this conclusion, it will be unnecessary to review the ordinances of the city of Grand Rapids and determine whether the construction of these tanks and the storage of gasoline therein in the manner alleged in the bill of complaint is in violation thereof.

The decree of the court below is affirmed.

McAlvay, C. J., and Stone, Ostrander, Bird, Moore, and Steere, JJ., concurred. Brooke, J., did not sit.

NOTE.

Storage of Gasoline or Other Explosive as Nuisance.

Scope of Note, 820.

Nuisance per se, 820.

Nuisance from Violation of Statute or Ordinance, 820.

Nuisance from Circumstances:

Generally, 821.

Gasoline, Kerosene or Naptha, 821.

Oils or Gas, 821.

Powder, 821.

Dynamite, 822.

Nitroglycerine, 823.

Scope of Note.

It is intended in this note to review those cases in which the storage of gasoline or other explosives as constituting a nuisance has been considered. The liability of a person keeping and storing explosives for injuries caused by an explosion is discussed in the notes to Kerbaugh v. Caldwell, 10 Ann. Cas. 453, and Whaley v. Sloss-Sheffield Steel, etc. Co. 20 Ann. Cas. 822.

Nuisance Per Se.

The storing or keeping of powder, dynamite or nitroglycerine has been said to constitute a nuisance per se. State v. Excelsior Powder Mfg. Co. 259 Mo. 254, 169 S. W. 267, L.R.A. 1915A 615; McAndrews v. Colliard, 42 N. J. L. 189, 36 Am. Rep. 508; Bradford Glycerine Co. v. St. Marys Woolen Mfg. Co. 60 Ohio St. 560, 54 N. E. 528, 71 Am. St. Rep. 740, 45 L.R.A. 658; Cheatham v. Shearon, 1 Swan (Tenn.) 213, 55 Am. Dec. 734. See also

Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579, 36 Am. Rep. 654; Lounsbury v. Foss, 80 Hun, 296, 30 N. Y. S. 89, judgment affirmed 145 N. Y. 600, 40 N. E. 164. Thus in Cheatham v. Shearon, 1 Swan (Tenn.) 213, 55 Am. Dec. 734, the court said tersely: "The only question in this case is, whether the erection of a powder magazine in a populous part of the city, and keeping stored therein large quantities of gun powder, is per se, a nuisance. And without doubt we think it is."

However, the storage of gasoline or other explosives has been held not to constitute a nuisance per se. Kinney v. Koopman, 116 Ala. 310, 22 So. 593, 67 Am. St. Rep. 119, 37 L.R.A. 497; (powder and dynamite); Simpson v. Du Pont Powder Co. 143 Ga. 465, 85 S. E. 344 (powder, dynamite and nitroglycerine); Harper v. Standard Oil Co. 78 Mo. App. 338 (gasoline and coal oil); O'Hara v. Nelson, 71 N. J. Eq. 161, 63 Atl. 836 (gasoline); Quillo v. New York Edison Co. 85 Misc. 6, 147 N. Y. S. 14 (gasoline.); Forster v. Rogers, 247 Pa. St. 54, 93 Atl. 26 (dynamite.) See also Cook v. Anderson, 85 Ala. 99, 4 So. 713 (oils); McGregor v. Cadmen, 47 W. Va. 193, 34 S. E. 936 (oils and gas). Thus in Harper v. Standard Oil Co. 78 Mo. App. 338, the court said: "It is not believed any well considered case holds that the storage of gasoline and coal oil in suitable tanks constitutes a nuisance per se."

Nuisance from Violation of Statute or Ordinance.

The storage and keeping of gasoline or other explosives, in violation of a statute or ordinance, is regarded as a nuisance. Hazard Powder Co. v. Volger, 58 Fed. 152, 12 U. S. App. 665, 7 C. C. A. 130; Kinney v. Koopman, 116 Ala. 310, 22 So. 593, 67 Am. St. Rep. 119, 37 L.R.A. 497; Lafin etc. Powder Co. v. Tearney, 131 Ill. 322, 23 N. E. 389, 19 Am. St. Rep. 34, 7 L.R.A. 262; Moeckel v. Cross, 190 Mass. 280, 76 N. E. 447; Cameron v. Kenyon-Connell Commercial Co. 22 Mont. 312, 56 Pac. 358, 74 Am. St. Rep. 602, 44 L.R.A. 508; Rieker v. McDonald, 89 App. Div. 300, 85 N. Y. S. 825. See also Texas Co. v. Fisk (Tex.), 129 S. W. 188; Houston, etc. R. Co. v. Cavanaugh (Tex.) 173 S. W. 619. Compare Fillo v. Jones, 2 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 121. Thus in Lafin, etc. Powder Co. v. Tearney, 131 Ill. 322, 23 N. E. 389, 19 Am. St. Rep. 34, 7 L.R.A. 262, the court said: "The fact, that the explosion destroyed plaintiff's buildings, shows, that the keeping of gunpowder in the magazine, considered with reference to the locality, the quantity and the surrounding circumstances, constituted a nuisance per se." And in Moeckel v. Cross, 190 Mass. 280, 76 N. E. 447, wherein it appeared that the defendant maintained a building for the storage of gasoline and kerosene in violation of a statute, the court held that the jury were warranted in finding that the defendant was maintaining a nuisance. So in Cameron v. Kenyon-Connell Commercial Co. 22 Mont. 312, 56 Pac. 358, 74 Am. St. Rep. 602, 44 L.R.A. 508, the court said: "We have before us a corporation guilty of a nuisance, by having kept in a frame warehouse within the limits of an incorporated city, in the vicinity of railroad depots and other buildings, an amount of Hercules powder in excess of the quantity—50 pounds—allowed to be stored therein by the laws of the state."

Nuisance from Circumstances.

GENERALLY.

Whether the storing or keeping of gasoline or other explosives is a nuisance by reason of its proximity to dwelling houses, places of business, public streets or railroads is a question of fact for the jury. Kerbaugh v. Caldwell, 151 Fed. 194, 10 Ann. Cas. 453, 80 C. C. A. 470; Rensbery v. Iola Portland Cement Co. 73 Kan. 68, 84 Pac. 548; Flynn v. Butler, 189 Mass. 377, 75 N. E. 730; Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579, 36 Am. Rep. 654; Prussak v. Hutton, 30 App. Div. 68, 51 N. Y. S. 761; Emory v. Hazard Powder Co. 22 S. C. 476, 53 Am. Rep. 730; Barnes v. Zettlemoyer, 25 Tex. Civ. App. App. 468, 62 S. W. 111. See also Rudder v. Koopman, 116 Ala. 332, 22 So. 601, 37 L.R.A. 489; O'Hara v. Nelson, 71 N. J. Eq. 161, 63 Atl. 836; Ft. Worth, etc. R. Co. v. Beauchamp, 95 Tex. 496, 68 S. W. 502, 93 Am. St. Rep. 864, 58 L.R.A. 716. And see the cases cited in the following subdivisions of this note.

GASOLINE, KEROSENE OR NAPHTHA.

The storage of gasoline, kerosene or naphtha in proximity to dwelling houses and places of business has been held to be a nuisance. Reg. v. Lister, 3 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 570, 26 L. J. M. C. 196; 5 W. R. 626; 7 Cox C. C. 342; Dears. & B. 209; Hendrickson v. Standard Oil Co. 128 Md. 577, 95 Atl. 153; O'Hara v. Nelson, 71 N. J. Eq. 161, 63 Atl. 836. And see the reported case. See also Com. v. Kidder, 107 Mass. 188. Thus in O'Hara v. Nelson, supra, wherein it appeared that the defendant operated a garage in a thickly built up portion of a large city the court held that he "should be restrained from introducing gasoline into the tanks of the automobiles inside the building and from storing automobiles with gasoline in their tanks inside of the building." So in Regina v. Lister, 3 Jur. N. S. 570, 26 L. J. M. C. 196, 5 W. R. 626; 7 Cox C. C. 342; Dears. & B. 209, wherein it appeared that naphtha was kept in an important part of London, the court said that "to manufacture, or to keep in large quantities, in towns or closely inhabited places, gunpowder (which for this purpose cannot be distinguished from naphtha) is by the common law of England a nuisance and an indictable offense."

But the storage of gasoline or kerosene has been held not to be a nuisance, in view of the nature of the surroundings. Harper v. Standard Oil Co. 78 Mo. App. 338; Cuilo v. New York Edison Co. 85 Misc. 6, 147 N. Y. S. 14. See also Texas Co. v. Fisk (Tex.) 129 S. W. 188. Thus in the case first cited it was decided that the maintenance of tanks for gasoline and other oils seventy-five feet from property belonging to plaintiff did not constitute a nuisance, there being no evidence to excite reasonable apprehension of fire from sparks of passing locomotives, the only alleged source of danger. And in Texas Co. v. Fisk, supra, it was held that the location of a tank in a section of a city where several such receptacles, owned by others engaged in the same business, were already in existence and use, could not properly be enjoined.

OILS OR GAS.

The keeping of oils or gas in the heart of a city or in close proximity to dwelling houses is considered a nuisance. Levin v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 133 N. Y. S. 467; McGregor v. Camden, 47 W. Va. 193, 34 S. E. 936. See also Cook v. Anderson, 86 Ala. 99, 4 So. 713. Thus in McGregor v. Camden, supra, the boring of an oil well seventy feet from a dwelling was held to be restrainable because of the explosive and dangerous properties of the oil and gas issuing from the well if productive. See also Cook v. Anderson, supra. And in Levin v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. supra, wherein it appeared that the defendant maintained in its yards in the heart of a city a tank containing combustible gas the court held the tank to be a nuisance.

But in Cleveland v. Citizens' Gaslight Co. 20 N. J. Eq. 201, it was held that the danger of explosion was not sufficient to restrain as a nuisance the erection of a gas manufactory where the complainant's buildings were not sufficiently near to be endangered by an explosion if one should occur. See also Harper v. Standard Oil Co. 78 Mo. App. 338.

POWDER.

The storage of powder in the vicinity of dwellings, stores, churches, railroad lines or public roads is regarded as a nuisance.

West Virginia.—Wilson v. Phoenix Powder Mfg. Co. 40 W. Va. 413, 21 S. E. 1035, 52 Am. St. Rep. 890; Huntington, etc. Land Development Co. v. Phoenix Powder Mfg. Co. 40 W. Va. 711, 21 S. E. 1037.

Thus in Rex v. Taylor, 2 Stra. (Eng.) 1167, the court granted an information against the defendant for a nuisance, on affidavits of his keeping large quantities of gunpowder to the endangering of a church and houses in his neighborhood. And in Schnitzer v. Excelsior Powder Mfg. Co. (Mo.) 160 S. W. 282, the court held that "in keeping explosives on its premises in quantities to constitute a perpetual menace to the safety of persons rightfully using the several public highways within the radius of the destructive force of such explosives, defendant maintained a public nuisance." So in State v. Excelsior Powder Mfg. Co. 259 Mo. 254, 169 S. W. 267, L.R.A.1915A 615, the court said: "A powder magazine, as to all property and residents in such proximity to it that they are subject to danger from its explosion, is a nuisance regardless of the question as to negligence in the manner of keeping it." Likewise in Wilson v. Phoenix Powder Mfg. Co. 40 W. Va. 413, 21 S. E. 1035, 52 Am. St. Rep. 890, the court held that a mill manufacturing powder and other explosives located near two railroads and a public road was a nuisance. See to the same effect Huntington, etc., Land Development Co. v. Phoenix Powder Mfg. Co. 40 W. Va. 711, 21 S. E. 1037, and in Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579, 36 Am. Rep. 654, the court said: "The keeping or manufacturing of gunpowder or of fire-works does not necessarily constitute a nuisance per se. That depends upon the locality, the quantity, and the surrounding circumstances, and not entirely upon the degree of care used."

However in Kleebauer v. Western Fuse, etc. Co. 138 Cal. 497, 71 Pac. 617, 94 Am. St. Rep. 62, reversing 69 Pac. 246, it was held that the storage of gunpowder and other explosives by a manufacturing company for use in the making of fuses and other high explosives was not necessarily a nuisance where the business was originally located in an isolated place and the neighborhood built up around it. To the same effect, see Tuckachinsky v. Lehigh, etc. Coal Co. 199 Pa. St. 515, 49 Atl. 308.

DYNAMITE.

Storing dynamite in a place dangerous to the person and property of those living near by is a nuisance.

In Fanning v. White, 148 N. C. 541, 62 S. E. 734, it was held that the storing of dynamite used in the instruction of a railroad fifty feet from the track, one hundred and eighty feet from a road, twenty feet from a river and one mile from a village did not constitute a nuisance.

NITROGLYCERINE.

The storage of nitroglycerine in the vicinity of dwellings, railroads or public roads is considered a nuisance. Tyner v. People's Gas Co. 131 Ind. 408, 31 N. E. 61; *Flynn v. CITY AND COUNTY OF DENVER

v.

HOBBS ESTATE ET AL.

Colorado Supreme Court—December 7, 1914.

58 Colo. 220; 144 Pac. 874.

Statutes — Construction — Legislative Intent.

The court, in construing a statute, cannot give to the language used any different meaning from that plainly expressed, on the theory of a contrary legislative intent.

Taxation — Property Subject — Stock in Foreign Corporation.

The proviso in Rev. St. 1908, § 5687, that corporate stock shall be deemed to represent the corporate property, and except in cases of banking corporations shall not be taxed, applies to domestic and foreign corporations alike.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The revenue act, of which Rev. St. 1908, § 5687, declaring that corporate stock shall be deemed to represent the corporate property, and except in cases of banking corporations shall not be taxed, is a part, must be considered as a whole in construing section 5687, and, when so considered, stock of domestic and foreign corporations, not banking corporations, is not taxable.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The provisions of Rev. St. 1908, § 5584, that no deduction shall be allowed on account of any indebtedness on or for the capital stock of any corporation or other exempt property, indicates that corporate stock shall not be taxed separate and apart from the corporate property, as it would be unfair to permit deduction of debts for property not taxable.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Rev. St. 1908, §§ 5591, 5592, making stock and bonds of corporations competent evidence of the value of plants of corporations, foreign or domestic, and providing that the entire business, plant, or enterprise of a corporation shall be valued as a unit, and that every element which gives to the corporation property an added value shall be considered in fixing the value for taxable purposes, are guides to the assessor in fixing the value of property owned by any corporation foreign or domestic, but do not indicate that corporate stock itself shall be taxed, except as covered by the property of the corporation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Rev. St. 1908, § 5659, requiring the assessor to make out an abstract of the assessment in his county, stating in detail specified things, including the assessed valuation of shares in banking corporations, without requiring the abstract to show the value of other corporate stock, discloses a legislative intention that there shall be no distinction between stock in foreign and domestic corporations, and is in harmony with the proviso in section 5687, declaring that corporate stock shall be deemed to represent the corporate property, and except in case of the banking corporations shall not be taxed, construed to apply to domestic and foreign corporations.

[See note at end of this case.]

Situs of Corporate Stock.

Where stock in a foreign corporation is deemed the personal property of the owner, separate and distinct from the capital of the corporation, its situs for purpose of taxation is a matter of legislative control, as is also the method to be provided for its assessment. Power to Exempt Stock in Foreign Corporation.

The proviso in Rev. St. 1908, § 5687, that corporate stock shall be deemed to represent the corporate property, and except in cases of banking corporations shall not be taxed, construed to apply to domestic and foreign corporations, is not in conflict with Const. art. 10, § 3, requiring that all taxes shall be uniform, and shall be levied and collected under general laws prescribing regulations securing a just valuation for taxation of all property, but is a valid exercise of the constitutional power to prescribe regulations.

Error to County Court, City and County of Denver: Dixon, Judge.

Action for taxes. City and County of Denver, plaintiff, and the estate of Charles M. Hobbs et al., defendants. To review judgment rendered, plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Benjamin Griffith, Theodore M. Stuart, Jr., H. A. Lindsley, Thomas R. Woodrow, I. N. Stevens, George Q. Richmond and Charles A. Prentice for plaintiff in error.

Goudy & Twitohell and J. H. Burkhardt for defendant in error.

Edward C. Stimson and Henry O. Rogers, Macbeth & May, Julius O. Gunter, Malcolm Lindsey, Hughes and Dorsey, John Q. Dier, John A. Ewing and Fraser Arnold, amici curiae.

[220] HILL, J.—This is an action for taxes. The property is stocks in corporations of sister states, other than banking institutions, [221] which, at the time of his death, was owned by Charles M. Hobbs, a resident of this state. It was inventoried here as a part of his estate. It is claimed on the part of the taxing officers that these stocks are subject to taxation, separate and apart from the assets of the corporation. This position is challenged on the part of the estate. No question of inheritance tax is involved. The court held that pursuant to the provisions of the section 5687, Revised Statutes 1908, the stocks were not thus taxable. In addition to the oral argument, elaborate briefs have been filed covering the entire field of taxation, including numerous papers of recognized students of ability upon the subject, numerous authorities, etc., a great deal of which, while instructive, is of but slight value in the disposition of this contention, for the reason the question is not what the legislature might do, or should have done in this respect, but what it has done by the enactment of section 5687, supra.

It is urged that the latter part of this section, which reads:

applies only to domestic corporations by reason of the constitutional provision which requires equal taxation of property, and forbids exemptions other than as therein specified. We cannot agree that the legislature thus intended; when tested by the language used it would be violative of elementary rules of construction. It would be to hold that they meant to say that which they did not say, and that they did not intend to say that which, in the clearest and plainest language possible, they have said. In such case it is not for the courts to give to the language any different meaning from that plainly expressed:—[222] Hause v. Rose, 6 Colo. 24; People v. May, 9 Colo. 80, 10 Pac. 641; Uzzell v. Anderson, 38 Colo. 32, 89 Pac. 785, 1056; Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 662, 9 S. Ct. 651, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 1060; Denver v. Domedian, 15 Colo. App. 36, 60 Pac. 1107; Hazelton v. Porter, 17 Colo. App. 1, 67 Pac. 170.

We agree with counsel that the Revenue Act of which Section 5687, supra, is a part, should be considered as a whole. When thus done, it furnishes other evidence that the legislature intended this proviso to mean what it says, and that it was not intended thereby, or otherwise, that the capital stock of corporations either domestic or foreign, except banking institutions, should be taxed other than as the tax imposed upon the property of the corporation makes it a tax upon the stock. Sections 5575-5581, R. S. make specific provisions for the listing of lands, merchandise, manufactures, notes, bonds and book accounts, besides shares of stock in banking corporations, both state and national, but do not make any provisions for the listing of other corporate stock. Section 5584 provides for the deduction of debts from notes and credits in fixing the value upon the latter, but expressly provides that no such shall be allowed on account of any indebtedness payable upon, or for the capital stock of any corporation, or for the purchase of bonds, treasury notes or other securities of the United States not taxable, or other exempt property. The purpose of this is apparent; as corporate stock was not to be taxed separate and apart from the corporate property, it would be unfair to permit a deduction of debts for things which are not taxable by themselves, but this is not to say that the value of corporate stock is not competent to be considered by the assessor, for the purpose of ascertaining the value of the property of the corporation; to the contrary. Section 5591 makes the stock and bonds competent [223] evidence of the value of the entire plant of a corporation, either foreign or domestic, while Section 5592 provides that:

"The entire business, plant or enterprise, of such corporation shall be valued as a unit, and every element, subject or consideration wherein the use is in inseparable combination with a whole, of which it forms a part, and which gives to the corporation property an added value for the purposes of income or sale, shall be considered in fixing the value for taxable purposes."

These sections are a guide to the assessor in arriving at the value of the property owned by any corporation, foreign or domestic, but contain nothing which indicates that the stock itself is to be taxed, except as covered by the property of the corporation. Section 5659 requires the assessor to make out an abstract of the assessment in his county, stating in detail certain things among which he shall set forth the total assessed valuation of all shares in banking corporations, but nowhere is it required that the abstract shall show the value of other corporate stock either foreign or domestic. This is in harmony with the proviso to Section 5687 and is further evidence that there was to be no distinction between stock in foreign and domestic corporations.

It is urged that shares of stock in a foreign corporation are the personal property of the owner separate and distinct from the capital of the corporation, for which reason they form separate and distinct subjects for taxation, and should be thus taxed at the residence of the owner. Assuming they are personal property, they are inconsequential property, they are merely tokens or evidence of ownership of an interest in corporate property or the corporation, or something of the kind unnecessary to determine. If destroyed the holder loses nothing, he is still the owner of what they purported to represent. [224] It is of that class of property that its situs for the purpose of taxation is a matter of legislative control as is also the method to be provided for its assessment. In Tappan v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 19 Wall. 490, 22 U. S. (L. ed.) 189, the Supreme Court of the United States held that shares of stock in national banks are personal property, and though they are a species of personal property which in one sense is intangible and incorporeal, the law which created them could separate them from the person of their owner, for the purposes of taxation and give them a situs of their own. While this opinion pertains to stock in a national bank and sustains the validity of an Illinois law pertaining thereto, it recognizes that the situs of corporate stock for the purposes of taxation is a proper subject of legislation. At page 499 (22 U. S. (L. ed.) 189), the court says:

"Personal property, in the absence of any law to the contrary, follows the person of the owner, and has its situs at his domicile. But, for the purposes of taxation, it may be separated from him, and he may be taxed on its account at the place where it is actually located. These are familiar principles, and have been often acted upon in this court and in the courts of Illinois."

Shares of stock in National Banks are personal property. They are made so in express terms by the act of Congress under which such banks are organized. They are a species of personal property which is, in one sense, intangible and incorporeal, but the law which creates them may separate them from the person of their owner for the purposes of taxation, and give them a situs of their own.

It is conceded that it was within the power of the State to tax the shares of non-resident shareholders at the place where the bank was located, but it is claimed that under the constitution of the State resident shareholders could only be taxed at the places of their residence.

[225] But it is said to be a violation of the constitutional rule of uniformity to compel the owner of a bank share to submit to taxation for this part of his property at a place other than his residence, because other residents are taxed for their personal property where they reside. It is a sufficient answer to this proposition to say that all persons owning the same kind of property are taxed as he is taxed.

We have not felt called upon to consider whether the General Assembly could, under the provisions of the act of Congress, provide for the taxation of shareholders at any other place within the State than that in which the bank is located. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case that it might tax them there."

In Wright v. Southwestern R. Co. 64 Ga. 783, it was held that the situs of stock in a railroad company whose road lies outside of the state of Georgia is in the state where the road lies; and that although held by a resident of Georgia, it was not taxable there. Later, in Georgia R. etc. Co. v. Wright, 124 Ga. 596, 53 S. E. 251, it was held that by an act of the legislature approved after the former opinion that the former decision ceased to be the law, and for the purposes of taxation that the later act fixed the situs of such stock held by residents of that state in Georgia, for which reason it was properly taxable there. The substance of both opinions material to the present controversy is their recognition that the situs of such stock for the purposes of taxation is subject to legislative control. The latest declaration of that court upon the subject appears to be in the Georgia R. etc. Co. v. Wright, 125 Ga.

589, 54 S. E. 54, where, in commenting upon this subject, at page 595, the court says:

"The value of the shares depends upon the value [226] of the property of the corporation which issues them. Their situs for taxation is within limits subject to legislative declaration. The legislature may have even the right under our constitution to declare that the situs for taxation of shares of foreign stock held by a resident of Georgia is not in Georgia, but they clearly have the power to declare that shares of such stock have a situs for taxation in this State."

In commenting upon the answers to be made by taxpayers, the court at page 596 (54 S. E. 55), says:

"If the question calls for the disclosure of property which has an intrinsic value and is located within this State, then of course the property must be taxed, for the constitution imperatively requires that this shall be done. If, however, there is no question which compels the taxpayer to disclose the ownership of that which has no situs for taxation within this State, or which has no taxable value, when there is no legislative declaration to that effect, then the absence of the question indicates a legislative intent not to declare taxable that which has no intrinsic value, but which becomes taxable merely as a result of a law declaring it to have a taxable value."

In Smith v. Ramsey, 54 N. J. L. 546, 24 Atl. 445, it was held that stocks in foreign corporations owned by residents of New Jersey were exempt from taxation under the laws of that state. To the same effect are State v. Bentley, 23 N. J. L. 532; State v. Branin, 23 N. J. L. 484; State v. Jones, 38 N. J. L. 83; De Baun v. Smith, 55 N. J. L. 110, 25 Atl. 277; State v. Runyon, 41 N. J. L. 98; Jersey City Gaslight Co. v. Jersey City, 46 N. J. L. 194.

These cases are based upon the theory that a tax on the corporate property and on the stock of the corporation are identical, and was thus recognized by the legislature [227] in its acts which exempt from taxation the stock of foreign corporations held by resident taxpayers.

In People v. Campbell, 138 N. Y. 543, 34 N. E. 370, 20 L.R.A. 453, it was held that stocks in foreign corporations owned by residents of that state was capital employed outside the state and was not subject to taxation. In commenting at page 546 (34 N. E. 371, 20 L.R.A. 453), it is said:

"The stocks which the relator took in companies organized outside of this state stood for so much of the relator's capital, invested outside of the state. It took a portion of its capital to wit, a portion of its patent rights, and employed it outside of the state to purchase those stocks. Its property in those corporations, represented by its shares of stock was outside of this state, and was in no sense employed here. Those stocks had no situs here and were not taxable here under any system of taxation which has ever existed in this state."

This appears to have always been the rule in New York State.—People v. Tax Com'rs, 64 N. Y. 541; People v. Wemple, 133 N. Y. 323, 31 N. E. 238; People v. Wemple, 129 N. Y. 558, 29 N. E. 812; People v. Tax Com'rs, 4 Hun 595; People v. Tax Com'ra, 23 N. Y. 224; People v. Gardner, 51 Barb. 352; People v. Tax Com'rs, 5 Hun 200. The latest New York case called to our attention is People v. Knight, 173 N. Y. 255, 65 N. E. 1102.

Stock in two foreign corporations were purchased by a domestic corporation by an issue of bonds, the stock was also pledged to a trust company (a resident of that state) as collateral for the payment of the bonds, held, it was not subject to tax. In commenting at page 260 (65 N. E. 1103), the court said:

"This stock was part of the relator's capital or [228] general assets. Both companies are foreign corporations, the former being partly within and partly without the state and the latter entirely without the state. . . . The relator being the owner of these stocks, they constituted part of its capital, but that part of its capital was not employed within this state, and so this court has held. (People v. Campbell, 138 N. Y. 543, 34 N. E. 370, 20 L.R.A. 453; People v. Wemple, 148 N. Y. 690, 43 N. E. 176.)"

The case of State v. Kidd, 125 Ala. 413, 28 So. 480, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (188 U. S. 730, 23 S. Ct. 401, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 669), recognizes that the situs of corporate stock for the purposes of taxation is a matter that can be fixed by legislation; its holding is that unless fixed by statute its situs for the purposes of taxation is at the domicile of the owner. Other cases which sustain our conclusion in this respect are.—Dundee Mortgage, etc. Co. v. School Dist. No. 1, 19 Fed. 359; Savings, etc. Soc. v. Multnomah County, 169 U. S. 421, 18 S. Ct. 392, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 803; Mumford v. Sewall, 11 Ore. 67, 4 Pac. 585, 50 Am. Rep. 462; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 19, 11 S. Ct. 876, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 613; Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 6 S. Ct. 475, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 715; Detroit v. Board of Assessors, 91 Mich. 78, 51 N. W. 787, 16 L.R.A. 59; Thompson's Commentaries on Corporations, vol. 2, § 2846; Chesebrough v. San Francisco, 153 Cal. 559, 96 Pac. 288; Gillespie v. Gaston, 67 Tex. 599, 4 S. W. 248.

We are not intimating that the state cannot tax stocks of foreign corporations held by its residents and eliminate it from that of domestic corporations except as it is burdened by the taxes upon the property of the corporation; that question is not before us. In some states [229] such laws have been sustained but the cases thus holding are based upon statutes to that effect, or to the absence of any statute fixing their situs when they are made the subject of taxation by either constitutional or statutory provision. State v. Kidd, 125 Ala. 413, 28 So. 480; Kidd v. Alabama, 188 U. S. 730, 23 S. Ct. 401, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 669; Wright v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 195 U. S. 219, 25 S. Ct. 16, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 167; Bradley v. Bauder, 36 Ohio St. 28, 38 Am. Rep. 547; Lee v. Sturges, 46 Ohio St. 153, 19 N. E. 560, 2 L.R.A. 556; Sturges v. Carter, 114 U. S. 511, 5 S. Ct. 1014, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 240; San Francisco v. Fry, 63 Cal. 470; San Francisco v. Flood, 64 Cal. 504, 2 Pac. 264; Seward v. Rising Sun, 79 Ind. 351; Com. v. Lovell, 125 Ky. 491, 101 S. W. 970.

We cannot agree that the proviso to section 5687, supra, when applied to stocks of foreign corporations is in conflict with the constitution wherein it provides that all laws exempting from taxation property other than that mentioned, shall be void. Stocks in foreign corporations are no more potential than those in domestic corporations, and if this section conflicts with the constitution when applied to stocks in foreign corporations, it must in many cases fall when applied to those in domestic corporations. In addition to the authorities which hold that for the purposes of taxation the situs of stock in both foreign and domestic corporations is a matter which can be regulated by legislation, others disclose that such regulations are in no sense an exemption of any property from taxation. It is common knowledge that when our present revenue law was enacted, we had in this state, and probably always will have, many domestic as well as foreign corporations, with all their property within the state, many domestic corporations with practically no property within the state, others of each class with [230] part of their property within, and part without the state. The stocks of some of these corporations, both foreign and domestic, are all held by residents of this state; in others, all by non-residents; in others, part by residents and the remainder by non-residents. It follows that if the failure to tax the stock of a foreign corporation held by residents would create an exemption within the meaning of the constitution because it has no property within this state, it would apply as well to the stock of a domestic corporation when its property is without the state. Other illustrations could be made which disclose the unjustness of such a position in making it double taxation, etc., for instance, where the property of a foreign corporation is all within this state; in such case, when the stock is owned here, taxes would be paid upon both, while the domestic corporation and its stockholders residents of this state with practically all its property without the state, would pay no taxes upon either its stock or property in this state and only upon its property in the foreign jurisdiction.

Our constitution provides that all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and shall be levied and collected under general laws which shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property real and personal. If the position that Section 5687, supra, creates an exemption when applied to stock in a foreign corporation is correct, it would equally apply to stock in many domestic corporations for city and county taxes. Stocks owned by a resident of one city and county, when the domestic corporation and all its property is situate in another city and county, is not taxed to the owner at the city and county of his residence, and pays no taxes there for city and county purposes. If the corporation and its property [231] are situate outside of any city, although the owner of the stock is a resident of a city, he pays no city tax thereon at all, and while we concede that the limits of a city or county are different from state lines, yet to this extent, if it is an exemption of personal property prohibited by the constitution, the result would be the same when applied to such local taxes; but we cannot agree that it is an exemption within the meaning of the constitution. Counsel overlook the latter part of this section wherein it provides that the legislature shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property real and personal. This is what the legislature has attempted by providing that corporate stock shall be deemed to represent corporate property, etc. This is a regulation for the purposes of taxation and is of that class contemplated by the constitution.—Stanley v. Little Pittsburgh Min. Co. 6 Colo. 415; Arapahoe County v. Rocky Mountain News Printing Co. 15 Colo. App. 189, 61 Pac. 494; Carlisle v. Pullman P. C. Co. 8 Colo. 320, 7 Pac. 164, 54 Am. Rep. 553; Arapahoe County v. Denver Union Water Co. 32 Colo. 382, 76 Pac. 1060; In re Taxation of Mining Claims, 9 Colo. 635, 21 Pac. 476; People v. Henderson, 12 Colo. 369, 21 Pac. 144; Ames v. People, 26 Colo. 83, 56 Pac. 656; American Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Adams, 28 Colo. 119, 63 Pac. 410.

A somewhat similar regulation is that which provides for the deduction of debts from credits in the case of the individual taxpayer. Such deductions might be considered as meaning an exemption, but it has generally been accepted as constitutional, as being a

Whether the owner resides where the corporation is organized or takes them to another state, all of the essential incidents of personal property attach to them in his hands. If he is wrongfully deprived of them, he may maintain an action for their conversion, as he would for the conversion of a horse or a promissory note. Doyle v. Burns, 123 Ia. 488. If he dies intestate, their distribution to his heirs is governed by the law of his domicile, and not by the law of the corporate domicile. McKee v. Northampton County, 49 Pa. St. 519, 88 Am. Dec. 515. If such shares be personalty in the nature of chose in action, representing valuable rights personal to the owner, no good reason can be assigned why they should not be governed by the usual rule, which makes such property taxable at the owner's domicile. With but very little discord in the cases, save as objection has been occasionally made in academic discussions, such taxation is upheld by all of the courts. . . . True it is that, in granting a charter or in providing a general law for the organization of corporations, the Legislature may reserve the right to tax the shares of stock direct to the corporation, as is done by our own statute with reference to state banks; and by force of the statute in such cases the situs of the shares for taxation by such state remains in the place of the corporate domicile, without regard to the residence of the holder; but in the absence of such restriction the state has no power to lay a tax upon shares owned by persons residing out of its territorial jurisdiction. . . . It is urged, however, that even if the general rule be conceded to be as stated, still, where the effect of its application is to impose double taxation, the courts will refuse to apply it. Few will be disposed to deny that double taxation, within the proper meaning of that expression, is not favored in law. . . . But the trouble with the appellee's case is in the fact that the taxation which they are here resisting is not double within the rule to which they appeal. Each state is sovereign within its own territorial jurisdiction, and its power to tax any and all property therein, except such as is in actual transit through it, cannot be taken away, limited, or lessened by the act of the taxing authorities of any other state. . . . When a state finds property within its jurisdiction, it is not necessary, before taxing it, to investigate and ascertain whether any other state has already taxed it or asserts the right so to do; and if it happens that two or more jurisdictions have levied a tax upon the same item or description of property for the same period it is not double taxation within the condemnation of the law. A double taxation, obnoxious to the rule, is where the second or additional burden is imposed by the same sovereignty which imposed the first." In Appeal Tax Court v. Gill, 50 Md. 377, the court said: "The property, owned by a shareholder in a corporation, is so different and distinct from the property owned by the corporation, that its distinctive character is not affected by the nature of the property of the corporation. The property of the corporation may be wholly real estate. The shares of its stock are personal property only. . . . The necessary conclusion would seem to be, that shares in a corporation, incorporated by another state, owned by residents of this state, constitute a separate and special property, belonging to the respective shareholders, wholly distinct from the capital of the corporation, and from the property in which that capital is invested. . . . The most complete proof that the property belonging to the corporation, and the shares in such corporation in the hands of the holders of such shares, are distinct and separate properties, is the conclusion reached by the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent case of Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 687 [24 U. S. (L. ed.) 560], that the property of a corporation and the shares of a corporation may both be taxed in the hands of their respective owners, by the state in which such corporation has its situs, and in which also such shareholders reside, and that such taxation is not double. In that case it was declared to be 'settled beyond doubt,' that a tax upon a corporation was a different thing from a tax upon the individual shareholders of stock in the corporation; that the property of the corporation, and the shares of stock of that corporation in the hands of stockholders were different properties, and were consequently distinct subjects for taxation; and that an exemption of the one was not itself an exemption of the other, nor the taxation of the one a tax upon the other in such a sense as to interfere with any exemption the latter might have from taxation. The ruling, thus made, has been affirmed in the recent case of Dewing v. Perdicaries, 96 U. S. 196 [24 U. S. (L. ed.) 650]. If shares of stock in a corporation, incorporated by this state, owned by a shareholder residing in this state, constitute a property separate from that owned by the corporation, and are liable to taxation as the property of such shareholder, whether the property of the corporation be taxed by this state, or not, it certainly follows that shares of stock in a corporation incorporated by another state are when owned by a resident of this state, liable to taxation by this state, whether the property of such non-resident corporation be taxed by the state in which it has its situs, or not." So in State v. Nelson, 107 Minn. 319, 119 N. W. 1058, the court said: "The statute in question does not violate the mandate of our constitution as to uniformity and equality in taxation nor deny to a resident holder of shares of stock in a foreign corporation the equal protection of the laws, in that such stock is taxed, but stock of a domestic corporation is not. The constitutional provisions of this state as to equality and uniformity of taxation have reference only to property within this state, and neither the statutes of another state nor the action of its taxing officers can affect the question. In the case of a stockholder in a domestic corporation, he is taxed in this state on his interest in the corporation when the corporation pays the tax on its property; but in the case of a foreign corporation, a resident holder of its stock is not and cannot be taxed in this state on his interest in the property of such corporation, except by taxing therein his shares of stock. The result is that each of such stockholders is taxed once, and once only, on his property within the state, and that the statute, eliminating the laws and acts of taxing officers of other states, is equal and uniform in its operation as to persons and property within the state. Similarly it was said in Bradley v. Bauder, 36 Ohio St. 28, 38 Am. Rep. 547, "The argument is: that the capital of the corporation is invested in property which is taxed in the name of the corporation, and that the shares in the capital stock, when owned by individuals, only represent proportions in the ownership of such property, and hence, to tax the shares in another mode of taxing the property of the corporation, and that a tax upon both, although the tax upon one is imposed by another state, violates the rule or principle of equality established by the constitution. This argument, however plausible it seems, has never met with favor from the courts. Double taxation, in a legal sense, does not exist, unless the double tax is levied upon the same property within the same jurisdiction. Here the property owned by the plaintiffs is not only not the same as that owned by the corporation, but its situs, so far as shares of stock are capable of one, is in a different state."

It is permissible for a state to tax the stock of a foreign corporation owned within its borders and exempt from taxation, the stock of a domestic corporation. Kidd v. Alabama, 188 U. S. 730, 23 S. Ct. 401, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 669, wherein it was said: "We see nothing to prevent a state from taxing stock in some domestic corporations and leaving stock in others untaxed on the ground that it taxes the property and franchises of the latter to an amount that imposes indirectly a proportional burden on the stock. When we come to corporations formed and having their property and business elsewhere, the state must tax the stock held within the state if it is to tax anything, and we now are assuming the right to tax anything, and we now are assuming the right to tax stock in foreign corporations to be conceded. If it does tax that stock it may take into account that the property and franchise of the corporation are untaxed, on the same ground that it might do the same thing with a domestic corporation. There is no rule that the state cannot look behind the present net values of different stocks. See American Sugar Refining Co. v. Louisiana, 179 U. S. 89 [21 S. Ct. 43, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 102]. We say that the state in taxing stock may take into account the fact that the property and franchises of the corporation are untaxed, whereas in other cases they are taxed; and we say untaxed, because they are not taxed by the state in question. The real grievance in a case like the present is that, more than probably, they are taxed elsewhere. But with that the state of Alabama is not concerned. No doubt it would be a great advantage to the country and to the individual states if principles of taxation could be agreed upon which did not conflict with each other, and a common scheme could be adopted by which taxation of substantially the same property in two jurisdictions could be avoided. But the constitution of the United States does not go so far." And see Sturges v. Carter, 114 U. S. 511, 5 S. Ct. 1014, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 240.

Applicability of Tax Laws.

GENERAL RULE.

According to the great weight of authority a tax law subjecting to taxation in general terms all personal property within the state renders shares of stock in a foreign corporation owned by a resident of the state liable to taxation.

The argument adduced against the taxability of shares in a foreign corporation is that since the property of the corporation, and in many cases its stock, is taxed at its domicile, a construction exempting the stock is required to prevent a double taxation. In answer to such a contention it was said in Dwight v. Boston, 12 Allen (Mass.) 316, 90 Am. Dec. 149: "But our whole system of taxation, as established and practiced, is to disregard the liability of shares in foreign corporations to taxation in the states where they are situated. Thus shares in foreign railroad corporations held by citizens of this state are fully taxed here, and no deduction is made for any taxation to which the corporations are subject in the states where they are situated. So it is in regard to shares held by our citizens in banks, insurance companies and other moneyed corporations, situated in other states. Such shares, when held by our citizens, are here treated as so much personal estate, following the person of the owner, and taxable at their full value in this commonwealth, regardless of what may be the foreign law as to taxation of the capital or any part of it elsewhere." So in Holton v. Bangor, 23 Me. 264, the court said: "If a person chooses to employ his visible and tangible personal property within a jurisdiction, where he has no domicile, thereby receiving, it may be, peculiar favor from its laws, and subjecting them to the charge of its protection, it may not be unjust or unreasonable, that it should be subjected to taxation within that jurisdiction, although it may be considered as following the person of the owner, and subject to taxation there also. The state must be the judge of its rights and duties in such cases; and the persons may relieve themselves from the possibility of a double burden by a disposition of their property, or by a change of their domicile." Similarly in the case of Greenleaf v. Board of Review, 184 Ill. 226, 56 N. E. 295, 75 Am. St. Rep. 168, it was said: "A share of stock in a corporation is personal estate, and in the absence of any statute to the contrary is taxable to the owner as other personal estate, at the place of his residence, whether the corporation be foreign or domestic." In Bacon v. State Tax Com'rs, 126 Mich. 22, 85 N. W. 307, 86 Am. St. Rep. 524, 60 L.R.A. 321, the court said: "We think the determination of this question is for the legislature, and not subject to review by the courts. It appears from the statute itself that shares in foreign corporations are taxed in this state but once, and the shares in domestic corporations or their representatives are also taxed. The question of the effect of statutes of foreign states cannot be considered, nor can such statutes have any effect in this state upon the question of the uniformity of the rules of taxation. The stock has a situs in this state, and is subject to the control of the legislature for the purpose of taxation."

The few cases which are contrary to the general rule heretofore stated base their refusal to follow that rule on a denial of the proposition that the stock of a corporation is a property right of the stockholder separate and distinct from the property of the corporation. State v. Lesser, 237 Mo. 310, 141 S. W. 888; People v. Tax Com'rs, etc. 4 Hun 595, affirmed 62 N. Y. 630; People v. Tax Com'rs, 5 Hun 200, affirmed 64 N. Y. 541; People v. Campbell, 88 Hun 544, 34 N. Y. S. 801; McKennon v. McFall, 127 Tenn. 393, 155 S. W. 158. Thus in People v. Tax Com'rs, etc. 4 Hun 595, affirmed 62 N. Y. 630, it was said: "Such corporations are taxable, and we must presume, in the absence of proof, that taxes in their respective home states, are duly assessed and collected upon their capital stock or property. The stocks in such corporations, held by individuals here, are simple representatives of capital or property employed in business in other states, the title of which is vested in, and controlled by, the artificial person created by and residing in such states. They represent an interest which is, or may become a membership in the corporation, and evidence of a right to participate in divided profit, and in the ultimate dividend of surplus, after the payment of all debts and obligations of the corporation. The stock certificates are not themselves the property, but are evidences of the rights just mentioned, to be possessed, enjoyed and enforced, under and in conformity with the laws of the state which created the body corporate." The authorities maintaining the contrary view as to the nature of corporate stock, many of which are beyond the scope of the present discussion are collated in Morrill v. Bentley, 150 Ia. 677, 130 N. W. 734, wherein the view accepted in most jurisdictions was tersely stated as follows: "The expression 'shares of stock,' when qualified by words indicating number and ownership, express the extent of the owner's interest in the corporation property. The interest is equitable, and does not give him the right of ownership of specific property of the corporation. But he does own the specific stock held in his name, and under the rules of law the property of the corporation is held by the corporation in trust for the stockholders. It will be readily seen that a share of stock is a thing owned by the stockholder."

The fact that the foreign corporation has some property within the state on which it pays taxes does not exempt its stock in the hands of a resident. Hunt v. Allen County, 82 Kan. 824, 109 Pac. 106; Com. v. Lovell, 125 Ky. 491, 101 S. W. 970. Neither does an exemption of property in another state which is fully taxed therein exempt locally owned shares in a foreign corporation. Lockwood v. Weston, 61 Conn. 211, 23 Atl. 9. But stock in a foreign corporation whose entire property is within the state is exempt. See infra the subdivision Limitations of Rule.

LIMITATIONS OF RULE.

If all the property of a foreign corporation is within the state and is subject to taxation, shares of stock in that corporation stand on the same footing with respect to taxation as stock in a domestic corporation. Patterson v. Wilson County, 83 Kan. 224, 109 Pac. 790; Com. v. Ledman, 127 Ky. 603, 106 S. W. 247; Stroh v. Detroit, 131 Mich. 109, 90 N. W. 1029; Hubbard v. Brush, 61 Ohio St. 252, 55 N. E. 829. A like rule has been applied with respect to stock in a foreign corporation paying a franchise tax in the state. Com. v. Walsh, 133 Ky. 102, 106 S. W. 240, 117 S. W. 398.

It has been held that a statutory exemption of corporate stock from taxation is applicable to stock in a foreign corporation. Tennessee Fertilizer Co. v. McFall, 128 Tenn. 645, 163 S. W. 806; State v. Leuch, 156 Wis. 121, 144 N. W. 290. And see the reported case. In State v. Leuch, supra, it was said: "It must be borne in mind that domestic corporations and all other corporations in the state are by this statute grouped together and the same rule fixed for all of that group. Besides, the legislation of a state is presumed to be regulatory of persons and property in that state unless otherwise expressed. Black, Interp. of Laws (2d ed.) pp. 91, 92, and cases cited. The statute in question including any corporation must include a foreign corporation which is for the purpose of taxation in this state. Indeed, that is the change made by the act of 1868. The exemption is limited to the shares of domestic corporations and to the shares of foreign corporations in this state; not foreign corporations generally, and to these two classes only when their property in this state is by the laws of this state taxed in the same manner as individuals."

In other cases the contrary view has been taken. Sturges v. Carter, 114 U. S. 511, 5 St. Ct. 1914, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 240 (Ohio Statute); Worthington v. Sebastian, 25 Ohio St. 1; Lee v. Sturges, 46 Ohio St. 153, 19 N. E. 560, 2 L.R.A. 556; Lander v. Burke, 65 Ohio St. 532, 63 N. E. 69. See also San Francisco v. Fry, 63 Cal. 470; San Francisco v. Flood, 64 Cal. 504, 2 Pac. 264; Morrill v. Bentley, 150 Ia. 677, 130 N. W. 734; So. v. State v. Kidd, 125 Ala. 413, 28 So. 480, in holding that an exemption of corporate stock applied to stock in domestic corporations only the court said: "The exemption of those shares is doubtless for the reason that elsewhere special provisions are made for taxing the property and privileges of the last named corporations, which provisions could have no application to foreign corporations having no property and doing no business here. As to shares in them, we find nothing in either Code which should be construed as an exemption. By subjecting them the state does not infringe its general policy of avoiding double taxation, for the property is not doubly taxed by its own laws; and it is not found, by comity or otherwise, to conform to laws elsewhere in order to shelter property from burdens which, but for such foreign laws, would not have come upon it."

A statute expressly exempting corporate stock which is taxed in another state, is applicable to stock in a corporation of a foreign country which is there taxed. Foster

v. Stevens, 63 Vt. 175, 22 Atl. 78, 13 L.R.A. 166.

In New Jersey the earlier cases supported the rule that stock of a foreign corporation owned by a resident is subject to taxation. State v. Branin, 23 N. J. L. 484; State v. Bentley, 23 N. J. L. 582; Newark City Bank v. Assessor, 30 N. J. L. 13; Mechanics, etc. Bank v. Bridges, 30 N. J. L. 112. But by the tax law of 1903 such stock is exempted if it is taxed in the state of the corporate domicile. State v. Ramsey, 54 N. J. L. 546; 24 Atl. 445; DeBaun v. Smith, 55 N. J. L. 110, 25 Atl. 277; Trenton v. Standard F. Ins. Co. 77 N. J. L. 757, 73 Atl. 606.

Taxation — Property Subject — Stock in Foreign Corporation.

Shares of stock in a foreign corporation are taxable as property to the owner, where he is resident within the commonwealth, although the place of business and the whole property of the corporation are in another jurisdiction.

[See note at end of this case.]

Stock in Domestic Corporation.

The state of Vermont has the power to tax all the shares of corporations organized under its laws, whether owned by its residents or those of other states or countries.

[See 13 Ann. Cas. 636.]

States — Relation to Each Other.

The several states of the Union are foreign to each other, except so far as the United States is the paramount government as to each, binding them to recognize the fraternity among their sovereignties established by the Constitution of the United States.

Taxation — Extraterritorial Effect of Laws.

No state taxation laws can have extraterritorial effect, since each state, except as to the United States, is an independent sovereignty, so far as relates to the power of taxation.

Property Subject.

All property within the jurisdiction of a state, which is capable of being taxed, may be subjected to taxation, unless exempted under federal or state law; but no state can assess to its residents a tax upon their realty or tangible personalty in a foreign jurisdiction.

Same.

Although no state can give extraterritorial effect to its laws exempting the property of its subjects from taxation, except as restrained by federal or state constitutional provisions, its power as to the mode, form, and extent of taxation is unlimited, where the subjects to which it applies are within its jurisdiction.

Situs of Property.

Shares in a corporation are "personal property," with its various incidents and attributes, attaching to and following the person of the owner for purposes of taxation in the jurisdiction of his domicile; his right of ownership in such stock being a property right distinct from the various contractual rights to participate in the corporation's profits and assets which his ownership gives him.

Same.

Property may constitutionally have a situs in two different jurisdictions for taxation purposes, when the nature of the property requires or permits it, such as the nature of corporate stock, since the federal Constitution does not prevent the conflict of state laws whereby taxation of the same property in two jurisdictions is possible.

Shares in Foreign Corporation.

The taxation of shares in a Vermont corporation, already taxed in Vermont to such corporation, owned by a resident of this jurisdiction, is not unconstitutional, as infringing the principle against double taxation of the same property, since such principle is confined in operation to double taxation in the same jurisdiction.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Tax Act (St. 1909, c. 490) part 3, § 41, provides that the tax commissioner shall ascertain the market value of corporate shares, and shall estimate therefrom the fair cash value of all the shares constituting the capital stock, which shall be taken as the true value of each corporation's corporate franchise, and that from such value there shall be deducted, in the case of a domestic business corporation, the value of its property situated in another state or country and subject to taxation therein. P. S. Vt. c. 30, § 516, provides that taxes assessed on corporate stock of nonresidents shall be paid by the corporation, which may hold such stock and the dividends thereon as security for the payment. A Massachusetts corporation, which owned shares in a Vermont corporation, was taxed thereon, and, suing to recover the tax, contended that the shares of stock which had been assessed to it were "property situated in another state and subject to taxation therein," within section 41, and so exempt from taxation. It is held that such shares were not such property, since the context in which the words occurred in the tax law demonstrated that they referred to the kind of property which, if owned by an individual and situated and taxed in another state, would be exempt from taxation in this commonwealth, such as real estate and "merchandise, machinery, and animals."

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The imposition of a property tax upon shares of stock in a Vermont corporation, owned by a domestic corporation, does not conflict with the constitutional guaranty of equal protection of the laws.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The imposition of a property tax upon the shares of a Vermont corporation, also taxed in Vermont, owned by a domestic corporation, does not conflict with the provision of the federal Constitution providing for the giving, in full faith and credit to the public acts of other states.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The imposition of a property tax upon shares of a Vermont corporation, owned by a domestic corporation, is not a deprivation of property without due process of law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The imposition of a property tax upon shares of a Vermont corporation, already taxed there, owned by a domestic corporation, is no impairment of any obligation of contracts; since it must be inferred that the tax law was in effect before the acquisition of stock by the domestic corporation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The imposition of a property tax upon shares of a Vermont corporation, owned by a domestic corporation, is constitutional.

Securities Owned by Domestic Corporation.

Tax Act (St. 1909, c. 490) part 3, § 43, provides that every corporation shall annually pay a tax upon its franchise, but the said tax shall not exceed a tax levied at a certain rate upon an amount 20 per cent. in excess of the value, as found by the tax commissioner, of its works, structures, real estate, machinery, poles, underground conduits, wires, pipes, merchandise, "and all securities which if owned by a natural person resident in this commonwealth would be liable to taxation." A domestic corporation owned a bond of a Vermont corporation, and contended that such bond was a debt due to it, and that if it were owned by a natural person resident in the commonwealth who owed money in excess of the value of the bond, as the corporation did, such natural person could not be taxed on the bond. It is held, that such domestic corporation could be taxed on the bond, since the expression of the statute, "securities which if owned by a natural person resident in this commonwealth would be liable to taxation," was not intended to establish the same standard of taxation for the corporation as for an individual; the reference to such securities being merely to determine the taxable character of the securities, which, if they possess such character, are to be taken into account in estimating the value of the corporate franchise, while, from its total assets as determining such value, the corporation is entitled, upon making proper return, to deduct its debts, and so cannot have them deducted a second time by utilizing them, after they have reduced its franchise value, to extinguish the taxable character of particular items of the corporation's property.

Same.

"Securities," as used in Tax Act (St. 1909, c. 490) part 3, § 41, providing that the tax upon the value of a corporate franchise of a domestic business corporation shall not exceed a tax levied at a certain rate upon an amount 20 per cent. in excess of the value of the works, etc., "and of the securities which if owned by a natural person resident in this commonwealth would be liable to taxation," is a word of sufficiently broad import to include bonds and other evidences of indebtedness.

On report from Supreme Judicial Court, Suffolk county.

Petition for recovery of tax. Bellows Falls Power Company, petitioner, and Commonwealth defendant. The facts are stated in the opinion. PETITION DISMISSED.

Richard K. Fitzgerald for petitioner.

Roger Sherman Hoar for defendant.

[52] RUGG, C. J.—This is a petition under St. 1909, c. 490, Part III, § 70, for the recovery of the amount of an excise alleged to have been excessive, which was levied upon a domestic business corporation under §§ 41 and 43 of Part III of the tax act, St. 1909, c. 490, as amended by St. 1914, c. 198, § 6. The questions presented are whether certain stocks and bonds of Vermont corporations are "securities which if owned by a natural person resident in this Commonwealth," by § 41 "would not be liable to taxation," or by § 43 "would be liable to taxation," and also whether such stock is "property situated in another State or country and subject to taxation therein" by § 41. The pertinent parts of the statute are printed in a footnote.¹

[52] ¹"Section 41. The tax commissioner shall ascertain from the returns or otherwise the true market value of the shares of each corporation subject to the requirements of the preceding section; and shall estimate therefrom the fair cash value of all of said shares constituting its capital stock on the preceding first day of April, which, unless by the charter of a corporation a different method of ascertaining such value is provided, shall, for the purposes of this part, be taken as the true value of its corporate franchise. From such value there shall be deducted:

"Third, In case of a domestic business corporation, the value of the works, struc-

[53] The petitioner owned a large number of shares of stock in a Vermont corporation, the value of which the tax commissioner refused to deduct from the true market value of the corporate franchise of the petitioner, for the purpose of determining its excise tax. It is contended by the petitioner that the tax commissioner was in error for two reasons, (1) because the stock of the Vermont corporation would not be subject to taxation in this Commonwealth if owned by a natural person, and (2) because such stock is property situated in another State and subject to taxation therein. These two contentions rest on statutes of the State of Vermont, which are printed in a footnote.¹

[54] Plainly these contentions would have no merit in law were it not for the special provisions of the Vermont statute. It was, early decided in this Commonwealth that shares of stock in a foreign corporation were taxable as property to the owner resident here, although the place of business and the entire property of the corporation were in another jurisdiction. Great Barrington v. Berkshire County Com'rs, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 572. This principle of taxation has been repeatedly upheld, the latest instance being Hawley v. Malden, 204 Mass. 138, 90 N. E. 415. That decision was affirmed in 232 U. S. 1, where, at pages 12 and 13, 34 S. Ct. 201, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 477, it was said by Mr. Justice Hughes in delivering the opinion: "Whether, in the case of corporations organized under State laws, a provision by the State of incorporation fixing the situs of shares for the purpose of taxation, by whomever owned, would exclude the taxation of the shares by other States in which their owners reside is a question which does not arise upon this record and need not be decided." We are not aware that this question ever has been determined by this court or by the Supreme Court of the United States. It now is presented. It must be taken as the settled purpose of our tax law to assess to the owners resident in this Commonwealth a tax upon all shares of foreign corporations. It is provided in the tax act (St. 1909, c. 490) in Part I, § 2, that "All property real and personal situated within the Commonwealth, and all personal property of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth wherever situated, unless exempted by law, shall be subject to taxtures, real estate, machinery, poles, underground conduits, wires and pipes owned by it within the Commonwealth subject to local taxation, and of securities which if owned by a natural person resident in this Commonwealth would not be liable to taxation; also the value of its property situated in another State or country and subject to taxation therein. There shall not be deducted the value of securities which if owned by a natural person resident in this Commonwealth would be liable to taxation, nor shall there be deducted the value of any shares of stock of the corporation itself owned directly or indirectly by it or for its benefit; and the tax commissioner in determining [53] for the purposes of taxation the value of the corporate franchise of any debts of such corporation shall not take into consideration any debts of such corporation unless the returns required from it contain a statement duly signed and sworn to, setting forth that no part of such debts was incurred for the purpose of reducing the amount of taxes to be paid by it."

"Section 43. [Clause 1.] Every corporation subject to the provisions of section forty shall annually pay a tax upon its corporate franchise, after making the deductions provided for in section forty-one, at a rate equal to the average of the annual rates for three years preceding that in which such assessment is laid, . . . [Clause 2.] but the said tax upon the value of the corporate franchise of a domestic business corporation, after making the deductions provided for in section forty-one, shall not exceed a tax levied at the rate aforesaid upon an amount, less said deductions, twenty per cent. in excess of the value, as found by the tax commissioner, of the works, structures, real estate, machinery, poles, underground conduits, wires and pipes, and merchandise, and of securities which if owned by a natural person resident in this Commonwealth would be liable to taxation; and [Clause 3.] the total amount of the tax to be paid by such corporation in any year upon its property locally taxed in this Commonwealth and upon the value of its corporate franchise shall amount to not less than one tenth of one per cent. of the market value of its capital stock at the time of said assessment as found by the tax commissioner."

"Sec. 515. Listed how. Shares of stock in corporations, except railroad corporations, shall be set in the list like other personal estate to the owner thereof, in the town where he resides, if he resides in the State, otherwise in the town where the corporation issuing such stock has its principal place of business.

"Sec. 516. Tax on non-resident's stock. Taxes assessed on such stock of non-residents shall be paid by the corporation, and it shall hold such stock [54] and the dividends thereon as security for such payment and may deduct the amount from any dividends payable to such shareholders."

"Sec. 496. Property. The following property shall be exempt from taxation. . . .

"III. Shares of stock in a corporation situated in another State, when all the stock of such corporation is taxed in such State to the holders, whether residing within or without such State, or when the corporation is taxed in such State for all its stock."

ation." Part I, § 23, provides that "All personal estate, within or without the Commonwealth, shall be assessed to the owner in the city or town in which he is an inhabitant on the first day" of April, with exceptions not here material, save that by St. 1909, c. 516, § 1, "Merchandise, machinery and animals owned by the inhabitants of this Commonwealth, but situated in another State shall be exempt [56] from taxation." Part I, § 4, provides that "Personal estate for the purpose of taxation shall include . . . Third, Public stocks and securities, . . . bonds of railroads and street railways, stocks in turnpikes, bridges and moneyed corporations within or without this Commonwealth . . ." with exceptions not now of consequence. In substance, the only question is whether these provisions of the law, which plainly include in their scope stock such as is owned by this petitioner in the Vermont corporation, conflict as applied to such shares with any provision of the State or federal constitution.

Vermont has the power to tax all the shares of corporations organized under its laws, whether owned by its residents or by those of other States or countries. This expressly was decided in Corry v. Baltimore, 196 U. S. 460, 25 S. Ct. 297, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 558, and in St. Albans v. National Car Co. 57 Vt. 68. The principle was applied in Tappan v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 19 Wall. 490, 22 U. S. (L. ed.) 189. It was recognized in Greves v. Shaw, 173 Mass. 203, 208, 53 N. E. 372; Kingsbury v. Chapin, 196 Mass. 533, 535, 13 Ann. Cas. 738, 82 N. E. 700, and Kennedy v. Hodges, 215 Mass. 112, 114, 102 N. E. 432.

It may be urged on the one side that the nature and the incidents of the shares of stock are fixed by the law by which the corporation is created; that the provisions of that law are limitations upon the essential characteristics of shares and follow them wherever they may go; and that if the situs of the shares for purpose of taxation is declared by that law to be in the State of its domicile, that is an inherent restriction which everywhere must be recognized as an incident of the property represented by the shares; that this provision as to situs for tax purposes is contractual in substance and may be invoked by the owner in exoneration of liability as much as others which are obligatory are resorted to by creditors to establish a liability. Converse v. Ayer, 197 Mass. 443, 453, 84 N. E. 98; Whitman v. Oxford Nat. Bank, 176 U. S. 559, 20 S. Ct. 477, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 687; that by virtue of the Vermont statute this stock is divested of its taxable character as intangible property and clothed with an immovable garment of tangibility located in Vermont alone, and hence, that these shares stand on the same footing as merchandise and other tactile personal effects which cannot be taxed to their owner in a jurisdiction other than that in which they permanently are placed. Delaware, etc. [56] Western R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 198 U. S. 341, 25 S. Ct. 669, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 1077; Old Dominion Steamship Co. v. Virginia, 198 U. S. 290, 3 Ann. Cas. 1100, 25 S. Ct. 686, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 1059. Expressions by eminent judges are laid hold of as countenancing the soundness of these contentions. It was said by Chief Justice Waite in Tappan v. Merchants' National Bank, 19 Wall. 490, at page 499, 22 U. S. (L. ed.) 189. "Shares of stock in national banks are personal property. . . . They are a species of personal property which is, in one sense, intangible and incorporeal, but the law which creates them may separate them from the person of their owner for the purposes of taxation, and give them a situs of their own. This has been done. [Here is quoted the section of the national banking act to that effect.] This is a law of the property. Every owner takes the property subject to this power of taxation under State authority, and every nonresident, by becoming an owner, voluntarily submits himself to the jurisdiction of the State in which the bank is established for all the purposes of taxation on account of his ownership." In Covington v. Covington First Nat. Bank, 198 U. S. 100, at page 111, 25 S. Ct. 562, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 963, it was said by Mr. Justice Day, "The situs of shares of foreign-held stock in an incorporated company, in the absence of legislation imposing a duty upon the company to return the stock within the State as the agent of the owner, is at the domicile of the owner." It is to be noted, however, that both these cases relate to shares in national banks. The subject of national banking is within the exclusive control of Congress and its mandate respecting any subject within its sphere is supreme and binding upon all the States. The national bank act is explicit as to the situs of shares of stock in national banks for taxation. These expressions, therefore, were directed to a different subject and are of slight value in considering the present question, which expressly was left open in Hawley v. Malden, 232 U. S. 1, 13, 34 S. Ct. 201, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 477. See Grether v. Wright, 75 Fed. 742, 43 U. S. App. 770, 23 C. C. A. 498, 512.

Weighty as are the suggestions which have been noted above, we are of opinion that the constitutionality of the statute requiring the taxation of shares like these in question must be sustained. The fundamental ground is that the power to tax all property within its jurisdiction is a necessary attribute of sovereignty, and that there is a certain quality of property in these shares attaching to the person of the owner and hence taxable at his domicile.

[57] It is too well settled to require the citation of authorities that the several States of the Union are foreign to each other except so far as the United States is paramount as the dominating government, and except so far as they are bound to recognize the fraternity among sovereignties established by the Constitution of the United States. No state taxation laws can have extraterritorial effect. Each State, so far as relates to the power of taxation, is an independent sovereignty. It is not concerned with what other States may do as to property within its jurisdiction, which may be made the subject of taxation by itself. Dwight v. Boston, 12 Allen (Mass.) 316, 90 Am. Dec. 149; Sturges v. Carter, 114 U. S. 511, 5 S. Ct. 1014, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 249; Seward v. Rising Sun, 79 Ind. 351; Bacon v. State Tax Com'rs 126 Mich. 22, 85 N. W. 397, 86 Am. St. Rep. 524, 60 L.R.A. 321; Judy v. Beckwith, 137 Ia. 24, 15 Ann. Cas. 890, 114 N. W. 565, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 142; McKeen v. Northampton County, 49 Pa. St. 519, 88 Am. Dec. 515; State v. Branin, 23 N. J. L. 484, 496; Bradley v. Bauder, 36 Ohio St. 28, 38 Am. Rep. 547; Ogden v. St. Joseph, 90 Mo. 522, 529, 3 S. W. 25. Com. v. Lovell, 125 Ky. 491, 101 S. W. 970; Stanford v. San Francisco, 131 Cal. 34, 63 Pac. 145. All property within the jurisdiction of a State, which is capable of being taxed, may be made subject to taxation unless exempted under federal or State law. No State can assess to its residents a tax upon their real estate or tangible personal property situated in a foreign jurisdiction. Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 194, 4 Ann. Cas. 493; 26 S. Ct. 86, 50 U. S. (L. ed.) 150. Neither can any State give extraterritorial effect to its laws exempting property of its subjects from taxation in other jurisdictions. But, except as restrained by federal or State constitutional provisions, "the power of the State as to the mode, form, and extent of taxation is unlimited, where the subjects to which it applies are within her jurisdiction." Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 491, 497, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 558.

There is a necessary element of property in shares in corporations which, although intangible, attaches to and follows the person of the owner, and is inseparable from it. Such shares are personal property and not real estate. They are subject to succession according to the law of the domicile of the owner. As was said in Hawley v. Malden, 232 U. S. 1, at page 9; 34 S. Ct. 201, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 477. "It is well settled that the property of the shareholders in their respective shares is distinct from the corporate property, franchises and capital stock," and further at page 12, that shares of stock are "in the nature of contract rights or choses in action. Morawetz on Corporations, [58] § 225." It was held in Stanwood v. Stanwood, 17 Mass. 57, in an opinion written by Chief Justice Parker, that shares of stock in a bank were choses in action. The principle of that decision applies to shares of stock in all corporations. It is an incident of such shares that the owner is entitled to participate in the net profits earned, to enforce the use of its capital for its corporate purposes, to restrain abuses of corporate powers, and to receive his proportion of the property of the corporation remaining after the payment of its debts upon its dissolution. Van Allen v. The Assessors, 3 Wall. 573, 584, 18 U. S. (L. ed.) 229; Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 679, 687, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 558. In most corporations he has the further right in proportion to his ownership to participate in the election of officers and such direction of the corporate affairs as may be vested in stockholders. Certificates of stock may be the subject of contracts for sale or exchange under our laws. Opinion of Justices, 196 Mass. 603, 619, 621, 85 N. E. 545. Our laws may be invoked to enforce such contracts and other property rights. Herbert v. Simson, 220 Mass. 480, 108 N. E. 65, L.R.A. 1915D 733, as well as to protect the owner and his property interest therein against theft or fraud. His property right as such owner may be attached and secured by his creditors by resort to our courts, and in many instances doubtless this is the only way of reaching such right in any jurisdiction. This property right follows the person of the owner, has its situs at his domicile and is there taxable regardless of any law of a sister State by whose authority the corporation itself may have been created.

Certificates of stock in a corporation have other of the characteristics of property. They may be converted like corporeal personal property. Jarvis v. Rogers, 15 Mass. 389; Hagar v. Norton, 188 Mass. 47, 50, 73 N. E. 1073; McAllister v. Kuhn, 96 U. S. 87, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 615. They are the subject of larceny and embezzlement. O'Herron v. Gray, 168 Mass. 573, 575, 47 N. E. 429, 60 Am. St. Rep. 411, 40 L.R.A. 498. They may be hypothecated, pledged and replevied. Kennedy v. Hodges, 215 Mass. 112, 115, 102 N. E. 432. They may be made by statute subject to attachment and garnishment. Puget Sound Nat. Bank v. Mather, 60 Minn. 362, 62 N. W. 396. Title passes by their delivery and assignment or endorsement. Sargent v. Essex Marine Ry. Corp. 9 Pick (Mass.) 202; Sargent v. Franklin Ins. Co. 8 Pick (Mass.) 90, 95, 19 Am. Dec. 306; Boston Music Hall Assoc. v. Cory, 129 Mass. 435. Certificates of stock are not in every respect the equivalent of the shares in the corporation which they [59] represent. Often they are spoken of as evidence of title, Kennedy v. Hodges, ubi supra, Richardson v. Shaw, 209 U. S. 365, 378, 28 S. Ct. 512, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 835; but they may be regarded as something more. Indeed, it was said in Hatch v. Reardon, 204 U. S. 152, 161, 27 S. Ct. 188, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 413, respecting a certificate of stock, "That document was more than evidence, it was a constituent of title. No doubt, in a more remote sense, the object was the membership or share which the certificate conferred or made attainable. More remotely still it was an interest in the property of the corporation, which might be in other States than either the corporation or the certificate of stock." In Merritt v. American Steel-Barge Co. 79 Fed. 228, 49 U. S. App. 85, 24 C. C. A. 530, at page 537, is found this language: "Speaking technically, it is true that a stock certificate is written evidence of a certain interest in corporate property. . . . But in the business world such obligations or securities are treated as something more than mere muniments of title. They are daily bought and sold like ordinary chattels, . . . they have an inherent market value, and, while differing in some respects from chattels, they are generally classified as personal property." Said Cooley, C. J., in Daggett v. Davis, 53 Mich. 35, 18 N. W. 548, 51 Am. Rep. 91, respecting the characteristics of stock in a corporation, "the certificate itself is also property; standing as it does as the representative of the shares." In Simpson v. Jersey City Contracting Co. 165 N. Y. 193, 197, 198, 58 N. E. 896, 55 L.R.A. 796, occur these words: "Certificates of stock are treated by business men as property for all practical purposes. They are sold in the market and they are transferred as collateral security for loans, and they are used in various ways as property. They pass by delivery from hand to hand." In Cook on Corporations, (7th ed.) § 485, it is said, "certificates of stock have gradually grown to be more than mere receipts or evidence of stock; and have come to be the stock itself, practically, in business transactions . . . and, like a promissory note, a certificate of stock is property in itself." While some of these expressions go rather far, enough has been said to show a generally prevailing tendency to treat a certificate of stock as possessing incidents of property. These are a sufficient basis for taxation to the owner at his residence. The validity of a commercial usage whereby possession of a certificate of stock duly indorsed enables the holder to pass title good against the world has been recognized in numerous cases. Russell v. American Bell Telephone [60] Co. 180 Mass. 467, 62 N. E. 751; Andrews v. Worcester, etc. Co. 159 Mass. 64, 66, 33 N. E. 1109; Scollans v. Rollins, 173 Mass. 275, 53 N. E. 863, 73 Am. St. Rep. 284, 179 Mass. 346, 60 N. E. 983, 88 Am. St. Rep. 386; Clews v. Friedman, 182 Mass. 555, 66 N. E. 839; Baker v. Davie, 211 Mass. 429, 438, 97 N. E. 1094.

If the domiciliary State of the corporation has the right to establish the situs of its shares of stock for purposes of taxation, on principle it would seem that that power may be exercised to declare an entire exemption from taxation and to collect revenue in some other way from the corporation. If the power exists in the State creating the corporation to establish the situs of its shares of stock for the purpose of taxation, and is exercised, it must be absolute and no other State can inquire into the character or extent of that taxation in an effort to tax its own citizen who is a stockholder in such corporation. It hardly seems possible that the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal constitution can have such an effect.

The theory of taxation is that it is money exacted from the subject in return for the protection afforded by established government. It is the duty of governments to protect persons and property. These rights of the Massachusetts owner of shares of stock in the Vermont corporation pertain to his residence here and receive the protection of our laws. To that extent the shareholder resident here receives for the taxation imposed a return in governmental protection for the property rights incident to his ownership.

These are incidents of property which necessarily follow the person of the owner of shares in foreign corporations, even though the shares may be taxed at the foreign domicile of the corporation. For these purposes the situs of corporate shares follows the domicile of the owner. This is the general rule. There appears to us to be no ground for the establishment of an exception to that general rule in the instant case. Bristol v. Washington County, 177 U. S. 133, 20 S. Ct. 585; Ayer, etc. Tie Co. v. Kentucky, 202 U. S. 409, 6 Ann. Cas. 205, 26 S. Ct. 679, 50 U. S. (L. ed.) 1082; Southern Pac. Co. v. Kentucky, 222 U. S. 63, 69, 32 S. Ct. 13, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 96; Darnell v. Indiana, 226 U. S. 390, 33 S. Ct. 120, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 267; Frothingham v. Shaw, 175 Mass. 59, 55 N. E. 623, 78 Am. St. Rep. 475; Welch v. Boston, 221 Mass. 155, 109 N. E. 174. On this ground, if not on others also, Selliger v. Kentucky, 213 U. S. 200, 29 S. Ct. 449, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 761, is distinguishable.

The case at bar closely resembles Bonaparte v. Tax Ct. [61] 104 U. S. 592, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 845, where municipal and State bonds, some entirely exempted from taxation and others subject to taxation in the State of issue by the State laws under which they were authorized, nevertheless were held to be taxable at the domicile of the owner. In principle that case seems indistinguishable from the case at bar. An express legislative declaration by the debtor State that its bonds either shall be exempt from taxation or shall be subject to taxation in its own jurisdiction, although not categorically an attempt to separate the situs of the debt from the person of the owner, yet is in substance the equivalent of a declaration to that end. It is a legislative effort to incorporate into the property as one of its essential qualities an exemption from taxation or a liability to taxation in the State of issue alone. It is hard to conceive of a purpose on the part of that State not to attach by strong inference and fair implication a separation of situs for taxation from the domicile of the owner to bonds so issued, if the effective exercise of such a function were within the scope of legislative power. Indeed, the Vermont statute is not a precise assertion of separation of situs of shares from the person of the non-resident owner. It is a simple exercise of the power of the sovereign to tax. That was the effect of one of the statutes under consideration in Bonaparte v. Tax Ct. 104 U. S. 592, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 845. The barrier against accomplishing that purpose in such way as to compel recognition by the taxing power of a sister State was no greater in substance in that case than it is in the present case.

It has been held that the State having jurisdiction over the debtor has the constitutional power to assert and maintain for itself a situs of the debt for purposes of taxation and levy a tax thereon against the creditor domiciled in another State. This was decided as to debts secured by mortgage upon real estate in Savings, etc. Soc. v. Multnomah County, 169 U. S. 421, 18 S. Ct. 392, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 803. It was decided as to unsecured credits, whether expressed by notes or existing as bald accounts current, in Liverpool, etc. Ins. Co. v. Parish of Orleans, 221 U. S. 346, 31 S. Ct. 550, L.R.A.1915C 903; Bonaparte v. Tax Ct. upheld the power of the State having jurisdiction of the creditor owning the debt to tax him at his domicile upon the maximum mobilia sequuntur personam, despite the express tax or exemption from taxation by the State having jurisdiction where the debt was created and the debtor domiciled, [62] while the Multnomah County and Orleans cases sustained an exercise of the power to tax by the State having jurisdiction of the debtor regardless of what might happen in the State having jurisdiction of the creditor. The more comprehensive power of Congress as to taxation and exemption from taxation of subjects within its jurisdiction as compared with that of a State legislature is pointed out by Taft, J., in an opinion concurred in by Lurton, J., in Grether v. Wright, 43 U. S. App. 770, 23 C. C. A. 498, 512.

It is manifest from the adjudications by the United States Supreme Court mentioned above that under some circumstances the same property may be taxed to the same person in different jurisdictions without violating any right secured by the federal constitution. Put in other words, these decisions appear to mean that property may have a situs in two different jurisdictions for taxation purposes when the nature of the property seems to require or permit it. There may be a difference between bonds and shares of stock as to capacity for independent situs. Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 189, 206, 23 S. Ct. 277, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 439; Selliger v. Kentucky, 213 U. S. 200, 204, 75 Fed. 742. But there appears to be no ground for distinction between shares of stock and accounts current so far as concerns the issue here involved. This principle governs the case at bar. It shows that Corry v. Baltimore, 196 U. S. 466, 25 S. Ct. 297, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 556, is not inconsistent with this result, but that it bears the same relation to the present case as does Liverpool, etc. Ins. Co. v. Parish of Bonaparte v. Tax Ct. As was said in Kidd v. Alabama, 188 U. S. 730, at page 732, 23 S. Ct. 401, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 660, by Mr. Justice Holmes, as to taxation between sister States, "it would be a great advantage to the country and to the individual States if principles of taxation could be agreed upon which did not conflict with each other, and a common scheme could be adopted by which taxation of substantially the same property in two jurisdictions could be avoided. But the Constitution of the United States does not go so far."

There is an analogy so far as concerns situs between the case at bar and the numerous cases holding that residence of the owner is sufficient ground for the imposition of a succession or inheritance tax upon various kinds of intangible property. Forthingham v. Shaw, 175 Mass. 59, 55 N. E. 623, 78 Am. St. Rep. 475; Buck v. Beach, 206 U. S. 392, 11 Ann. Cas. 589, 27 S. Ct. 712, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 1106; Wheeler v. New York, 233 U. S. 434, 34 S. Ct. 607, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 1030.

[63] The principle against double taxation of the same property has no application, because that is confined in operation to such taxation in the same jurisdiction.

Whether it would be wise to make exemptions in cases like the present is not a judicial but a legislative question. Knight v. Boston, 159 Mass. 551, 35 N. E. 86.

It follows from what has been said that the shares of stock are not "property situated in another State and subject to taxation therein." The context in which these words occur in our tax law and its other general provisions demonstrate that these words refer to the kind of property which, if owned by an individual and situated and taxed in another State, would be exempt from taxation here, such as real estate, and "merchandise, machinery and animals." St. 1909, c. 516, § 1. Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 194, 4 Ann. Cas. 493, 26 S. Ct. 36, 50 U. S. (L. e.) 150. There are substantial although intangible, elements of property in shares of stock in a corporation which attach to the owner resident in this Commonwealth.

The general statement in the decisions of many courts and of text writers is to the effect that shares of stock in foreign corporations may be assessed to the owner at the place of his domicile irrespective of taxes which may have been imposed on the corporation itself, even in respect of its capital stock. Greenleaf v. Board of Review, 184 Ill. 226, 228, 56 N. E. 295, 75 Am. St. Rep. 168; State v. Nelson, 107 Minn. 319, 322, 119 N. W. 1058; Appeal Tax Court v. GHL, 50 Md. 377, 396; Allen v. Com. 98 Va. 80, 84, 34 S. E. 961; State v. Bentley, 23 N. J. L. 532, 542; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.): 928, 929; 37 Cyc. 821, 864, 865.

Our decision upon this branch of the case is supported by direct adjudications upon the same point in Dyer v. Osborne, 11 R. I. 321, 23 Am. Rep. 469; Worth v. Ashe County, 90 N. C. 409; Appeal Tax Ct. v. Patterson, 50 Md. 354, 373; Judy v. Beckwith, 137 Ia. 24, 31, 15 Am. Cas. 890, 114 N. W. 565, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 142; Seward v. Rising Sun, 79 Ind. 331, 353, 354; Bacon v. State Tax Com'rs, 126 Mich. 22, 29, 39, 85 N. W. 307, 86 Am. St. Rep. 524, 60 L.R.A. 321; Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Wright, 166 Fed. 153, 159, appeal dismissed, 215 U. S. 617, 30 S. Ct. 408, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 350. See 1 Cooley on Taxation, (3d ed.) 389. Although in some of these opinions the question of the power of the domiciliary State of the corporation to appropriate to itself an exclusive taxation situs of the shares of stock was not much discussed, the decisions are clear to the effect that it cannot do so. The result seems to be supported by Kidd v. Alabama, 189 U. S. 730, 23 S. Ct. 401, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 669, where at page 731 some of these cases are cited with approval. It conforms to the policy of our law touching a kindred point in Dwight v. Boston, 12 Allen (Mass.) 316, where it was said at page 322, 90 Am. Dec. 149, "our whole system of taxation, as established and practiced, is to disregard the liability of shares in foreign corporations to taxation in the States where they are situated." We are aware of no authorities to the contrary. Oliver v. Washington Mills, 11 Allen (Mass.) 268, involved quite different considerations.

The conclusion is, in the opinion of a majority of the court, that as matter of constitutional power the Legislature can impose a property tax upon the shares of stock in a Vermont corporation owned by a natural person resident in this Commonwealth. The exercise of such power does not conflict with constitutional guarantees for equal protection of the laws, full faith and credit to the public acts of other States, nor is it a deprivation of property without due process of law. Of course it does not impair the obligation of any contract, because it is to be inferred that our tax law was in effect long before the acquisition of the stock by the petitioner.

The petitioner contends that its bond of a Vermont corporation is not comprehended within "securities which if owned by a natural person resident in this Commonwealth would be liable to taxation," as these words are used in § 43, cl. 2. Its argument is that such a bond is a debt due to it and that if owned by a natural person resident here who owed money in excess of the value of the bond, as the petitioner does, then such natural person would not be taxed for it. Hale v. Hampshire County Com'rs, 137 Mass. 111. This argument is fallacious. These words in the statute were not intended to establish the same standard of taxation for a corporation as for an individual. The reference to securities which would be taxable if owned by a natural person is merely for the purpose of determining the taxable character of the securities. Farr Alpaca Co. v. Com. 212 Mass. 156, 162; 98 N. E. 1078. If the securities possess that taxable character, then they are to be taken into account. The debts owed by the petitioner are all considered in determining the fair market value of its shares, provided it makes proper return of them. It is not entitled [65] under the excise tax law to have them deducted a second time.

"Securities" is a word of sufficiently broad import to include a bond like that in question. It was said in Boston R. Holding Co. v. Com. 215 Mass. 493, Ann. Cas. 1914D 621, 102 N. E. 650, that "in its ordinary acceptance the word 'securities' includes bonds . . . and other evidences of indebtedness." There is nothing in any part of the tax law to show that it was used in this section in a narrow or constricted sense.

In this respect also no error is shown in the action of the tax commissioner in the determination of the excise tax upon the petitioner.

Petition dismissed with costs.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that the tax laws of a state are applicable to shares of stock in a foreign corporation owned by a resident of that state, though a statute of the state of the corporation's domicile imposes a tax on all its stock, including that owned in other states. The liability to taxation within a state of shares of stock in a foreign corporation is treated in the note to Denver v. Hobbs' Estate, reported ante, this volume, at page 823.

HAWLEY

v.

MALDEN.

United States Supreme Court—January 5, 1914.

232 U. S. 1; 34 S. Ct. 201.

Taxation — Property Subject — Stock of Foreign Corporation.

The taxation of a resident of the state, under the authority of Mass. Rev. Laws, chap. 12, §§ 2, 4, 23, upon shares of stock held by him in foreign corporations which do no business and have no property within the state, does not take his property without due process of law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Error: to Massachusetts Superior Court.

Action to recover taxes paid under protest. Truman R. Hawley, plaintiff, and City of Malden, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Courtenay Crocker and Nathan Matthews for plaintiff in error.

H. L. Beutrell for defendant in error.

[8] HUGHES J.—The plaintiff in error, a resident of the city of Malden, brought this action to recover the amount of certain taxes which he had paid under protest. The taxes were assessed upon shares which he held in foreign corporations most of which did no business and had no property within the State of Massachusetts. It was alleged that the levy and collection were in violation of the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. Demurrer to the declaration was sustained by the Superior Court and the case was reported to the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth which directed judgment for the defendant. 204 Massachusetts 138.

It is conceded that the objection that the statute authorizing the tax [Rev. Laws (Mass.) c. 12, §§ 2, 4, 23] denies to the plaintiff in error the equal protection of the [9] laws is not well taken; but it is contended that the shares were not within the jurisdiction of the State and hence that the enforcement of the tax constitutes an unconstitutional deprivation of property.

The power thus challenged, as the state court points out, has been continuously exercised by the State of Massachusetts for more than three-quarters of a century. Substantially the same statutory provision, derived from an earlier enactment, is found in Rev. Stats. (Mass.) c. 7, § 4, and its constitutionality has been sustained by repeated state decisions. Great Barrington v. Berkshire County Com'rs, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 572; Dwight v. Boston, 12 Allen (Mass.) 316, 90 Am. Dec. 149; Frothingham v. Shaw, 175 Mass. 59, 61, 55 N. E. 623, 78 Am. St. Rep. 475. And other States through a long period of years have asserted a similar authority. Union Bank v. State, 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 490; McKeen v. Northampton County, 49 Pa. St. 519, 88 Am. Dec. 515; Whitesell v. Northampton County, 49 Pa. St. 526; State v. Branin, 23 N. J. L. 484; State v. Bentley, 23 N. J. L. 532; Worthington v. Sebastian, 25 Ohio St. 1; *Bradley v. St. Rep. 168. It is well settled that the property of the shareholders in their respective shares is distinct from the corporate property, franchises and capital stock, and may be separately taxed (Van Allen v. Assessors, 3 Wall. 573, 584, 18 U. S. (L. ed.) 229; Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 679, 687, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 558; Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 129, 186, 137, 6 S. Ct. 645; 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 830; New Orleans v. Houston, 119 U. S. 285, 277, 7 S. Ct. 198, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 411), and the rulings in the state cases which we have [10] cited proceed upon the view that shares are personal property and, having no situs elsewhere, are taxable by the State of the owner's domicile, whether the corporations be foreign or domestic.

It is said that the question of the constitutional validity of such taxation has not hitherto been raised definitely in this court and has not been directly passed upon. There is no doubt, however, that the existence of the state authority has invariably been assumed. In Sturges v. Carter, 114 U. S. 511, 5 S. Ct. 1014, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 240, the action was brought to recover taxes imposed under the law of Ohio upon shares of stock owned by a resident of Ohio in the Western Union Telegraph Company, a New York corporation. The right of the State to tax the shares was not questioned and as it was found that a statutory exemption which was relied upon in defense did not apply, the recovery of the tax was sustained. Again, in Kidd v. Alabama, 188 U. S. 730, 23 S. Ct. 401, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 669, it was not disputed that the State was entitled to tax shares owned by its citizens in foreign corporations. The argument was that the statute in that case created an unconstitutional discrimination and, this point being found to be without merit, the tax was upheld. In Wright v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 195 U. S. 219, 25 S. Ct. 16, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 167, the question was whether shares of stock in a railroad corporation of another State, which were owned by a Georgia corporation were taxable under the constitution and laws of Georgia. The State's power to tax the shares was not denied, so far as the Constitution of the United States was concerned, but it was contended that this power had not been exercised. The constitution of Georgia provided that all taxation should "be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and ad valorem on all property subject to be taxed within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax," and should be levied and collected under general laws. The general tax act had authorized a tax on all of the taxable property of the State. It was clear that the [11] State had directed shares in foreign corporations to be taxed, provided these could be considered to be "property subject to be taxed within the territorial limits" of the taxing authority. And such shares when held by a resident being deemed to fall within this description, it was decided that the state officer was entitled to collect the tax. "Putting the case at the lowest," said the court (p. 222), "the above cited section of the constitution was adopted in the interest of the State as a tax collector, and authorizes, if it does not require, a tax on the stock." So also, in Darnell v. Indiana, 226 U. S. 306, 33 S. Ct. 126, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 267, the authority of the State to tax the shares of its citizens in foreign corporations was recognized, the tax being sustained against objections urged under the commerce clause, Art. I, § 8, and the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

To support the contention that this familiar state action, hitherto assumed to be valid, is fundamentally violative of the Federal Constitution, the plaintiff in error invokes the doctrine that a State has no right to tax the property of its citizens when it is permanently located in another jurisdiction. Louisville, etc. Ferry Co. v. Kentucky, 188 U. S. 385, 23 S. Ct. 463, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 513; Dela-ware, etc. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 198 U. S. 341, 25 S. Ct. 669, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 1077; Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 194, 4 Ann. Cas. 493, 26 S. Ct. 36, 50 U. S. (L. ed.) 150. But these decisions did not involve the question of the taxation of intangible personal property (Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 211, 4 Ann. Cas. 493, 26 S. Ct. 36, 50 U. S. (L. ed.) 150); nor do they apply to tangible personal property which, although physically outside the State of the owner's domicile, has not acquired an actual situs elsewhere. Southern Pac. Co. v. Kentucky, 222 U. S. 63, 68, 32 S. Ct. 13, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 98. When we are dealing with the intangible interest of the shareholder, there is manifestly no question of physical situs, so far as this distinct property right is concerned, and the jurisdiction to tax it is not dependent upon the location of the lands and chattels of the corporation.

[12] The argument, necessarily, is that shares are to be deemed to be taxable solely in the State of incorporation. It is urged that these rights rest in franchise and that the principle of the decision in Louisville, etc. Ferry Co. v. Kentucky, supra, holding that a ferry franchise granted by Indiana to a Kentucky corporation was not taxable in Kentucky is applicable to shares of stock. But that case went upon the ground that the franchise was an incorporeal hereditament and hence had its legal situs in Indiana, 188 U. S. 398, 23 S. Ct. 463, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 513. Shares fall within a different category. While the shareholder's rights are those of a member of the corporation entitled to have the corporate enterprise conducted in accordance with its charter, they are still in the nature of contract rights or choses in action. Morawetz on Corporations, § 225. As such, in the absence of legislation prescribing a different rule, they are appropriately related to the person of the owner, and, being held by him at his domicile, constitute property with respect to which he is under obligation to contribute to the support of the government whose protection he enjoys. Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 491, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 558; Bonaparte v. Tax Ct. 104 U. S. 592, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 845; Covington v. Covington First Nat. Bank, 198 U. S. 100, 111, 112, 25 S. Ct. 562, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 963; Southern Pac. Co. v. Kentucky, supra; Cooley on Taxation (3d ed.) 26.

Undoubtedly, the State in which a corporation is organized may provide, in creating it, for the taxation in that State of all its shares whether owned by residents or non-residents. Corry v. Baltimore, 196 U. S. 466, 25 S. Ct.

297, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 566. This is by virtue of the authority of the creating State to determine the basis of organization and the liabilities of shareholders. Id. 476, 477; Hannis Distilling Co. v. Baltimore, 216 U. S. 285, 293, 294, 17 Ann. Cas. 1112. So, by reason of its dominant power to provide for the organization and conduct of national banks, Congress has fixed the places at which alone shares in those institutions may be taxed. Rev. Stat. § 5219. Whether, in the case of corporations organized [13] under state laws, a provision by the State of incorporation fixing the situs of shares for the purpose of taxation, by whomever owned, would exclude the taxation of the shares by other States in which their owners reside is a question which does not arise upon this record and need not be decided. No such provision is here involved, and the present case must be determined by the application of the established principle which has been stated.

The real ground of complaint in this class of cases is not that the shares are taxed in one place rather than in another but that they are taxed at all, when presumably the property and franchises of the corporation which give to the shares their value are also taxed. As to this we may repeat what was said in Kidd v. Alabama, 189 U. S. 730, 732, 23 S. Ct. 401, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 669, "No doubt it would be a great advantage to the country and to the individual States if principles of taxation could be agreed upon which did not conflict with each other, and a common scheme could be adopted by which taxation of substantially the same property in two jurisdictions could be avoided. But the Constitution of the United States does not go so far."

The judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case upholds the power of a state to tax shares of stock in a foreign corporation when owned by its residents, irrespective of the extent of the taxation of the assets of the corporation in the state of its domicile. The cases on this subject are collated in the note to Denver v. Hobbs' Estate, reported ante, this volume, at page 823.

SELWYN.

England—Court of Appeal—April 7, 1914.

[1914] 3 K. B. 98.

Actions — Civil Action for Crime — Stay.

Proceedings in a civil action based on a felony will be stayed until the offender has been prosecuted criminally.

[See note at end of this case.]

[98] APPEAL from an order of Lord Coleridge J. at chambers.

The plaintiffs were husband and wife. The statement of claim alleged in substance, in paragraph 2, that the defendant intending and contriving to corrupt and violently or otherwise have criminal relations with the female plaintiff induced her to attend at a certain place, and that, while the said plaintiff was there, he induced her to partake of some liquid which he alleged and she believed to be brandy, but which, as the defendant well knew, was not brandy, but was brandy or a liquid mixed with some noxious narcotic or other drug, which was calculated and was by him intended to have the effect of rendering the plaintiff powerless and incapable of muscular control or resistance and of reducing her to a state of collapse and insensibility. Paragraph 3 alleged that the said plaintiff, being so induced by the defendant, drank part of the liquid, and almost immediately thereafter in consequence thereof became injuriously affected and was rendered powerless and incapable of muscular control or resistance, and was reduced to a state of collapse and insensibility, and while she was so affected as aforesaid and under the influence of the drug the defendant unlawfully and indecently assaulted her and violently against her will had or alternatively attempted to have carnal knowledge of and intercourse with her. Paragraph 4 alleged that in consequence thereof the said plaintiff became ill and suffered much mental and physical pain, and for a long time feared pregnancy, and was unable to discharge her [99] household duties as theretofore, and her marital relations with her husband became strained and impaired and she lost for a long time the consortium of her husband, and was unable to follow her occupation and was injured in her character and reputation; and the husband lost the services of his wife in the discharge of her household duties, and his marital relations with her became strained and impaired, and he lost the consortium of his wife. The plaintiffs claimed damages.

The defendant applied at chambers for an order to stay further proceedings in or to dismiss the action as being an abuse of the process of the Court, upon the ground that the statement of claim was based upon a felony for which the defendant had not been prosecuted.

Lord Coleridge J., affirming an order of the Master, dismissed the application. The defendant appealed.

C. W. Lilley for appellant.

C. E. Jones for respondents.

Walter Martin & Co., solicitors for appellant.

Surridge & Mullis, for Mullis & Walmisley, Hford, solicitors for respondents.

[102] KENNEDY L. J.—This case raises a somewhat difficult, but at the same time an interesting, question. The appeal is against [103] an order of Lord Coleridge J., who affirmed an order of the Master refusing an application to stay or dismiss the action. The ground of the appeal is that the statement of claim on its face alleges facts which, if true, constitute a felony on the part of the defendant, that the claim to damages is based upon that alleged felony, and that, as the defendant has not been prosecuted, or a reasonable excuse shewn for his not having been prosecuted, as, for instance, his being out of the country, it is not open to the plaintiffs to claim damages in a civil action in respect of the felony.

It is not easy to find a statement in any case as to what is the course which the Court ought to adopt in a matter of this kind. Some of the decisions are not easy to reconcile. This, however, is certain, that the Court has a right, if not an imperative duty, to stay the proceedings in a civil action for damages, if it is clear that that which is the basis of the claim in the action is a felony committed by the defendant against the plaintiff. It is unnecessary to traverse the ground again by going through the authorities which have been so fully dealt with in the argument. In my opinion the result of them is this. It is in the power of the Court to grant a stay, and it is the duty of the Court to consider in each case whether in the circumstances it will grant a stay, if it sees that the claim for damages is based upon a felony committed by the defendant. I have come to the conclusion myself that, while portions of paragraphs 2 and 3 of the statement of claim, taken separately, might be construed as alleging facts upon which the plaintiffs will rely as giving them a claim for damages for such an assault upon the female plaintiff as constitutes only a misdemeanour, yet the scheme of the paragraphs is substantially to allege—and it is admitted that they are so intended—that the defendant induced the female plaintiff to go to a particular place with intent to have carnal knowledge of her, and when she was there, with the same intent or design, as the statement of claim calls it, he induced her to take some liquid with a drug in it so as to render her incapable of muscular control and resistance, and while she was in that condition he carried out his design of assaulting her, and against her will either had or attempted to [104] have carnal knowledge of her. In my opinion, apart from the allegation that the defendant had carnal knowledge of her, there is here a statement of facts which, if proved, would constitute a felony within s. 22 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861. I do not think that s. 22 is in any way affected by s. 3, sub-s. 3, of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, whereby a somewhat similar act is made a misdemeanour. On the face of the statement of claim, there is no allegation of felony upon which the claim for damages is based. That being so, it is within the power of the Court to stay the proceedings, and the fair result of the cases is that that is the proper course to adopt. We ought, however, to give the plaintiffs an opportunity of alleging, as the ground of their claim to damages, an assault on the female plaintiff which will amount to a misdemeanour only. It would not, in my opinion, be irrelevant to that action to allege and prove that the person assaulted was unable to resist owing to a drug having been administered to her. Though it may not, perhaps, be easy, I conceive it to be possible to state a good cause of action without at the same time alleging a felony as its basis. The plaintiffs are entitled to be allowed to put forward such a case and to have it tried. I should be very loth to exercise our power in such a way as absolutely to deprive the plaintiffs of all civil remedy. Of course if the defendant is prosecuted the bar to the further continuance of the action in its present form will disappear. I only wish to add that there are here two plaintiffs, husband and wife, and if any real distinction could be made between them it might be that the husband might maintain his claim upon the ground that the felonious act was not committed on him. I am not prepared to differ from the opinion expressed by Bramwell B. in Osborn v. Gillett, L. R. 8 Exch. 88, 93, and by Huddleston B. and Wills J. in Appleby v. Franklin, 17 Q. B. D. 93. But here the two claims are so interlaced as to make it difficult to separate them, and moreover the husband's claim is a mere bagatelle, the real claim being in respect of the injury to the wife. In these circumstances I cannot separate them, and I draw no distinction between them.

The order, therefore, will be in substance to stay all further proceedings in the action on the present statement of claim; [105] with leave to the plaintiffs to amend the statement of claim within twenty-one days; and if no amendment is made within that time, the action to be stayed until after criminal proceedings have been taken against the defendant.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is well established that according to the law of England, where injuries are inflicted on an individual under circumstances which constitute a felony, that felony cannot be made the foundation of a civil action at the suit of the person injured against the person who inflicted the injuries until the latter has been prosecuted or a reasonable excuse shewn for his non-prosecution. In 1827 in Stolle v. Marsh, 6 B. & C. 551, at p. 564, 13 E. C. C. 249, 253, Lord Tenterden, delivering the judgment of the Court of King's Bench, stated the law thus: "There is, indeed, another rule of the law of England, viz., that a man shall not be allowed to make a felony the foundation of a civil action." That is the rule, and then he proceeds to state the ground of the rule. "The rule is founded on a principle of public policy. . . . Now public policy requires that offenders against the law shall be brought to justice, and for that reason a man is not permitted to abstain from prosecuting an offender, by receiving back stolen property, or any equivalent or composition for a felony, without suit, and, of course, cannot be allowed to maintain a suit for such a purpose." In White v. Spettigue, 13 M. & W. 603, at p. 608, the law was laid down in somewhat similar terms by Rolfe B., who said: "I think the true principle is, that where a criminal, and consequently an injurious act towards the public has been committed, which is also a civil injury to a party, that party shall not be permitted to seek redress for civil injury to the prejudice of public justice, and to waive the felony, and go for the conversion." The learned judge is there speaking of an injurious act which amounts to a felony. So too Cockburn C.J. in Wells v. Abrahams, L. R. 7 Q. B. 554, said (at p. 557): "No doubt it has been long established as the law of England that where an injury amounts to an infringement of the civil rights of an individual, and at the same time to a felonious wrong, the civil [106] remedy, that is, the right of redress by action, is suspended until the party inflicting the injury has been prosecuted." That being the established law, the question arises as to how it is to be enforced where an action is brought upon alleged facts which, if true, disclose a felony. Cockburn C.J. said in the same case: "But it may very well be that, if an action were brought against a person who was either in the course of being prosecuted for felony, or was liable to be prosecuted for felony, the summary jurisdiction of this Court might be invoked to stay the proceedings which would involve an undue use, probably an abuse, of the process of this Court, in which case the Court is always willing to interfere to prevent such abuse." Blackburn J. (at p. 559) took the view that the Court could in certain circumstances stay the proceedings. Lush J. (at p. 563) said: "It is undoubtedly laid down in the text-books that it is the duty of the person who is the victim of a felonious act on the part of another to prosecute for the felony, and he cannot obtain redress by civil action until he has satisfied that requirement; but by what means that duty is to be enforced we are nowhere informed."

We have now to lay down the proper course of procedure in such a case. The proper course is, in my judgment, that indicated by Cockburn C.J. in the passage I have cited, that is to say, to stay the action, if the present statement of claim is persisted in, until criminal proceedings have been taken against the defendant, with leave to the plaintiffs to amend their statement of claim, and thus give them an opportunity of stating a cause of action without alleging a felony. I agree with the form of order proposed by Kennedy, L.J.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is a well-established rule of law that a plaintiff against whom a felony has been committed by the defendant cannot make that felony the foundation of a cause of action unless the defendant has been prosecuted or a reasonable excuse has been shewn for his not having been prosecuted. The prosecution need not necessarily be at the suit of the injured person. We are enabled now to pronounce a decision as to the mode of enforcing that rule, because hitherto no mode of procedure has been [107] definitely laid down. I agree with the order which has been suggested. I only desire to add a few words as to the statement of claim. There seems to me to be two distinct felonies alleged therein. There is a charge of rape at the end of paragraph 3, and there is charge of felony in paragraphs 2 and 3 combined. It might be uncertain whether paragraph 2 alleged the administration of a drug to the female plaintiff with a view of making her unable to resist so that the defendant might have carnal knowledge of her. It is, however, frankly admitted that paragraphs 2 and 3 are intended to be read together and to have that meaning. It comes therefore within s. 22 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, and it is none the less a felony within that section because it may also be a misdemeanour within s. 3, sub-s. 3, of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885. Various distinctions have been attempted to be drawn between the two sections, but it matters not, because there is a clear charge of felony under s. 22 of the Act of 1861 as the foundation of the action. The statement of claim therefore alleges two different felonies on the same facts. I agree that the proper order is that stated by my Lord.

Appeal allowed.

NOTE.

Merger or Suspension of Civil Action Predicated on Commission of Felony.

The early English rule that all civil remedies of a person injured by a felony were merged in the criminal offense, being based on the ground that the goods of a convicted felon were forfeited to the crown, later gave way to a doctrine based on public policy that all civil remedies are suspended until the offender has been prosecuted to conviction. 1 R. C. L. tit. Actions, p. 327. The later English cases show a tendency to disregard the rule, and in Midland Ins. Co. v. Smith, 6 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 561, wherein the authorities were reviewed at length, the court said: "The history of the question shows that it has at different times and by different authorities been resolved in three distinct ways. First, it has been considered that the private wrong and injury has been entirely merged and drowned in the public wrong, and therefore no cause of action ever arose or could arise. Secondly, it was thought that, although there was no actual merger, it was a condition precedent to the accruing of the cause of action that the public right should have been vindicated by the prosecution of the felon. Thirdly, it has been said that the true principle of the common law is that there is neither a merger of the civil right nor is it a strict condition precedent to such right that there shall have been a prosecution of the felon, but that there is a duty imposed upon the injured person, not to resort to the prosecution of his private suit to the neglect and exclusion of the vindication of the public law. In my opinion this last view is the correct one." The decision of the Court of Appeal in the reported case establishes, however, that in England, the court has the right, if not the imperative duty, to stay the proceedings in a civil action based on a felony where no criminal prosecution has been begun.

In the United States the English doctrine found little favor in the early cases and except in one jurisdiction (see Brady v. Messer, 27 R. I. 373) civil remedies in favor of a person injured by a felony are neither merged in the offense against public law nor suspended until after the termination of a criminal prosecution of the offender. 1 R. C. L. tit. Actions, p. 328. The leading American case on the subject is Boston, etc. R. Corp. v. Dana, 1 Gray (Mass.) 83, wherein the court stated the argument against the English doctrine as follows: "Without regard, however, to the causes which originated the doctrine, it has been urged with great force and by high authority, that the rule now rests on public policy; King v. Oxford County, 12 East 413, 414; that the interests of society require, in order to secure the effectual prosecutions of offenders by persons injured, that they should not be permitted to redress their private wrongs, until public justice has been first satisfied by the conviction of felons; that in this way a strong incentive is furnished to the individual to discharge a public duty, by bringing his private interest in aid of its performance, which would be wholly lost, if he were allowed to pursue his remedy before the prosecution and termination of a criminal proceeding. This argument is doubtless entitled to great weight in England, where the mode of prosecuting criminal offenses is very different from that adopted with us. It is there the especial duty of every one, against whose person or property a crime has been committed, to trace out the offender, and prosecute him to conviction. In the discharge of this duty, he is often compelled to employ counsel; procure an indictment to be drawn and laid before the grand jury, with the evidence in its support; and if a bill is found, to see that the case on the part of the prosecution is properly conducted before the jury of trials. All this is to be done by the prosecutor at his own cost, unless the court, after the trial, shall deem reimbursement reasonable. 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 9, 825. The whole system of the administration of criminal justice in England is thus made to depend very much upon the vigilance and efforts of private individuals. There is no public officer, appointed by law in each county, as in this commonwealth, to act in behalf of the government in such cases, and take charge of the prosecution, trial and conviction of offenders against the laws. It is quite obvious that, to render such a system efficacious, it is essential to use means to secure the aid and co-operation of those injured by the commission of crimes, which are not requisite with us. It is to this cause, that the rule in question, as well as many other legal enactments, designed to enforce upon individuals the duty of prosecuting offenses, owes its existence in England. But it is hardly possible, under our laws, that any grave offense of the class designated as felonies can escape detection and punishment. The officers of the law, whose province it is to prosecute criminals, require no assistance from persons injured, other than that which a sense of duty, unaided by private interest, would naturally prompt. On the other hand, in the absence of any reasons, founded on public policy, requiring the recognition of the rule, the expediency of its adoption may well be doubted. If a party is compelled to await the determination of a criminal prosecution before he is permitted to seek his private redress, he certainly has a strong motive to stifle the prosecution and compound with the felon. Nor can it contribute to the purity of the administration of justice, or tend to promote private morality, to suffer a party to set up and maintain in a court of law a defense founded solely upon his own criminal act. The right of every citizen, under our constitution, to obtain justice promptly and without delay, requires that no one should be delayed in obtaining a remedy for a private injury, except in a case of the plainest public necessity. There being no such necessity calling for the adoption of the rule under consideration, we are of opinion that it ought not to be engrafted into our jurisprudence." The foregoing was quoted with approval in Leeman v. Public Service R. Co., 77 N. J. L. 420, 72 Atl. 8. In Downs v. Baltimore, 111 Md. 674, 19 Ann. Cas. 644, 76 Atl. 861, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 255, it was said: "Coming, however, to the specific contention of the appellant in this case it has been emphatically denied by so high authority as Judge Cooley, who says in his work on Torts, 1st ed. page 87: 'In this country the common law doctrine of the suspension of civil remedy in case of felony has not been recognized. The reason usually assigned is, that in this country the duty of prosecuting for public offenses is devolved upon a public officer chosen for the purpose, instead of being left as in England to the voluntary action of the party injured by crime. The civil and the criminal prosecution may therefore go on pari passu, or if the latter is not commenced at all, the failure to seek public justice is no bar to the private remedy.' This text of Judge Cooley's is sustained by numerous decisions among which is the case of Boston, etc. R. Corp. v. Dana, 1 Gray (Mass.) 83, in which the court concisely states: 'The doctrine of the English law, that for goods feloniously taken, no action lies against the felon before the institution of criminal proceedings against him, is not in force in this commonwealth.'"

BOARD OF MANAGERS OF MICHIGAN SOLDIERS' HOME.

Michigan Supreme Court—July 24, 1914.

181 Mich. 347; 148 N. W. 220.

Soldiers' Home — Nature of Institution.

The Michigan Soldiers' Home, established by Pub. Acts 1885, No. 152, is an eleemosynary institution for the purpose of dispensing a charity to a favored but dependent class, intended to furnish a home to honorably discharged veterans, disabled by disease, wounds, etc., from earning their living, and having no adequate means of support, who would otherwise become objects of common charity.

Pensions — Effect of Admission to Soldiers' Home.

Pub. Acts 1885, No. 152, establishing the Michigan Soldiers' Home, by section 2, vested the general government in a board of managers, by section 8, required the board to prepare a system of government, by section 11, declared that all honorably discharged and disabled soldiers and sailors otherwise dependent on charity should be admitted, subject to the regulations of the managers. Pub. Acts 1905, No. 313, provided that money accumulated in the post fund of the home might be used to benefit the home and its inmates, and Pub. Acts 1911, No. 102, that pensions of residents might be taken for disciplinary purposes to be held in trust for them. Held, that one whose pension was adequate for his support was not entitled to admission, and that a regulation imposed as a condition of admission that residents transfer their pensions in excess of $12 per month, to be permanently retained and ultimately turned over to a general state fund, was beyond the power of the board, and that the amounts so retained were held in trust, to be accounted for according to Act No. 102.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In such accounting the amounts due to discharged or deceased soldiers, as to whom the trust had terminated, were payable, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum from the time of death or discharge; but, as to money held by the board under the disciplinary regulation, no interest was recoverable, unless the board had received interest thereon.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kent county:
McDONALD, Judge.

Action for injunction, accounting and other relief. Orange S. Mason et al., plaintiffs, and Board of Managers of Michigan Soldiers' Home, defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs.

Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. MODIFIED.

Grant Fellows and David H. Crowley for appellants.

A. A. Ellis and S. Wesselius for appellees.

[349] STEERE, J.—The ultimate question presented by this record is whether the board of managers of the Michigan soldiers' home at Grand Rapids ever had the right to take and retain permanently all or any part of the pensions of inmates of that institution.

Defendants have appealed from a decree of the circuit court of Kent county, in chancery, awarding $8,373.14 to 126 of the 206 complainants, in sums ranging from $4.95 to a maximum of $541.86 (principal and interest), being pension money received by said complainants from the United States government while residents of said soldiers' home, and retained by defendants under rules and general orders adopted and promulgated by said board of managers in cases where the individual pensions exceeded $12 per month.

The original bill of complaint herein was filed September 4, 1900, by Orange S. Mason, since deceased, in his own behalf and that of others, to restrain enforcement of a general order promulgated by the defendant board of managers, requiring all inmates of said home to surrender all pension money received by them in excess of $12; or in exceptional cases $15, per month to the authorities of the institution, to be permanently retained and ultimately turned into the general State fund. Subsequently all parties who are now complainants were made parties to said bill of complaint by an order of the court.

[350] Upon the filing of such bill a preliminary injunction was issued restraining the defendants from enforcing the provisions of said order. Defendants demurred to said bill, later amending said demurrer, alleging, among other reasons, that the suit instituted by complainants was in fact a suit against the State of Michigan, and therefore could not be maintained without the consent of the State; that said board of managers was an agency of the State, and defendants possessed only limited powers especially provided by law, not including the right to sue and be sued in the courts of the State of Michigan. Complainants' bill was later amended, and a plea was filed by defendants to said amended bill, followed by a replication of complainants. Thereafter a stipulation between the parties provided that the suit should be brought on for hearing upon the bill of complaint and plea on a date fixed, at which time, by permission of the court, complainants' replication was withdrawn, and an amended bill filed praying for an accounting by defendants for the moneys collected from complainants as alleged, and asking for an injunction restraining defendants from discharging any of complainants from said home until the further order of the court, from collecting or appropriating any money due complainants as pensioners of the civil war, from compelling them to sign receipts or transfers for any money due them as pensioners of the United States government, and from transferring or setting over any moneys received by defendants as aforesaid to the general fund of the State of Michigan. A plea was then filed by defendants to said amended bill fairly putting in issue all material questions raised by said amended bill and involved in this controversy, with a general denial of complainants' right to the relief asked. A later replication filed by complainants finally concluded the protracted pleadings, and the [351] suit was brought to a hearing on March 4, 1913, upon pleadings and proofs taken in open court.

The trial court rendered an opinion that said board of managers of the Michigan soldiers' home had no authority, under the law creating such institution, to make rules by which any part of the soldiers' pensions received from the United States government could be permanently taken from the inmates of the home and appropriated by the board; the gist of said opinion being as follows:

"If soldiers, sailors, and marines come within that class which entitles them to the benefits of the home, they are entitled to the enjoyment of such benefits, without payment therefor. If not entitled to the benefits of the home, they should not be admitted. The State gave the board no authority to contract with those not eligible for admission to the home. It did not intend to give the board of managers any authority to deal with any except those entitled to the benefits of the home. It was not intended that the institution should be supported in any way by contributions from the pensioners."

The Michigan soldiers' home was established by Act No. 152, Pub. Acts 1885 (2 How Stat [2d ed.] § 31716 et seq.), entitled:

"An act to authorize the establishment of a home for disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines in the State of Michigan."

By section 2 of said act the general supervision and government of said soldiers' home is vested in a board of managers consisting of six members appointed by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate.

Section 8 provides:

"It shall be the duty of the board of managers to meet once in every three months on their own adjournment, and oftener if they shall deem it advisable, at which meeting they shall prepare and carefully digest and mature a system of government for said [352] home, embracing all such rules, regulations, and general laws as they may deem necessary for preserving order, for enforcing discipline, for preserving the health of such disabled soldiers, sailors, or marines as may be received at this home."

Other parts of the act, of minor importance here, provide for the selection by said board of a treasurer and clerk from their own body and a commandant for said home, with such subordinate officers and employees as may be necessary. Provision is also made by subsequent legislation for establishing upon the same premises and under the same management a home for the wives and mothers of such disabled soldiers.

Section 11 of said act provides in part as follows:

"All honorably discharged soldiers, sailors and marines, who have served in the army or navy of the United States in the late War of the Rebellion [or in the Mexican War], and who are disabled by disease, wounds, or otherwise, and who have no adequate means of support, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning their living, and who would be otherwise dependent upon public or private charity, shall be entitled to be admitted to said home, subject to the rules and regulations that shall be adopted by the board of managers to govern the admission of applicants to said home."

This section also requires a previous residence of one year in the State, unless the applicant served in a Michigan regiment or was accredited to the State of Michigan, and subsequent amendments provide for the admission to said home of soldiers, sailors, and marines who have served in the Spanish-American or Philippine wars upon the same conditions.

This court, in construing the law creating the soldiers' home, has defined it as an eleemosynary institution; the purpose of its existence being to dispense to a favored but dependent class a well-bestowed and [353] deserving charity. The language of the act admits of no other construction. Its object was to furnish a home, which would be a more congenial and fitting refuge than the ordinary charitable institution, to that class of honorably discharged veterans who, disabled by disease, wounds, or otherwise from earning their living, and having no adequate means of support, would otherwise become objects of common charity. Wolcott v. Holcomb, 97 Mich. 361, 56 N. W. 837, 23 L.R.A. 215.

In its general scope the law does not contemplate, nor by its language does it permit, that the board of managers shall admit as inmates of the home any self-supporting, honorably discharged soldiers, however worthy, and allow them, in case they so desire, to pay for their care and maintenance in whole or in part, as is the law in some other States which extend the privileges of the home to veterans whose financial condition would bar them from regular admission. A soldier's pension is not a charity, but a reward won, or compensation earned, by services rendered to his country, to which he is entitled, wholly regardless of his financial circumstances, and which is paid alike to the rich and poor. Comparatively few of these entitled to, and who receive, soldiers' pensions are entitled to admission to the soldiers' home. If a soldier's pension is adequate to support him, or, added to his other resources, renders him self-supporting, he is not entitled to admission to the home as an inmate. If, though receiving a pension, his means of support are not adequate, and he is incapable of earning a living, and his status is such that, unless admitted to the home, he would have to be supported by charity in whole or in part, he is entitled to admission. That is the test. The statute creates no grades or degrees in that particular, and imposes no conditions beyond that. There is no suggestion in the law that those of [354] the class entitled to admission shall contribute from their pensions or other scant resources which they may have towards their maintenance. The legislature might have so provided; but it did not. In some of our sister States such conditions were imposed, and the Federal law creating national soldiers' homes first expressly provided that applicants must surrender their pensions as a condition of admission; but subsequent legislation to the contrary has removed those conditions for admission to the national soldiers' homes, and the same course has been followed by most of the States. A report of inspection of State soldiers' and sailors' homes for the year 1910, made by the inspector general of the national home for discharged soldiers, shows that of 54 such institutions scattered throughout the United States only 5 exact any part of the inmate's pension for his maintenance or the support of the home.

It is contended in behalf of defendants that under the provisions of sections 8 and 11, above quoted, power was delegated to the board by the legislature to include in the rules and regulations which it was authorized to adopt for a system of government of the home the condition of admission requiring contributions from pensions now in controversy, and that such authorized rules and regulations when adopted and promulgated have all the force and effect of a statute.

The question of what power was delegated by statute to the board came before this court in Loser v. Soldiers' Home, 92 Mich. 633, 52 N. W. 956. In that case a mandamus was asked to compel respondents to vacate a rule, numbered 14, and a general order based upon it, requiring every pensioner admitted to the home who received a pension in excess of $5 per month to turn the excess over to the commandant, subject to the disposal of the board of [355] managers, and providing that if an improper use was made of the $5 allowed to be retained leading to infractions of rules of the institution, such allowance should be suspended; also directing that the commandant ascertain as soon as possible the wife, dependent children, or parents of the inmates receiving pensions, and cause the money so received from the pensioners to be sent to them, or, in case no one was dependent upon any pensioner, the money so received from him should be held by the board and ultimately paid back to him upon his final discharge from the home. The position then taken by the board of managers is not in harmony with the present attitude of the board. It then, in effect, disclaimed any purpose or right to permanently retain or appropriate the money taken from pensioners, and urged in justification of the rule that it was adopted for the sole purpose of enforcing discipline and maintaining order, and that without such rule it would be impossible to do so. Approving this contention as well founded so far as it applied to temporarily taking control of the pensioner's money, the court said:

"We think it is within the power of the board to require the pension money of the inmates to be deposited, if, in the words of the statute, they deem it necessary to preserve order, enforce discipline, or preserve the health of the inmates."

The permanent retention of a former inmate's pension after he is dead or discharged could scarcely be urged as necessary to enforce discipline, preserve order or health.

The significance of that opinion as applied to this case is found in that portion dealing with the provision of rule 14 requiring the commandant to ascertain the dependent relatives of inmates who drew pensions, and to pay the deposited portions of the pensions to such relatives. While recognizing that the act lodged a broad discretion with the board, in the [356] management and government of the institution, which courts would not interfere with, unless a very clear case of abuse was shown, the court in that connection very plainly indicated the limit of such discretion in handling the pensions of inmates, as follows:

"We do not, however, think that the statute confers upon the board the right to determine what relatives are dependent upon the pensioner for support, and to direct how much of such money shall be sent to such relatives. To this extent, therefore, rule 14 is void, and must be vacated."

It is true, as claimed by defendants, that the question, directly in issue here, of the right of the board to for all time deprive the inmate of any part of his pension money and permanently appropriate it to support of the home was not raised, for the manifest reason that no such right was claimed or suggested; but when this court squarely held that the right of the board did not even extend to permanently depriving the inmate of his money for the apparently laudable and equitable purpose of applying it to the support of his dependent relatives, whom it was his natural and legal duty to support, if able, we see little room for argument as to the indicated limit of the board's authority in making final disposition of this money. To impose the condition requiring inmates to pay the institution in whole or in part for their maintenance, whether out of the pensions received or from other sources, is not to be treated as an abuse of discretion, but rather as an attempted exercise of a discretion which the law did not authorize.

It is urged in behalf of defendants that in other States, under similar statutes, the right of managing boards of soldiers' homes to take and appropriate the pensions of inmates has been universally upheld, citing, in support of this contention, the following cases: Ball v. Evans, 98 Ia. 708, 68 N. W. 435; Howell v. Sheldon, 82 Neb. 72, 117 N. W. 109; Treadway [357] v. Veterans' Home, 14 Cal. App. 75, 111 Pac. 111; Brooks v. Hastings, 192 Pa. St. 378, 43 Atl. 1075; O'Donohue v. New Jersey Soldiers' Home, 65 N. J. L. 484, 47 Atl. 452. These cases involve the question raised here has applied to the statutes of the respective States. To the extent they are in conflict with Loser v. Soldiers' Home, supra, they cannot be regarded as controlling. Some of them are distinguishable in marked particulars. In Ball v. Evans, supra, the distinction is pointed out in the opinion. The Iowa statute creating the home did not define who was entitled to admission. Section 2 of the act provided that:

"The board of commissioners shall determine the eligibility of applicants for admission to the home."

The Loser case is cited in the opinion, and, amongst other things, it is said:

"In that case the court sustained rules similar to those here in controversy. So much of one rule was declared invalid as determined what relatives were dependent upon the pensioners for support, and directed how much of his pension money should be sent to such relatives. This holding was based upon the ground that the statute of Michigan did not authorize the board to determine that matter. Even that holding would not obtain here, for our statute authorizes the board to determine the question of the eligibility of applicants for admission to the home."

Treadway v. Veterans' Home, supra, is devoted chiefly to construing the California statute; the rules of the board being of minor significance. The following excerpt from the opinion indicates the principal question at issue, and the view of the court upon a condition relative to retaining any remaining pension money, of deceased inmates, expressly authorized by statute:

"The law does not purport to affect 'the estates of deceased persons' or 'change the law of descent or succession,' and was intended for no such purpose; it [358] merely extends to the class of persons indicated the benefits and privileges of the home on certain conditions. In the particular complained of applicants agree that their pension money shall be paid to the treasurer of the home from time to time as received to be held for their personal benefit and use while members, and without having made other disposition of it, any balance unexpended shall go to the home for the benefit of all the members, subject to the right of certain named persons to this balance if called for within a stated period—five years. It cannot be said that this regulation is harsh or burdensome or ungenerous, for the applicant is supposed to be in indigent circumstances when admitted, having no one under any legal obligation to support him, and it is only when the member dies intestate that the law operates to dispose of any balance to his credit, and to this he agreed when admitted as a member."

Howell v. Sheldon, supra, was based on the Nebraska statute, differing from that of Michigan in the particular that the board was not only required to prescribe rules for admission, but authorized to admit as inmates old soldiers, otherwise qualified, upon payment by them of their board if they so desired, thus giving the board a discretion not conferred by our statute. Though impelled to hold that the rule complained of was within the discretion of the board, the court suggested that:

"If the legislature believes the rule to be harsh, unnecessary, or inexpedient, it can limit the power of the board as to its right to require the payment of any part of the pensions of the inmates for the support of the institution, and thus conform the rule in this State to that in the majority of those States maintaining like institutions."

In the Pennsylvania and New Jersey cases special circumstances are shown under which the inequity of granting a recovery was emphasized, and the courts held that the payments were voluntarily made and could not be subsequently recovered, as the testimony [359] clearly disclosed that the pensioner when applying for admission distinctly understood and freely agreed to the arrangement. Those cases being, however, chiefly based on the doctrine of contract obligations, the courts necessarily held, in substance, that the managing boards had power to impose such conditions and, in effect, make contracts with applicants for permanent surrender of their pension money received while inmates. So far as those opinions disclose, their statutes are quite similar to that of Michigan, though not identical, and, to the extent the conclusions reached by those courts as to authority of the boards are at variance with the tenor of the Loser case, they cannot be followed; but, aside from that question, there is testimony in this case that much misunderstanding and confusion existed at times in the minds of inmates as to how their pensions were to be treated. They all signed an agreement, when making application for admission, to abide by the rules and regulations of the home, and knew they were required to deposit their pension money with the officials. As to their further consent and understanding, the testimony is not clear and unquestioned, as it was in the New Jersey and Pennsylvania cases. In this case numerous changes in the rules and forms of application were made from time to time. Subsequent to the time of disavowing in this court any purpose to permanently appropriate any part of the pension money, inmates were required to deposit, rules to the contrary were adopted, and the conditions of admission so indicating were, as a rule, printed on the back of applications, under headings, purporting to be portions of the law creating the home. The various complainants in this suit were admitted at different times, under several different forms of application. Inmates, as they were admitted, discharged, and readmitted from time to time, often paid little attention to and apparently did not have distinct knowledge or [360] clear understanding of the significance of the printed matter on the back of their applications. The records show that men were admitted, discharged, and readmitted as often as ten different times, or more. As a result of the varying forms of application and the manner in which inmates were received, complainants claim they did not voluntarily and understandingly consent to permanently surrender their pensions, but were misled or coerced into so consenting so far as it appears they did consent. In some instances they testify to being misled into signing their applications by the form used, believing that the rules were part of the statutes of the State; in others that attention was not called to the rules at all; in others that the rules were promulgated after their admission, and either not made clear to them, or, in cases where they were, and protest was offered, they were told that refusal to abide by the rules would result in dishonorable discharge, which would preclude admission to any other soldiers' home. The evidence shows opportunity for confusion and misunderstanding upon that question.

The board had authority under the statute to insist, as a police regulation, and did insist, that the applicant deposit his pension with it while he was an inmate, in this way coming lawfully into possession of his money. The inmate necessarily knew this. Upon that there could be no misunderstanding, and his consent to that course was binding. Beyond that, even if he did acquiesce in the proposal to thereafter retain and permanently appropriate part of the money so received to the purposes of the home, such consent, if imposed as one of the conditions of becoming or remaining an inmate under a mistaken belief that such was the law, was exacted without legal authority, and could not be sustained as a binding contract. We think this is a necessary conclusion from the construction of our statute and the limit fixed upon the authority [361] of the board in Loser v. Soldiers' Home, supra.

A claim is made of legislative authority to permanently appropriate this money under an act of the legislature passed in 1905 (Act No. 313), which provided that money accumulated in the "post fund" and "posthumous fund" might be used to furnish the hospital and for certain other purposes to the benefit of the home and its inmates. The testimony shows a somewhat confused condition of accounts in the books of the institution at times, and Charles P. Coffin, adjutant of the home, who was in charge of, or had access to, all the books, records, and documents, and during his incumbency made a portion of the records showing the different funds and the sources from which they came, furnished a list of the amounts of excess pension received from the different complainants, which are admitted by defendants, and are taken as the bases of the decree. He testifies to difficulties encountered in making up such list, and says he "spent nights and Sundays going through these books" to make his compilation; that he made mistakes—

"But, so far as I know, it is pretty near correct, and especially from data I could get hold of to compile it with. . . . I do not think the treasurer's report is kept in such a way that I can point out the amount of pension money taken from residents of the home."

Various fund accounts were kept from time to time known as "post fund," "posthumous fund," "home pension fund" and "excess pension fund." The witness states that in 1905 the "post fund" was a small account, and in his opinion the money in it was received from other sources; said fund being made up from "money derived from sale of clothing, shoes, garbage, and sources of that kind." The "posthumous fund" was "made up largely of money that was on deposit belonging to pensioners at the time of their death." As a rule no receipts were given to [362] inmates for their pensions which were taken, and no report of the same was ever made by the board to any higher authority. We think, although the pension money of inmates was more or less mingled in these various funds, it is quite clearly shown that at the time the law in question was passed the excess pension money which had been collected was little, if any, of it in the "post fund" or "posthumous fund." No report of the excess pension fund was ever made to the State or legislature until some time after this suit was begun, when in 1911 the treasurer of the home, on request, reported that he had the adjutant go back as far as possible in order to satisfy the joint committee, and he accordingly reported a detailed statement of excess pensions taken from members of the home from 1897 to 1911, and there was then on hand "of this pension money, $7,980.15, having kept the same separately, that it is available for distribution and refunding if the legislature in their wisdom so desire to do." Subsequently, without any further authority or direction so far as shown, "the home pension fund" was turned into the "post fund." We are unable to find that the legislation referred to, or the subsequent transferring by the board of this money to the post fund, affects the legal status of defendants as trustees of this money.

Neither can the claim prevail that this suit cannot be maintained because it is against the State, which cannot be sued by a private individual. Defendants are not the State. They had not reported or accounted to the State for this money when this suit was begun. They had lawfully received it as a police regulation, and were holding it in trust for the owners. They only claim a right to convert it to the uses of an institution of the State, of which they are the managers. Indirectly and rather remotely, it can be admitted, the State may be interested in the result, and its legal representative [363] is entitled to be and has been heard; but defendants' claim of right as State officers to use this money for a State institution does not make this a suit against the State. Its purpose is not to take money from the State treasury, or to seize or interfere with State property.

For various reasons, not necessary to detail at length here, no excess pension money of inmates has been permanently appropriated, since July, 1908, and the present management makes no claim of right to do so. This case only involves the right of those managing the home before that time to exercise such right. Act No. 102 of the Public Acts of 1911 made yet more clear the proper course to be pursued by requiring receipts to be given inmates for any of their property, including pensions, coming into the custody of the board, except fines, and providing that the same could only be so taken for the purpose of discipline, to be held in trust for the "purpose of paying or turning the same over to said resident at the time of his discharge from the Michigan soldiers' home, and accounting for the same to the heirs or legal representatives of said residents after death."

We conclude it is in harmony with the intent of the statute and purport of the decision in Loser v. Soldiers' Home, supra, that these excess pension moneys under consideration, now in possession of defendants, or which should be, the amounts of which are conceded, must be decreed to be held in trust, and accounted for according to the provisions of said Act No. 102. The amounts due to discharged or deceased soldiers, in relation to whom the trust has terminated, should be paid, with interest computed at 5 per cent. per annum from the time of death or discharge. The money of those yet inmates can only be retained and held under control according to rules and regulations of the board promulgated for the purpose of discipline. [364] Interest cannot be exacted from the board for money so held in trust under an authorized rule, while the pensioner is an inmate, unless it be shown that while so holding the board received interest, in which case it should account for the same.

With these modifications, the decree is affirmed, with costs.

NOTE.

Effect with Respect to Pension of Pensioner Becoming Inmate of Soldiers' Home.

The effect, with respect to a pension, of the pensioner becoming an inmate of a soldiers' home depends on the rules and regulations adopted by the board of managers of the institution and on the construction of the statutes under which the home has been established. Thus it has been held that where a board of commissioners of a Soldiers' Home are empowered by statute to "determine the eligibility of applicants for admission to said home" and to "make rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws and constitution of this state, for the management and government of said home, including such rules as they may deem necessary for the preserving of order enforcing discipline and preserving the health of its inmates," the commissioners may adopt a rule which requires inmates of the home to surrender thereto all of their pension money in excess of a certain sum per month, which excess is to be paid to any dependent relatives of the members if they have such, and if not, to a fund of the home. Ball v. Evans, 98 Ia. 708, 68 N. W. 435. To the same effect see Howell v. Sheldon, 82 Neb. 72, 117 N. W. 109; O'Donohue v. New Jersey Soldiers Home, 65 N. J. L. 484, 47 Atl. 452; Brooks v. Hastings, 192 Pa. St. 378, 43 Atl. 1075, 44 W. N. C. 333. Compare the reported case. So in a jurisdiction wherein such a rule has been held to be valid, an inmate who, in compliance with the regulation, makes payments to the home cannot recover from the institution the money so paid. Brooks v. Hastings, 192 Pa. St. 378, 43 Atl. 1075, 44 W. N. C. 333. See also Bryson v. Home for Disabled Soldiers, etc. 168 Pa. St. 352, 31 Atl. 1008. It is otherwise, however, where the rule has been held to be invalid. See the reported case. In Ball v. Evans, 98 Ia. 708, 68 N. W. 435, it was held that such a rule did not violate the federal statutes which declare void any pledge, mortgage, sale, transfer, or assignment of any right, claim or interest to or in any pension that has been or may be granted, and that no sum of money to become due any pensioner shall be liable to attachment, levy or seizure, but shall inure wholly to the benefit of such pensioner. And in Brooks v. Hastings, 192 Pa. St. 378, 43 Atl. 1075, 44 W. N. C. 333, it was held that a regulation of the kind mentioned did not violate the constitutional prohibition against the taking of property without due process of law and without making just compensation therefor. To the same effect see Loser v. Soldiers' Home, 92 Mich. 683, 52 N. W. 956. In Brooks v. Hastings, supra, the court said: "This is not the taking of property in any conceivable sense. It is the creation of a condition upon which charitable support may be obtained under a contract which is voluntarily made, providing for the contribution of something towards the maintenance of the institution which furnishes the support. The applicant is under no obligation to make such a contract, but if he does make it and gets the benefit he must take it as it is given, and keep his contract like all other good citizens are obliged to do."

On the ground that it may be deemed necessary for the purpose of preserving order, enforcing discipline or preserving the health of the inmates of a soldiers' home, the board of managers thereof may adopt a rule requiring inmates to deposit their pension money with the commandant of the home, to be returned to the inmate on his discharge from the institution. Loser v. Soldiers' Home, 92 Mich. 683, 52 N. W. 956, wherein it was held, however, that the board had no right to determine what relatives were dependent on the pensioner for support and to direct how much of an inmate's money on deposit should be sent to such relatives, and that therefore a rule of this import was invalid.

In U. S. v. Bowen, 100 U. S. 508, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 631, affirming 14 Ct. Cl. 182, there was involved a federal statute providing that "the fact that one to whom a pension has been granted for wounds or disability received in the military service has not contributed to the funds of the Soldiers' Home, shall not preclude him from admission thereto. But all such pensioners shall surrender their pensions to the Soldiers' Home during the time they remain there and voluntarily receive its benefits." In a suit by a pensioner inmate of the home who had contributed to its funds, for the recovery of pension money which he alleged was due to him but which had been paid to the treasurer of the institution, the court allowed recovery and said: "If the qualifying word 'such' is restricted to pensioners described in the sentence which immediately precedes it, then Bowen does not belong to that class, and is not bound to surrender his pension. There is no other class of pensioners described in that section to whom the word such can refer than those who have not contributed to the funds of the home, and Bowen does not belong to that class. The history of the institution affords good reason for that interpretation. The Soldiers' Home was bought and built, and is supported now very largely, by money deducted from the monthly pay of the soldiers of the regular army. But there is a class of persons who have received wounds in the military service, or incurred ill health while in such service, from whose pay no deduction was made as a contribution to the home, who received pensions as invalids, and, by virtue of this section, are entitled to be cared for at that place. There is a manifest propriety in a rule which requires of this class that, when supported out of the fund to which they did not contribute, their pensions should go to increase that fund; while those who have been giving of their monthly pay for years should receive its benefits when they come to need them, without giving also the pension which is the bounty of a grateful government."

Where a pensioner agrees when he becomes a member of a Veterans' Home to pay over to the treasurer of the home any pension money which he may, from time to time, receive, and to abide by all the rules and regulations made by the board of directors of the home, one of which is that "in case of the death of a pensioner or member of the home, any pension or other money due him and remaining in the hands of the treasurer shall be paid directly, and without probate, to his widow, minor children, or mother or father, in the order named, if demand is made within one year, otherwise the same shall escheat to the home, subject to future reclamation by the above relatives for a period of five years," it has been held that a trust is created subject to the pensioner's right to withdraw the money during his lifetime, but with specific directions that in case of his death intestate any balance in the hands of the treasurer shall be disposed of in accordance therewith, and that consequently the administrator of a member of the home cannot recover a balance in favor of his intestate remaining in the treasurer's possession. Treadway v. Veterans' Home, 14 Cal. App. 75, 111 Pac. 111.

In Brownlee v. Veterans' Home, 22 Cal. App. 207, 133 Pac. 1158, the statute involved provided that "any balance of pension money held by the board, or by its authority upon the death of the pensioner, or any moneys belonging to the members of the Home, shall, upon their death, be held as a trust fund, to be paid by the board, directly and without probate, or by its order, to the widow, minor children or mother or father of the pensioner or member in the order named; and should no widow, minor child, or parent be discovered within one year from the time of the death of the pensioner, or of the member, said balance, or moneys, shall be paid to the post fund of the Home, to be used for the common benefit of the members of the Home under the direction of the board, subject to future reclamation by the relatives hereinbefore designated in the order named, upon application filed by the one entitled to the same within five years after the death of said pensioner, or member." An inmate of the home died intestate and on his person was found a sum of money alleged to be pension money which was claimed by his administrator. It was held that the administrator was not entitled to it as the phrase "any moneys" in the statute included at least the pension money in the possession of the member at the time of his death which had not been disposed of by will, and it was not unfair to say that the intestate had agreed that his pension money should be subject to the trust when he, in his application for admission to the home, expressly agreed that his remaining pension money should go to a post fund for the common benefit of all the members of the home, provided no relative claimed it.

MIDDLETON

v.

WHITRIDGE.

New York Court of Appeals—January 12, 1915.

213 N. Y. 499; 108 N. E. 192.

Appeal and Error — Review of Decision of Intermediate Court of Appeal.

As under Code Civ. Proc. § 1346, as amended by Laws 1914, c. 351, providing that an appeal may be taken to the Appellate Division on question of law or on the facts or on both, from a judgment on a verdict, as from a judgment on a trial by referee or court without a jury, the appeal brings up the facts, as well as the exceptions, in all cases, a reversal by the Appellate Division, silent as to its grounds, will in a jury case, as in others, import that the findings of fact, by whomsoever made, were approved by the Appellate Division, so that its reversal will be reviewable by the Court of Appeals on that assumption.

Same.

The judgment of the Appellate Division, though unanimous, being one of reversal, appeal lies to the Court of Appeals without allowance of it, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 191, subd. 2.

Same.

The decision of the Appellate Division that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict is not one that there was "evidence supporting or tending to sustain a finding of fact or a verdict not directed by the court," which, if unanimous, is under Const. art. 6, § 9, and Code Civ. Proc. § 191, subd. 4, not reviewable by the Court of Appeals.

Same.

An original finding or decision by the Appellate Division, under the authority of Code Civ. Proc. § 1317, as amended by Laws 1912, c. 380, is not a decision that there is evidence to sustain a finding of the trial court or a verdict, which, being unanimous, is, under Const. art. 6, § 9, and Code Civ. Proc. § 191, subd. 4, not reviewable by the Court of Appeals.

Same.

That a judgment of the Appellate Division is entered on its unanimous decision that there is evidence supporting or tending to sustain a finding of fact or a verdict not directed by the court does not, under Const. art. 6, § 9, and Code Civ. Proc. § 191, subd. 4, deprive the Court of Appeals of jurisdiction to review it, but that specific question of law alone is not reviewable.

Same.

A judgment of reversal in a jury case by the Appellate Division, granting a new trial, rendered before amendment of Code Civ. Proc. § 1346, by Laws 1914, c. 351, would not be reviewable, unless it affirmatively appeared that the findings of the jury had been affirmed.

Same.

A judgment of reversal by the Appellate Division in a jury case, granting a final judgment dismissing the complaint rendered before amendment of Code Civ. Proc. § 1346, by Laws 1914, c. 351, is reviewable at least to the extent of determining whether it had power to dismiss the complaint.

Power of Appellate Court to Make New Findings.

The power of the Appellate Division, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1317, as amended by Laws 1912, c. 380, to make new findings of fact and a final adjudication on the merits in a case triable of right by a jury, is limited by Const. art. 1, § 2, providing, "The trial by jury in all cases in which it has been heretofore used shall remain inviolate forever, but a jury trial may be waived by the parties in all civil cases in the manner to be prescribed by law," so that in such a case the ultimate decision of all disputed questions of fact must be by a jury, absent consent to a decision of them by the court.

Jury — Guaranty of Jury Trial — Scope of Federal Constitution.

Const. U. S. Amend. 7, as to trial by jury, does not limit state action.

Final Judgment on Appeal as Denial of Jury Trial.

Const. art. 1, § 2, merely guaranteeing the substantial right of trial by jury, and not preserving ancient common-law forms and rules of procedure, is not contravened, where, as matter of law, dismissal of the complaint or direction of a verdict being proper, or disputed questions of fact being by consent submitted to the court for decision, as where both sides move for a direction of a verdict, without asking to go to the jury, the trial court determines the cause without taking a verdict of the jury, and so is not contravened, where, in such a case, the trial court having erred in submitting it to the jury, or in deciding a question of fact submitted to it for decision, the Appellate Division makes such final disposition of the case as the trial court should have made.

[See 8 Ann. Cas. 873.]

Same.

The final judgment of reversal and dismissal which the Appellate Division is empowered by Code Civ. Proc. § 1317, as amended by Laws 1912, c. 380, to render in a jury case, being required to be "on special findings of the jury or the general verdict, or on a motion to dismiss the complaint or to direct a verdict," is such only as the trial court should have rendered on such a verdict or motion; the error this corrected being that of the court and not of the jury, and the province of the jury not being invaded.

Carriers of Passengers — Duty to Passenger Taken Sick in Transit.

Where a passenger becomes sick and unable to care for himself, and the carrier's servants know, or have notice of facts requiring them, in the exercise of reasonable prudence, to know, that he is sick and needs attention, it is their duty to give him such reasonable attention as the circumstances and their obligations to other passengers permit; and if they know, or should know, he is too ill to remain on the car, it is their duty, if practicable, to remove him and put him in the custody of an officer or some one who can look after him.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Evidence in an action for death of a passenger, who, suffering a stroke of apoplexy while on a street car, was carried thereon for five hours, held to warrant a finding of negligence of the conductor in assuming, and continuing to indulge in the assumption, that the passenger was drunk, and not in a critical condition and in need of immediate medical attention.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Evidence in an action for death of a passenger, who suffered a stroke of apoplexy while on a street car, and was carried thereon for hours afterwards, held sufficient to go to the jury on the issue of the omission of the carrier's duty to him being the proximate cause of his death.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal and Error — Final Judgment on Reversal.

The question of the sufficiency of the evidence to present a question of fact must be determined on appeal, as regards the right to finally dispose of the case by dismissal of the complaint, by the evidence actually admitted, including opinion evidence, given over proper objection that the hypothetical questions did not include all the facts which should have been put before the witnesses.

Same.

On appeal from a judgment of the Appellate Division, rendered before amendment, by Laws 1914, c. 351, of Code Civ. Proc. § 1346, reversing the judgment for plaintiff and dismissing the complaint, there being evidence from which the jury could draw inferences for plaintiff, and the record disclosing exceptions requiring a new trial, instead of remitting the case to the Appellate Division to consider it on the facts, a new trial will be granted.

Evidence. — Hypothetical Questions — Assumption of Unproved Fact.

Plaintiff's hypothetical questions to experts, on which they are asked to give the opinion that had plaintiff's intestate had proper care within one or two hours after his first attack of apoplexy, while a passenger on defendant's street car, it was reasonably certain his life could have been saved, should not assume he was in good condition, or apparently in good condition, on boarding the car, without referring to the hardened condition of his arteries, and the condition of his kidneys, as indicated by albumen and granulated casts in his urine, shown by plaintiff's witnesses to have existed.

Carriers of Passengers — Duty to Passenger Taken Sick in Transit.

Where the evidence is only that deceased's life could have been saved if he had received proper care within an hour or two after his first attack of apoplexy, while on defendant's car, defendant is entitled to an instruction that any omission of duty of its servants to him after that time cannot be made the basis of a finding of actionable negligence.

Middleton v. Whitridge, 156 N. Y. App. Div. 154, reversed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, First Judicial Department.

Action for death by wrongful act. Nellie G. Middleton, administratrix, plaintiff, and Frederick W. Whitridge, receiver, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff in trial court. Judgment reversed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Frederick N. Van Zandt, Joseph A. Burdeau and R. A. Mansfield Hobbs for appellant.
J. Ralph Hilton and James E. Quackenbush for respondent.

[503] MILLER, J.—The respondent asks for a dismissal of the appeal, and, if I understand the grounds of the request, they are that under the authority of Wright v. Smith, 209 N. Y. 249, 103 N. E. 154, this court cannot entertain jurisdiction, that the appeal does not lie as of right, and that the unanimous decision of the Appellate Division upon which the final judgment was entered pursuant to section 1317 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not reviewable.

The appeal is from a final judgment dismissing the complaint, so Wright v. Smith (supra) has no application. Whilst the point is not directly involved, we consider it our duty in this connection to call the attention of the bench and bar to an important change in the practice effected by the amendment to section 1346 of the Code of Civil Procedure which took effect September 1st, 1914. In our opinion that amendment was sufficient to change the rule of that case and completely to assimilate the [504] practice on appeal in jury cases to that in actions tried by a referee, or the court without a jury. That was the obvious purpose of the amendment to section 1338 of the Code of Civil Procedure considered by us in that case. However, we were compelled to hold that the legislature had not succeeded in accomplishing its purpose by reason of the fact that said section 1338 as amended in 1912 applied only to appeals from judgment reversing judgments or from orders granting new trials on such reversals, and under section 1346, as it then was, the appeal from a judgment rendered on the verdict of a jury brought up the exceptions only, the facts being still reviewable only on an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. In that state of the practice it would still remain true, notwithstanding the amendment to section 1338, that the Appellate Division might reverse the judgment without considering the questions raised on the appeal from the order, and such a reversal would import nothing as to the disposition of those questions. Upon that distinction in the practice this court has uniformly since the decision of Wright v. Hunter, 46 N. Y. 409, based its refusal in jury cases to entertain jurisdiction of appeals from judgments or orders of the General Term or Appellate Division granting new trials when there was an appeal to that court both from the judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial unless it affirmatively appeared that the order was affirmed or the appeal therefrom dismissed. That distinction was expressly made the basis of the decision in Wright v. Smith (supra). Presumably on account of that decision the legislature has abolished that distinction by amending section 1346 so as to provide that an appeal may be taken upon questions of law or upon the facts or upon both from a judgment rendered on the verdict of a jury precisely as from a judgment rendered upon a trial by a referee or by the court without a jury. As the appeal from the judgment now brings up the facts as well as [505] the exceptions in all cases, a reversal by the Appellate Division, silent as to the grounds thereof, will, perforce of section 1338, import in jury cases as well as in cases tried by a referee or the court without a jury that the findings of fact, whether made by the jury, the court or a referee, were approved by the Appellate Division, and such reversal will now be reviewed by us on that assumption. (Untermeyer v. Yonkers, 188 N. Y. 594, 80 N. E. 1087; Lenox v. Lenox, 195 N. Y. 359, 88 N. E. 571.) It will thus be incumbent on the Appellate Divisions to review the findings of fact in all cases, and, if not satisfied therewith, to say so. Of course, the amendment to said section 1346 will not apply to judgments of the Appellate Division rendered, as this one was, prior to September 1st, 1914.

The appeal is from a judgment of reversal, not from a judgment of affirmance, so an allowance of it pursuant to section 191, subdivision 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure was not necessary.

The decision of the Appellate Division, though unanimous, was that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict, not that there was "evidence supporting or tending to sustain a finding of fact or a verdict not directed by the court" within the meaning of section 191, subdivision 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure, or article 6, section 9, of the State Constitution. That language seems plain. It imports a finding of fact by the trial court or a referee or a verdict of a jury not directed by the court, and a unanimous decision of the Appellate Division on appeal that there is "evidence supporting or tending to sustain" such finding of fact or verdict as the case may be. An original finding or decision by the Appellate Division pursuant to the practice inaugurated under section 1317 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1912, is not a decision that there is evidence to sustain a finding of the trial court or a verdict of a jury. Moreover, the fact that a judgment is entered upon the unanimous decision of the Appellate Division that there is "evidence [506] supporting or tending to sustain a finding of fact or a verdict not directed by the court" does not, as seems too commonly to be supposed, deprive this court of jurisdiction to review it. The specific question of law is not reviewable and, if no others are presented, the appeal is frivolous, still the judgment is appealable.

If the Appellate Division had granted a new trial, its judgment would not be reviewable unless it affirmatively appeared, as it does not, that the findings of the jury had been affirmed (Wright v. Smith, supra); but it has granted a final judgment dismissing the complaint and its action is open to review by us at least to the extent of determining whether on reversing the judgment of the trial court it had the power to dismiss the complaint. That the Appellate Division has the power under section 1317 of the Code of Civil Procedure to make new findings of fact and a final adjudication on the merits in a case triable by the court has been definitely decided by this court. (Bonnette v. Molloy, 209 N. Y. 167, 102 N. E. 559; Lampart v. Smedley, 213 N. Y. 82, 106 N. E. 922.) The extent of the power in cases triable of right by a jury is limited by article 1, section 2, of the State Constitution which provides: "The trial by jury in all cases in which it has been heretofore used shall remain inviolate forever; but a jury trial may be waived by the parties in all civil cases in the manner to be prescribed by law." It is too plain to admit of doubt or to require discussion that in such cases the ultimate decision of all disputed questions of fact must be by a jury unless the parties have consented to a decision of them by the court, but it does not follow that the Appellate Division may never finally dispose of a jury case in which it disagrees with the trial court. The Seventh Amendment to the Federal Constitution does not limit state action, and so Slocum v. New York L. Ins. Co. 228 U. S. 364, Ann. Cas. 1914D 1029, 33 S. Ct. 523, 57 U. S. (L. ed.)

879, is not controlling. Moreover, the said provisions of the State and Federal Constitutions are dissimilar. The provision of the State Constitution guarantees [507] the substantial right of trial by jury, but it contains no language even suggestive of a purpose to preserve ancient common-law forms and rules of procedure. If as a matter of law a dismissal of the complaint or a direction of a verdict is proper, or if disputed questions of fact are by consent submitted to the court for decision, as where both sides move for a direction of a verdict without asking to go to the jury, no constitutional right is invaded by the determination of the cause by the trial court without taking a verdict of the jury. If in such case the trial court errs by submitting the case to the jury, or in deciding a question of fact submitted to it for decision, the purpose of the appeal is to correct such error, and the final disposition of the cause by the Appellate Division, in the manner in which it should have been disposed of in the first instance, does not violate a right which never existed or had been waived, to have the case submitted to the jury. (See Bethwell v. Boston Elevated R. Co. 215 Mass. 467, Ann. Cas. 1914D 275, 102 N. E. 665.) The framers of the amendment to said section 1317 were plainly mindful of the constitutional limitation upon their power. "When a trial has been before a jury," the section reads, "the judgment of the appellate court must be rendered either upon special findings of the jury or the general verdict, or upon a motion to dismiss the complaint or to direct a verdict." The final judgment then which the Appellate Division is empowered to render is the one which the trial court should have rendered either upon a special or a general verdict, or upon a motion to dismiss the complaint or to direct a verdict. The error thus corrected is the error of the court, not of the jury. The province of the jury is not invaded by the correction of such an error and the rendition of the judgment which ought to have been rendered by the trial court. The question on the merits then in this case is whether the evidence presented a question of fact for the jury. If it did not, the Appellate Division had the power [508] on the motion to dismiss the complaint to render the judgment appealed from. If it did, the Appellate Division on reversing the judgment should have granted a new trial.

The plaintiff's intestate died from a cerebral hemorrhage occurring while he was riding as a passenger on one of the defendant's surface street cars. The question is whether there was any evidence from which a jury could have found that the proximate cause of death was the violation of some duty which the defendant owed him. The facts are admitted by the answer or established by uncontradicted evidence, though it is possible to draw conflicting inferences from them. At about 2:40 or 2:45 P. M. on May 24th, 1910, the deceased boarded a north-bound open "pay-as-you-enter" car at One Hundred and Fortieth street in the borough of Manhattan. When last seen shortly before that he was apparently in good health. There was nothing in his appearance or manner to attract notice when he entered the car, and the conductor did not notice any one board the car who appeared to be sick or intoxicated. The answer admits that the attention of the conductor was called to the fact that there was something wrong with the deceased at or near One Hundred and Eighty-second street and Amsterdam avenue, and that upon entering the car the conductor found vomit upon his clothing, and permitted him to remain in the car in that condition until the end of the run was reached. The conductor testified that he observed the deceased change from the right to the left-hand side of the car at One Hundred and Eighty-fifth street and Amsterdam avenue, but did not notice vomit on his clothing and paid no further attention to him until the car reached the end of its run at Fort George, One Hundred and Ninety-fifth street; that there he "tried to rouse" the deceased, "tapped him on his shoulder and told him it was the end of the road, and we were going back down [509] town. He said 'All right, all right,' and he was starting to vomit;" that the deceased did not attempt to get up, but sat "right there in his seat;" that before starting back he (the conductor) told the starter that he had a "drunk" whom he "couldn't get off;" that the starter, without entering the car or investigating the condition of the deceased, said "to let him sleep it off and carry him down; that he would be all right at the end of the trip." No further attention was paid to the deceased, but he was taken from Fort George to the post office. The conductor says that on the way down town he observed the deceased adjusting his spectacles and vomiting from time to time; to quote his language, "It might have gone ten or twenty blocks once in a while and might have gone five. He seemed to be sick at his stomach." The conductor called no one's attention to the deceased at the post office, although there were starters and inspectors at that point, but started the car back up town. Before doing so he entered the car and asked the deceased for his fare. He says that he went in to "rouse the man up and tell him it was best to take a walk." It does not appear that the deceased made any audible response or any movement except to fumble in his pockets. A passenger, just boarding the car, paid the fare, saying: "I have been often in the same boat myself. I have often had a jag on myself. Here is the fare. Let him go and he will be all right." The conductor took the fare and paid no more attention to the deceased. When the car reached Sixty-fifth street at 5:35 P. M. it was turned over to another crew, and with the deceased still on it was taken back to Fort George and again back to One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street, when the attention of an inspector being called to the situation, the car was ordered back to the car barn at One Hundred and Twenty-ninth street, a police officer was called, and at 7:45 P. M. the deceased was removed and taken to the police station. He was then in a state of complete coma. By the [510] direction of the lieutenant he was taken to the Harlem Hospital, where his trouble was diagnosed as cerebral hemorrhage. The next day he was removed to another hospital, where he died at 11:45 P. M. without having regained consciousness. The attention of the conductor of the second crew was called to the deceased by a passenger at Ninety-second street, and on entering the car the conductor observed vomit on his clothes and on the floor. At One Hundred and Seventy-fifth street a passenger picked up his pocketbook, which had fallen to the floor, and he was still able to put it in his pocket. The motorman of the second crew observed him, precisely when seems to be in doubt, lying back in his seat apparently helpless, his clothes covered with vomit, and water running down the side of his pants as though he had urinated. The answer admits that when the second conductor took charge of the car, and thereafter and until the end of the run at Fort George, he noticed the deceased "lying on one of the car seats and occupying the whole seat with his arms stretched out, his hat off, and vomit upon his clothing." There is medical evidence to the effect that the first hemorrhage was slight, and that if the deceased had received proper care within one or two hours after it first occurred a recovery would have been reasonably certain, but that carrying the deceased in the car under the conditions disclosed tended to increase the hemorrhage and ultimately produce coma and death.

It will be useful to determine at this point precisely what duty the defendant owed the deceased. If a passenger becomes sick and unable to care for himself during his journey, it seems plain that the carrier owes him an added duty resulting from the change of situation. That duty springs from the contract to carry safely. Of course, the carrier is not bound, unless it has notice of the fact, to observe that its passenger is ill, but if the defendant's servants knew, or had notice of facts [511] requiring them in the exercise of reasonable prudence to know, that the deceased was sick and in need of attention, it was their duty to give him such reasonable attention as the circumstances and their obligations to other passengers permitted, and if they knew, or under the rule stated should have known, that he was too ill to remain on the car with safety, it was their duty, if practicable, to remove him and put him in the custody of an officer or some one who could look after him. Whilst no case precisely like this has been found, the general obligation of the carrier in such cases has many times been recognized. (See Sheridan v. Brooklyn City, etc. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 39, 93 Am. Dec. 490; Wells v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 25 App. Div. 365, 49 N. Y. S. 510; Newark, etc. R. Co. v. McCann, 58 N. J. L. 642, 34 Atl. 1052, 33 L.R.A. 127; Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. v. Salzman, 52 Ohio St. 558, 49 Am. St. Rep. 745, 31 L.R.A. 261; Connolly v. Crescent City R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 57, 5 So. 259, 6 So. 523, 17 Am. St. Rep. 389, 3 L.R.A. 133; Hutchinson on Carriers [3d ed.] section 992.)

It was of course practicable to stop the car at almost any point of its route and without undue delay to put the deceased in the custody of a police officer. The conductor knew that his passenger had boarded the car without exhibiting, so far as he observed, the slightest evidence of sickness or intoxication, that thereafter he had become suddenly ill, and that at Fort George, after having been carried by his destination, his illness had so progressed as to make him apparently unconscious of his situation and practically helpless. Of course, I am drawing the most favorable inferences to the plaintiff which the evidence and the admitted facts justify.

Was the conductor's heedlessness of his passenger's condition excused by the fact that he assumed, honestly but without any investigation, that the passenger was drunk? If a rash assumption on the part of the conductor will excuse the discharge of the duty which the carrier owes to a passenger taken suddenly ill, then it might as well be said that no duty exists to render any [512] assistance in such case. The case turns not on what the conductor assumed or thought, but on what he should in the exercise of reasonable prudence have done in the light of the facts which were brought to his notice. Of course, the defendant is not to be charged with neglect of duty because of the conductor's failure to discover that his passenger had a stroke of apoplexy. The fault of the conductor was not in making a wrong diagnosis, but in rashly assuming that he was competent to make any diagnosis at all. The passenger's nausea might have resulted from a variety of causes other than intoxication, and his apparent helplessness by the time the car reached Fort George indicated a critical condition requiring immediate attention. It may be assumed that at the moment of first noticing his passenger's nausea the conductor might reasonably have assumed that it was due to intoxication, although that assumption was opposed by the fact that the passenger had exhibited no evidence of intoxication upon boarding the car. The question is whether his continued heedlessness was justified by that assumption in view of what followed and had preceded. If a conductor is to be permitted to diagnose the condition of a passenger apparently taken suddenly ill and rendered helpless, he should at least in making the diagnosis exercise the judgment of a reasonably prudent conductor under the circumstances. There is no pretense that there was the slightest odor of liquor about the deceased, and it affirmatively appears that he had not been drinking. If he had drunk enough liquor to cause him to be in the condition described, it would seem that the odor of it could have been detected upon the most casual investigation. A jury could have found that the condition of the deceased grew worse, and from the description given by the conductor of what occurred at the post office that he was then utterly helpless. That condition, after he had ridden in an open car for two hours, vomiting every few blocks, was so extraordinary, if due to intoxication, as to [513] justify a jury in finding that it would have occurred to a conductor, not utterly heedless, that the passenger was seriously ill, especially in view of the fact that he was apparently sober when he boarded the car.

It is of little consequence what other passengers thought, who owed the deceased no duty and only casually observed his condition. What occurred after the car started back up town from the post office is mainly important as bearing on his apparent condition before that and on the proximate cause of his death, because it is speculative at the best whether any attention rendered after that time could have saved his life. My conclusion is that a jury could have found from the evidence that at some point before the car reached the post office on its trip down town it would have occurred to a reasonably prudent person in the position of the conductor that the deceased was in a critical condition and in need of immediate medical attention, and that it was imprudent to the point of rashness longer to indulge in the assumption, first made without any investigation whatever, that the passenger was drunk.

It remains to consider whether there was evidence from which the jury could have found that the omission of duty which the defendant owed the deceased was the proximate cause of his death. It is, of course, possible that the first hemorrhage might have produced death even with the best of care.

It is rarely possible to establish with absolute certainty the fact to be proven in such cases. Reasonable certainty, however, is all that is required. The medical evidence, and all the surrounding circumstances, tend to show that the first hemorrhage was slight and not fatal, and that the result of carrying the deceased for five hours in an upright position in a street car with the attendant jolting increased the hemorrhage and thus produced complete coma and ultimately death. Medical experts gave their opinion that, if the deceased had had proper care within from [514] one to two hours after the first attack, it was reasonably certain that his life could have been saved. Whether the hypothetical questions included all of the facts which should have been put before the witnesses is not the question now under consideration. The evidence was received and, though perhaps weakened on cross-examination, its force and effect were for the jury. Had the objections been sustained any omissions might have been supplied. The question of the sufficiency of the evidence to present a question of fact must be determined on appeal by the evidence actually received, and we are of the opinion that that evidence presented a question for the jury, both as to the defendant's negligence and as to whether that negligence was the proximate cause of the death. The Appellate Division, therefore, erred in dismissing the complaint.

The question next arises how to dispose of this appeal. Logically the reversal of the judgment of the Appellate Division restores the judgment reversed by it. On that theory this court has uniformly declined to entertain appeals where the Appellate Division had granted new trials without approving of the findings of fact made by the jury. The appellant asks that the judgment of the trial court be restored. That course would deprive the defendant of the right to have the Appellate Division weight the evidence. I have stated the inferences which a jury would have the right to draw from the evidence, but the Appellate Division, having the final review of the facts, might hold that the weight of the evidence required other inferences or that the verdict was excessive and for either reason require the submission of the case to another jury. Only two other courses seem to be open, either, 1, to grant a new trial, or 2, to remit the case to the Appellate Division to consider it on the facts. The granting of a new trial would logically import a reversal by us of the judgment of the trial court. It so happens that the record discloses exceptions, which require a new trial. So it is [515] unnecessary to determine what course would be adopted, if there were no such exceptions. By reason of the amendment to section 1346 hereinbefore considered that question cannot arise with respect to judgments of the Appellate Division rendered after September 1st, 1914.

The hypothetical questions addressed to the medical experts assumed that the deceased was in good condition, or apparently in good condition, on boarding the car, and contained no reference whatever to conditions shown by the plaintiff's witnesses to have existed, especially to the hardened condition of his arteries and the condition of his kidneys indicated by the presence of albumen and granulated casts in his urine. The omission was persisted in though attention was called to it by the court. It may be that the error was cured, at least as to some of the witnesses, by their testimony on cross-examination that their answers made to the hypothetical questions would not be changed if the facts with reference to such conditions had been included in the hypothetical question. We refer to the matter to the end that upon a new trial the error may not be repeated. The court charged the jury on the question of defendant's negligence that they might take into consideration the evidence "that conductor Twomey [the conductor of the second crew] did not inform Sheehan, the police officer, to whom Mr. Middleton was turned over, as to the length of time he had been in the condition described by Twomey, or as to his condition at all, together with all the other evidence in the case." The court refused to charge, as requested, that "if the defendant's employees acted with reasonable care in permitting Mr. Middleton to ride upon the car on its first trip down town, then the defendant is entitled to a verdict." An exception was taken to that refusal and also to the charge which allowed the jury to consider the acts of Conductor Twomey in determining the negligence of the defendant. Those exceptions present reversible error. While the [516] evidence as to what occurred after the car left the post office was admissible for the purposes hereinbefore stated, it was error to permit the jury to base a finding of negligence on any act or omission of the defendant's servants after that time, because as already shown there was not sufficient evidence to justify a finding that such negligent act or omission, if it occurred, was the proximate cause of death. It was a serious question of fact whether any attention or care after the first hemorrhage would have saved the life of the deceased. The jury should have carefully been instructed on the point and their attention should have sharply been drawn to the period of time within which it was permissible for them to find the defendant's servants guilty of any negligence causing the death of the deceased.

The judgments should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

Williard Bartlett, Ch. J., Werner, Chase, Collin and Cuddeback, JJ., concur; Hiscock, J., dissents from the reversal of the judgment of the Appellate Division, but concurs in the opinion of Miller, J., so far as it deals with the questions of practice.

Judgments reversed, etc.

NOTE

Duty and Liability of Carrier to Passenger Taken Sick during Transit.

Several recent cases support the holding in Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Madden, 135 Ga. 205, 21 Ann. Cas. 1077, that if a passenger becomes ill in transit and this is known to the servants of the carrier or is so apparent that they are charged with knowledge of it, it is their duty to give him such special care and attention as may be required in the exercise of the high degree of diligence due from a carrier to a passenger. Weirling v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 115 Ark. 505, 171 S. W. 901; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Adams (Tex.) 163 S. W. 1029. And see the reported case. In the case first cited, it appeared that a woman started on a journey in apparently good health, but during the journey became insane and attempted to throw her baby out of a car window. After being prevented from accomplishing her purpose by the porter she quieted down and was apparently all right again, but in a short while she threw herself and child out of a window on the opposite side of the car. In an action to recover damages for her death it was held that "instructions which, when construed together, in effect, told the jury that, if the employees of appellee failed to exercise the care that a reasonably prudent person would have exercised under the circumstances to prevent the injury and death of Mrs. Weirling, appellant would be guilty of negligence, otherwise it would not be . . . fairly submitted the issue of negligence to the jury." In St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Adams (Tex.) 163 S. W. 1029, the court although recognizing the carrier's duty to a person becoming disabled during transit, held that no actionable negligence was shown. It was said: "The undisputed evidence shows that just before the accident appellee was sitting quietly in her seat in a reclining position, apparently asleep, with her hat over her face, and that suddenly, unexpectedly, and without any warning she jumped through the car window. It is true appellee testified on the trial resulting in the judgment from which this appeal is prosecuted, which she did not do on the former trial, that she told the conductor she intended to get off the train, but she made no effort to do so, at that time or at any other time prior to the accident, while the train was running. She did leave the train at Greenville while it was standing still but under the direction of the conductor was put back upon it, and, according to her own testimony, she consciously walked into the car in which she had been traveling and took the seat she had theretofore been occupying, where she remained quiet and apparently asleep until she jumped through the car window. The testimony, taken in as favorable a light for appellee as we would be warranted in construing it, fails, we believe, to show that appellant's conductor should have anticipated that appellee would jump from the rapidly moving train; and that his failure to establish a guard over her or to forcibly restrain her was negligence proximately resulting in her injury. If the alleged negligent omissions of the appellant to guard and protect appellee from injury were not the proximate cause of the accident and her injury, then 'actionable' negligence has not been shown. . . . We think it must be held that the appellant's employees could not reasonably have anticipated that appellee would jump out of the car window, or through some other opening throw herself from the train, and that appellant is therefore not liable for the injuries she sustained. The appellee at the moment she jumped through the car window was unconscious of what she was doing is evident, but that she was rational and conscious of the nature of her acts and of what was taking place the greater part of the time she was on appellant's train is manifest from her own and other uncontroverted testimony in the record; and, if her mental condition and conduct was so pronounced as to cause any one on the train to apprehend that she might, unless restrained, jump from the fast running train, it is not shown in the record."

In the reported case it is said that if the servants of a street railway company know, or have notice of the facts from which they should know, that a passenger is too ill to remain on the car with safety, it is their duty, if practicable, to remove him and put him in the custody of an officer or some one who can look after him.

In Chicago, etc. Steamship Co. v. Lynch, 201 Fed. 70, 119 C. C. A. 408, it appeared that a passenger on a vessel had become seasick, and was sitting in a chair which rested against the wall when a servant of the carrier removed her chair to the middle of the floor in order to open a stateroom door. The place where the chair was placed was slippery and in a short while she fell from the chair and injured herself. In an action for damages the court in holding that the liability for the injury was a question for the jury said: "The main question is whether plaintiff was injured by the rolling of the steamer and her own seasickness, over which defendant had no control, or by the negligence of the cabin watchman in moving her from a place of safety into an unsafe position. . . . Whether leaving her in the changed position would be likely to cause injury, or the watchman could reasonably have foreseen the probability of injury, were questions for the jury, depending on the extent to which the boat was lurching or rolling, plaintiff's degree of helplessness, the condition of the floor, and other attending circumstances. All these conditions, not capable of being fully reproduced from the printed record, made the case peculiarly one for the jury. In this case we need go no further than to hold that if a sick or helpless passenger is, for the convenience of another passenger, taken from a place of comparative safety without his consent or volition, and put in another place found as a matter of fact to be less safe, liability for a resulting injury is a question for a jury."

As to the right of a carrier to eject a sick passenger for the nonpayment of his fare, see the note to Buckley v. Hudson Valley R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1915D 143.

DEEBLE

v.

ALERTON.

Colorado Supreme Court—November 2, 1914.

58 Colo. 166; 143 Pac. 1096.

Executors and Administrators — Widow's Allowance — Effect of Separation.

Where a husband and wife executed a separation agreement providing that neither should have nor claim any part of the other's estate, but containing no plain provision that the wife waived her widow's allowance in case of the husband's death, there is no waiver, and the separation agreement is no bar to its allowance.

[See note at end of this case.]

Nature of Allowance.

A widow's allowance out of her deceased husband's estate is not a distributive part of the estate, but a part of the cost of administration.

Appointment of Executrix — Person Appointed — Mistress of Testator.

Where testator, after separating from his wife, who became insane, entered into a meretricious relation with R., whom he appointed executrix of his will, but on testator's death it appeared that R. had no interest in the estate under the will or otherwise, that she was unfriendly toward the insane widow, and that the estate was probably insufficient to pay its debts, including the widow's allowance, the court should have sustained a protest against the appointment of R. as executrix, under Rev. St. 1908, § 7111, providing that if any person named as executor shall appear incompetent for any reason, letters of administration may be granted in the same manner as if such person had not been named, etc.

Error to District Court, Montrose county: BLACK, Judge.

Proceeding in administration of estate of Henry Alerton, deceased. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Catlin & Blake for plaintiff in error.

Fink & Wood and Walter P. Crose for defendant in error.

[166]. SCOTT, J.—Henry Alerton of the county of Montrose, in this state, and Lizzie Alerton, had lived together as man and wife for a period of more than thirty years, after which time and on the 19th day of January, 1904, they entered into an agreement that each should live separate and [167] apart from the other, which agreement provided for the division of their property, and the property was divided accordingly.

After describing the property so divided, the agreement recites: "And in pursuance of this agreement it is further mutually agreed that said parties may live separately and apart from each other and reside in such place or places, family or families, and with such relations, friends or other persons, and to follow and carry on such trade or business as he or she may from time to time choose or think fit: that neither will at any time compel the other to live with him or her, or molest, disturb or trouble the other for living separately and apart, nor sue, molest or trouble any other person whatsoever for receiving, entertaining or harboring each other: and except as hereinabove neither party shall or will at any time hereafter claim or demand from the other any money, jewels, plate, clothing, household goods, furniture or stock in trade, or any property whatever, which either now hath or may hereafter procure, or which may be devised or otherwise acquired by either." It was further agreed: "That each shall from and after this agreement pursue their own course and business, as though not married, and that neither shall be liable for the support or maintenance or debts of the other."

About one year after the execution of the agreement and division of property, Alerton executed his will in which and after reciting the said agreement, as to the separation and division of the property, and that he had no children of his own, he bequeathed all his property to the children of one George Reading, deceased, and appointed Sarah E. Reading, widow of the deceased George Reading as executrix of his will, and directed that no bond be required from her as executrix. On November 3, 1912, Alerton died, and upon application, John Deeble [168] was appointed and duly qualified as administrator of his estate. Later, and on the 21st day of November, 1912, there was filed with the county court of Montrose county, the will of Alerton and a petition for probate. Appraisers of the estate were appointed under the proceedings in administration, and on the 9th day of December, a report of these appraisers was filed reciting specific property, and the value thereof, described as property allowed by law to the widow for herself and family, in the aggregate of $2,000. The record discloses that at the time of the appointment of Deeble as administrator, Lizzie Alerton had been adjudged insane, and that the said Deeble had been appointed conservator of her estate.

On the 10th day of December, 1912, Deeble as conservator of the estate of Lizzie Alerton, and certain creditors of Alerton, filed their joint protest against the appointment of Sarah E. Reading as executrix of the will, and asking that Deeble be continued as administrator. The basis of the protest and petition was, that Sarah E. Reading was unfit and incompetent to administer the estate of the deceased, and that she is hostile to the interests of Lizzie Alerton, insane, widow of the deceased Henry Alerton. The validity of the will does not seem to be questioned.

On the 20th day of December, there was filed a petition upon the part of Lizzie Alerton, insane, by Deeble, as conservator of her estate, claiming a widow's allowance in the said sum of $2,000. Upon the hearing the County Court denied the protest, admitted the will to probate and confirmed the appointment of Sarah E. Reading as executrix, but ordered that she give a bond for the faithful performance of her duties as such executrix, in the sum of $5,000, and found that the article of separation is binding upon the parties, and that Mrs. [169] Lizzie Alerton has nothing in the estate, at this time, as widow. Plaintiff in error appealed to the District Court and there the judgment of the County Court was affirmed.

The refusal of the court to allow the protest, or to continue Deeble as administrator, and the action of the court in refusing to grant the petition for a widow's allowance, are questions raised in this controversy.

It appears probable, that no marriage ceremony was ever solemnized as between Henry and Lizzie Alerton, but that they had lived together and were recognized as husband and wife for many years, and that Alerton so considered her, both in the separation agreement, and in the recitation in his will. The parties were never divorced. But there was a marriage certificate introduced in evidence showing the marriage of Alerton to Sarah E. Reading, the executrix of the will, in 1907. But the testimony shows that Alerton made his home at least, at the same house with Lizzie Alerton, up to the time of his death.

The court and counsel seem to have treated the marriage to Mrs. Sarah E. Reading as a nullity, and Lizzie Alerton as having been the wife of Henry Alerton at the time of his death. The learned judge in his written opinion speaks of these matters in the following language:

"This case is decided wholly upon what to the mind of the court the separation agreement shows on its face, and the will and subsequent marriage of Henry Alerton are mentioned as matters of corroboration. It is therefore considered and adjudged by the court that by reason of said separation agreement Lizzie Alerton has no interest in the estate of Henry Alerton, deceased, and that she is not entitled to a widow's allowance."

Upon the question, whether in view of the agreement of separation and division of the property, the [170] widow, Lizzie Alerton is entitled to a widow's allowance, there appears to be a division of opinion in this regard among the authorities, yet the question seems to be settled in this jurisdiction in favor of such allowance. In the case of Wilson v. Wilson, 55 Colo. 70, 132 Pac. 67, Mr. Justice Bailey entered into a very careful examination of our statutes, and the authorities generally upon this subject. While that case involved an anti-nuptial agreement, yet the principle there involved is not different from that of the case at bar. It will be noted that in the agreement in this case, there is no specific waiver of the right of Lizzie Alerton to claim a widow's allowance. In the case just cited it was held by this court that the widow's allowance is not a distributive part of the estate, and is nothing more nor less than a part of the costs of administration.

It is not contended in this case that Lizzie Alerton was not the lawful wife of Henry Alerton at the time of his death. At his death she then became his widow with all rights as such, provided by the statutes. The question of her right as a widow to inherit is not involved in this proceeding and therefore not determined.

It was said in the case of Wilson v. Wilson, supra, "Under all of the decisions of the courts which we have been able to find, a widow's allowance is not in the nature of an interest in an estate, it is not something which goes to the widow by descent; it is a preferred claim against the estate. This is well declared in the case of Claypool v. Jaqua, 185 Ind. 499, 35 N. E. 285. Upon a consideration of section 7206 R. S. 1908, which reads as follows: 'Third. All allowances to the widow, wife or orphans made as provided by law shall compose the third class.' It is noted that the allowance to the widow by express statutory provision is made a preferred claim against the estate, just as in the Indiana [171] case. This allowance is no part of the distributive share of the estate, but is rather, in a very just and proper sense, a charge or claim against the estate. It is, indeed, nothing more or less than a part of the costs of administration."

The divinely inspired and divinely commanded institution of marriage has ever had the favor of the law. The law has constantly before it this sacred relationship upon which rests primarily the home, society, country, and the cause of humanity. The law curbs the will of and prescribes a limit to bequests of testators where such relationship exists. The "widow's allowance," provided by our statute, is a gracious and deserved tribute of the law to wifehood. It is a first charge upon estates, and so made to provide for the comfort and sustenance of the widow and children, pending administration and before distribution. It therefore cannot be a part of that which is to be distributed. It is designed not only as a protection for the widow and children as against want or humiliation, but a protection for the State as well. It is a right that cannot be waived by presumption, assumption or construction. If it may be waived at all, it must be in terms that do not admit of doubt. In the absence of such a waiver, where the relationship of widow exists, the right is corresponding.

In the matter of confirming the appointment of Mrs. Reading as executrix, and discharging Deeble as administrator, it appears that Mrs. Reading can have no interest in the estate under the will or otherwise, and that from the circumstances of her relationship with Alerton in his life-time, together with the express proof of her antagonism toward Lizzie Alerton, the insane widow, she ought not in fairness and justice be continued as executrix. Particularly so when we consider the further fact that the estate appears not to be of sufficient value [172] to pay its indebtedness, including the widow's allowance, and that for such reason, there is scarcely a possibility that any property will remain for distribution, either under the terms of the will or otherwise. Further, it appears that Deeble is a man of high character and a long-time friend of Alerton and his wife. Under these circumstances, it would seem to have been the duty of the court under its statutory power, Sec. 7111 Rev. Stat. 1908, to have allowed the protest and to have continued Deeble as administrator of the estate.

It is the policy of courts in so far as it may be within the limits of the law, and consistent with the interests of the estate, to carry out the expressed will of the testator. But a testator cannot foresee all circumstances and conditions that may afterward arise, and when such do arise as appear to endanger the estate of the deceased or to prevent its proper administration, it is the clear duty of the court, and within its undoubted power, to grant the necessary and proper protection. The law is a jealous guardian of the estates of deceased persons in the matter of their administration. To this end it has conferred upon courts of probate vast powers and wide discretion, though at the same time it has provided the almost unlimited right of review by appellate courts of the acts, conduct, orders and decisions of these courts in such matters.

As before stated, the question of distribution under the will is not before us.

The judgment is reversed with instructions to the court to enter a judgment in harmony with the views herein expressed.

Musser, C. J. and Garrigues, J., concurring.

1. MAJORITY VIEW.

a. Abandonment by Wife.

It is held in a majority of jurisdictions that a wife, who has separated from her husband without legal cause and who has continued to live separate and apart from him, is not entitled to a widow's allowance from his estate. Daniels v. Taylor, 145 Fed. 169, 7 Ann. Cas. 352, 76 C. O. A. 139 (reversing 5 Indian Ter. 219; 5 Ann. Cas. 226, 82 S. W. 727); In re Byrne, Myr. Prob. See also In re Miller, 168 Cal. 420, 111 Pac. 255; Kelly's Estate, 1 W. N. C. (Pa.) 10. Compare Liddell's Succession, 22 La. Ann. 9.

In Odiorne's Appeal, 54 Pa. St. 175, 93 Am. Dec. 682, the court said: "Where a wife leaves her husband and renounces all conjugal intercourse a considerable time before his death, she becomes not such a widow, after his death, as was in the contemplation of the legislature when the Acts of Assembly were passed which entitle her to administer his estate and to appropriate three hundred dollars of it to her own use. . . . The acts contemplate the case of a wife who lives with her husband till his death and faithfully performs all her duties to his family, not one who voluntarily separates herself from him and performs none of the duties imposed by the relation." See to the same effect, Nye's Appeal, 126 Pa. St. 341, 17 Atl. 618, 12 Am. St. Rep. 873. In Daniels v. Taylor, 145 Fed. 169, 7 Ann. Cas. 352, 76 C. O. A. 139, reversing 5 Indian Ter. 219, 5 Ann. Cas. 226, 82 S. W. 727, the court after setting forth the statutes providing for granting to a widow a certain allowance at the death of her husband, said: "These sections quite plainly contemplate the case of a widow who in the lifetime of her husband lived with him as a member of his family, and performed the duties of that relation, and not one who willingly separated from him, performed none of the duties of a wife, and by her gross misconduct disqualified herself from succeeding him as the head of the family." And in Welsh's Estate, 5 Pa. Dist. 675, 18 Pa. Co. Ct. 517, 39 W. N. C. 167, the court in denying the right of a widow to claim her statutory allowance said: "The right to the exemption accorded to the widow by the Act of April 14, 1861, is grounded upon the existence of family relations between the wife and the husband, the severance of which by the death of the husband, and the consequent withdrawal of his support, involves the widow frequently in great pecuniary distress. If the wife was not, at the time of his death, a member of the family of her husband, the presumption is that she was not dependent upon him for maintenance and was not a subject for the operation of the statute. She can free herself from this presumption only by showing that her husband's conduct compelled the separation; and the criterion by which the offensive treatment is to be judged is precisely that which would obtain in a proceeding for divorce: . . . This rule, as to family relationship, has been enforced even where the separation was amicable and was not meant to be lasting: . . . The evidence in the present instance was not, as it seldom is, of one character throughout, and some of it was conflicting; but that which told most severely against the claimant was given by her own children. It undoubtedly established the fact that she had left her husband's household at least six years before his death, and had never returned, and it disclosed no valid pretext on her side for taking that step. On the contrary, there was reason to believe that the husband made an honest effort to reconcile their differences, but without co-operation by the claimant, and hence without success."

In Kahn's Estate, 16 Pa. Co. Ct. 72, 3 Pa. Dist. 806, it appeared that the claimant, the wife of the decedent, was not living with her husband at the time of his decease. She asserted her right to the widow's allowance on the ground that the husband had driven her from his home. The court said: "The evidence leaves it in no manner of doubt that there were frequent quarrels, and even some show of violence, between the parties, and it is so evenly balanced that it is hard to say who was the sinner and who the sinned against. But it does not show that any specific act of the husband hastened the wife's departure, nor that his treatment of her at the close of their cohabitation was any worse than it had been at the beginning. In order to succeed in her application, the wife was bound to exhibit a legal excuse for withdrawing from her husband's society, and she failed to give it. For that reason her letters are important, as perhaps they otherwise would not be, inasmuch as they seem to disclose the motive which actuated her. If they mean what they say, they show that she quitted her husband in order to consort with another man. Having thus, by her own act, sundered the family relation, she cannot with any propriety claim an allowance which is based upon the continuance of that relation."

In North Carolina it has been provided by statute that if any married woman shall commit adultery, and shall not be living with her husband at his death she shall lose all right to the widow's allowances. See Leonard v. Leonard, 107 N. C. 171, 12 S. E. 60, where in the court said: "The jury, in response to issues submitted, found that the plaintiff committed adultery prior to 1868, and had not since lived with her husband, and was not living with him at his death. It is unnecessary to consider the other exceptions, as upon the issues found we think judgment should have been entered for the defendant. The Code, sec. 2116, provides: 'If any married woman shall commit adultery, and shall not be living with her husband at his death, she shall thereby lose all right to a year's provision, and to a distributive share from the personal property of her husband, and such adultery may be pleaded in bar of any action or proceeding for the recovery of such rights and estates.' Formerly the adultery of his wife, and living separate from her husband at the time of his death, ousted the woman of her dower (statute 13 Ed. I; Walters v. Jordan, 35 N. C. 361), but did not deprive her of her year's provision and distributive share of the estate. Walters v. Jordan, 34 N. C. 170. In 1871-'72, ch. 193, sec. 44, it was enacted that if any married woman shall elope with an adulterer, she shall thereby lose all right to dower, year's provision and distributive share. In Cook v. Sexton, 79 N. C. 305, this act was construed by the court, which held it to be entirely prospective, and not applicable when the elopement had taken place prior to the passage of the act." Compare Cook v. Sexton, 79 N. C. 305, and Walters v. Jordan, 34 N. C. 170, decided under an earlier statute and explained in Leonard v. Leonard, supra.

Likewise in Indiana a statute providing that a widow can claim no part of her husband's estate if she has abandoned him and is living in a state of adultery at the time of his death, has been held to bar her right to claim the widow's allowance, Owen v. Owen, 57 Ind. 291.

b. Abandonment by Husband.

In several jurisdictions it is held that where a separation has been caused by the husband's abandonment of his wife, the widow is entitled to her allowance on the death of the husband. Shaffer v. Richardson, 27 Ind. 122; Grieve's Estate, 165 Pa. St. 126, 30 Atl. 727 (distinguishing Spier's Appeal, 26 Pa. St. 233; Terry's Appeal, 55 Pa. St. 344; Balmforth's Estate, 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 491; Spence's Estate, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 494; Moore's Appeal, 40 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 850; Krewson's Estate, 18 Montg. (Pa.) 114; In re Weidler's Estate, 16 York Leg. Rec. (Pa.) 3, 19 Lanc. 212. See also Reed's Estate, 21 Pa. Dist. 906. Compare Spier's Appeal, 26 Pa. St. 233 (distinguished in Grieve's Estate, 165 Pa. St. 126, 30 Atl. 727); Coates's Estate, 6 W. N. C. (Pa.) 367. Thus in Grieve's Estate, supra, it appeared that the claimant and the deceased had been married in Canada, where the wife and three children were abandoned by the husband; Subsequently, the husband requested his wife to meet him in Ontario where they were reconciled. He later left with the understanding that he was to make a home for the family in the States, and that the wife should remain in Canada until he sent for her. He continued to write to her for several years, after which, nothing was heard from him. It further appeared that he settled in Pennsylvania and married another woman who lived with him until the time of his death. The court said: "All the evidence points to the conclusion that the appellee was a devoted wife and mother, and that she bravely bore the burdens which her husband's malicious and inexcusable desertion of his family imposed. To maintain herself and her children she taught school, gave music lessons and finally became a trained nurse. . . . There was no time after his departure in 1884 that she would not have gladly welcomed a redemption of his promise and rejoiced in a reunited family. It was no fault of hers that she was not a member of his household at his death. It was illegal acts and bad faith that excluded her from it. In contemplation of law the family relation still existed and his domicile was hers. Why, then, should she be denied the exemption which the law allows to his widow? Surely a refusal of her claim for it must have something more to rest upon than his repudiation of his marital vows and duties." See to the same effect Balmforth's Estate, 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 491. Likewise in Reed's Estate, 21 Pa. Dist. 906, it was held that where a wife has been driven from the home by her husband and is living apart from him at the time of his death, the same rule applies as where the wife has been deserted, and she is entitled to her allowance from the estate. See to the same effect De Walt's Estate, 38 Pa. L. J. 275. In Simpson's Estate, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 326, 22 W. N. C. 172, it was held that the widow could claim her allowance where it appeared that she had been driven from the home of her husband by the cruelty of a step-son and had remained away through no fault of her own. However in Burkett's Estate, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 501, the court said: "If a wife, in consequence of cruel and barbarous treatment endangering her life, withdraws from the husband's house and family, and remains away, without any offer or effort to return, for the space of six years, during which time, she is neither waiting nor willing to resume her place in the family, she may, upon his death, as his widow, have her share of his estate under the intestate laws, but not allowance of three hundred dollars given by the Act of 1851, which the widow belonging to the family is to retain for the use of herself and family. For the latter is a pure gratuity, intended to provide for the immediate necessities of a family suddenly deprived of its head, and is not given to the widow as such, but to her as the surviving head of the family, and she must be, either actually or constructively, in the family at the time of her husband's death. She may be constructively in cohabitation, though she be separated temporarily from her husband through his fault, if she is waiting to fill a wife's place; for she hath done what she could. . . . But if she abandons her husband with a fixed intention not to return, she is not constructively of his family." And in Groves's Estate, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 498, although it was found that the widow and claimant was justified in leaving her husband before his decease her allowance was denied because of the fact that she was residing in another state and there had been a delay of more than two years in making the demand. In a case wherein it appeared that a husband abandoned his wife, by fraudulent means procured a decree of divorce in the courts of another state, and remarried, it was held that the divorce would be considered null and void and that the first wife was entitled to the widow's allowance. Field v. Field, 215 Ill. 496, 74 N. E. 443 (affirming 117 Ill. App. 307). Compare Kersey v. Bailey, 52 Me. 198, wherein the court said: "The appellant, though the legal wife of the deceased, had not lived or cohabited with him as such for more than forty years. True, he deserted her, but subsequently she, supposing him to be dead, married another man with whom she lived and cohabited as his wife for thirty years or more, and until his decease. The intestate, on his return to this state many years ago, finding that she had formed new ties, allied himself to another woman by whom he had a family, and in connection with whom the little property left by him at his decease would seem to have been accumulated. The appellant, entangled with her new connection, does not appear to have made any claim upon him for support during the long time that elapsed after his return to this state before his decease. She lost nothing by his death, which she had before possessed. In fact there seems to have been a tacit relinquishment by each of all claims upon the other for more than a quarter of a century. It is plain that she contributed nothing by her industry and prudence to the accumulation of the three or four hundred dollars out of which she now claims an allowance. Upon her right to dower in his real estate we do not pass. But while we impute no blame to her for the sundering of this old connection, we do not see that the Judge of Probate erred in refusing an allowance under all the circumstances of the case."

c. Separation by Mutual Consent.

In some jurisdictions it has been held that where a separation is mutually agreed to and the wife is living apart from her husband at the time of his death, she is not entitled to the widow's allowance. Odel's Estate, 52 Mich. 592, 18 N. W. 373; Platt's Appeal, 80 Pa. St. 501; In re Park, 25 Utah 161, 69 Pac. 671. In the case last cited, the court said: "The statute providing for family allowance was doubtless intended to make immediate provision for the family when the head of it is removed by death, and such provision is to continue during the administration of the decedent's estate. In this case there was no family, except the wife, and she did not constitute the immediate family of the deceased; she and her husband having many years ago agreed to live separate and apart from each other, and had so lived up to the time of his death. She was therefore never dependent upon him for support, and we think, under all the circumstances, the court properly refused an allowance."

However, in Wright's Estate, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 228, a widow was granted an allowance where it appeared that she had been married to the decedent for more than six years although, at his request, she had never lived with him. It appeared that they had always been on terms of entire amity and the sole reason for their living apart was the decedent's fear that he might not be able to provide for her. And in Linares v. De Sinares, 93 Tex. 84, 53 S. W. 579, the court said: "In this case we have the meager facts that the separation was by agreement between the husband and wife, and 'that the wife was induced thereto by reason of the cruel treatment of the husband.' The nature and extent of the cruelty does not appear from the court's findings. Presumably, it was sufficient to justify the separation on her part. If not, the administrator who contested her application should have shown it. We therefore conclude that under the facts of this case it does not appear that the wife had forfeited her right as surviving widow to claim an allowance in lieu of a homestead and other exempt property."

2. MINORITY VIEW.

Under some statutes, the courts have held that a widow is entitled to her allowance if the status of husband and wife still existed at the time of the husband's death, though they had been living separate and apart previous to that time. Smith v. Smith, 112 Ga. 351, 37 S. E. 407; Sammons v. Higbie, 103 Minn. 448, 115 N. W. 265; Mowser v. Mowser, 87 Mo. 437; King v. King, 64 Mo. App. 301, 2 Mo. App. Rep. 998; Comerford v. Coulter, 82 Mo. App. 362; Matter of Shedd, 60 Hun 367, 14 N. Y. S. 841, affirmed 133 N. Y. 601, 30 N. E. 1147 (distinguishing Linton v. Crosby, 56 Ia. 386, 9 N. W. 311, 41 Am. Rep. 107); In re McMillan, 28 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 645. See also Farris v. Battle, 80 Ga. 187, 7 S. E.

262; Linton v. Crosby, 56 Ia. 386, 9 N. W. 311, 41 Am. Rep. 107. Thus in Smith v. Smith, supra, the following charge regarding the widow's right to an allowance was held to be correct: "The fact that this widow (the plaintiff) may not have been living with him (her husband) for some time previous to his death would make no difference if she had not been divorced or he had not been divorced from her; she would be entitled to all the rights of a wife." In Sammons v. Higbie, 103 Minn. 448, 115 N. W. 265, the court said: "Allowances of personal property which do not rest in the discretion of the court . . . are not barred or forfeited by a wife who, with or without cause, deserts and abandons her husband and is living separate and apart from him at the time of his death. Such property rights spring from and arise out of the marriage of the parties, and the authorities sustain the general proposition that, if that relation in fact exists at the time of the husband's death, the statutes apply and force and effect must be given their provisions. . . . The statutes controlling the question whether a right to the property vested in the wife at the husband's death, or whether the 'allowances' rested in the discretion of the court, will admit of but one construction. They provide that when any person dies possessed of personal property the same 'shall be applied and distributed,' as follows: (1) The widow shall be allowed the wearing apparel of the husband; (2) his household furniture of a designated value; and (3) other personal property not exceeding in value five hundred dollars. This language is plain and unambiguous, and declares that the property mentioned 'shall be allowed' to the widow, and its allowance is in no sense discretionary with the probate court. The clear intention of the legislature was to vest an absolute right to the property mentioned in the widow; the only act remaining to be done after the husband's death being the designation of the particular property selected by her. . . . Our conclusion, therefore, upon this branch of the case, is that the property rights here involved, being absolute by the statute in the widow, were not barred or forfeited by her abandonment of the husband before death, whether the abandonment was with or without cause; and we hold generally, in construing the statute, that if at the time of the husband's death in any particular case the relation of husband and wife in fact exists the provisions of subdivisions 1 and 2 vest in the widow an unqualified right to the property there referred to. The operation of the statute can be suspended or prevented only by a decree annulling or dissolving the marriage." In Mowser v. Mowser, 87 Mo. 437, it was said: "The abandonment by plaintiff of her husband did not impair her right to the provision claimed. The four hundred dollars allowed her by [statute] is an absolute provision for the widow, and she is entitled to it whether there are children of the marriage or not, or whether the deceased left a family or not. It is not given to the widow for the benefit of herself and her children, or the children of the deceased, but to her for her own use to be disposed of as she may see proper, and notwithstanding she abandoned her husband and without any sufficient reason, still she is entitled to the property or its value claimed by her. She was his wife to the day of his death. The court will not try divorce suits after one of the parties to the marriage is dead." In re McMillan, 28 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 645, the court said: "It is said here in argument that there was some controversy between husband and wife, and it was perhaps mutually agreed by them that they would live apart and not cohabit together as husband and wife any further, which they continued to do for about the period of seven years. It is contended that relations between them as parts of the same family ceased to exist, and it is also said that the wife at one time brought an action for divorce; there was an answer to this petition praying for divorce, but there was never any divorce granted. Therefore, when this husband died, he left this woman as his widow, there being no legal separation, and as his widow she would be entitled to a year's support and the articles of personal property."

3. RULE IN MASSACHUSETTS.

In Massachusetts it is held that the granting of an allowance to the widow lies within the discretion of the court and is to be made with regard to all the circumstances of the case. The fact that the widow has lived apart from her husband for some years does not prevent her from claiming the allowance if she is in necessitous circumstances. Hollenbeck v. Pixley, 3 Gray 521; Slack v. Slack, 123 Mass. 443; Chase v. Webster, 168 Mass. 228, 46 N. E. 705; Welch v. Welch, 181 Mass. 37, 62 N. E. 982. Thus in Slack v. Slack, supra, it appeared that the petitioner in 1847, went to live with the intestate as his housekeeper, and they cohabited as husband and wife from that time until 1858, when they were lawfully married, and afterwards continued to live together as husband and wife for about two years. Difficulties arising between them on account of his gross and confirmed habits of intoxication, which had existed throughout their cohabitation, they agreed that she should live apart from him for a year and then return. Before she went away, he withdrew his consent and urged her to remain, but she insisted on leaving him according to their agreement, and went to live in another town with her daughter by a former marriage. At the expiration of the year she returned to his house, but, finding that he had obtained another housekeeper, with whom she believed him to be living in adultery, she went away again and never returned. She was not asked by him to return, and continued to live apart, rendering him no services and supporting herself, until his death. The court said: "The statute gives a discretionary power to the judge of probate to make such allowance to the widow as he shall judge fit for the supply of necessities for her use, 'having due regard to all the circumstances of the case.' The question how much shall be allowed must depend upon the varying circumstances of each case, with reference to which no general rule can well be stated. The fact, that the parties lived separate, or which party was the culpable cause of the separation, may have little application to the question. 'The allowance,' as remarked by Shaw, C. J., in Hollenbeck v. Pixley, 3 Gray 521, 'is not made to the widow as a reward for faithful service as a wife; nor is it given out of the husband's estate as compensation to her for ill treatment by him as a husband; but it is a question solely of her actual necessities.'"

II. Effect of Written Agreement.

Where a husband and wife separate voluntarily, and continue to live apart under the terms of a separation contract by which the wife waives her rights in the husband's estate, it is generally held that the agreement may be effectively asserted as a bar to the widow's allowance. Noah's Estate, 73 Cal. 583, 15 Pac. 287, 2 Am. St. Rep. 829 (affirmed on second appeal 88 Cal. 468, 26 Pac. 361); In re Yoell, 164 Cal. 540, 129 Pac. 999; Fisher v. Clopton, 110 Mo. App. 663, 85 S. W. 623; In re Roth, 9 Ohio Dec. 429, 6 Ohio N. P. 498; Speidel's Appeal, 107 Pa. St. 18; Dillinger's Appeal, 35 Pa. St. 357; Schmitt's Estate, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 183; Henkel's Estate, 13 Pa. Super. Ct. 337. See also Wickersham v. Comerford, 96 Cal. 433, 31 Pac. 358. See also Hettrick v. Hettrick, 55 Pa. St. 290. See also Hitner's Appeal, 54 Pa. St. 110. In Noah's Estate, supra, it appeared that the wife of the decedent had lived separate and apart from him for several years prior to his death. A written agreement for separation executed by them provided that in consideration of $10,500 paid by the husband she agreed not to demand any alimony or support from him and that the payment should be in full satisfaction of "all her marital claims" etc. The court said: "Since the appellant voluntarily made an agreement with her husband for separation, such as our law authorizes, received and enjoyed the benefits of the money paid for her support during the separation, and voluntarily continued to live apart from him without any attempt to set aside the agreement, or to assume again the matrimonial connection, or even to demand further means or her separate support—the court below was justified in holding that the petitioner did not constitute the immediate family of the deceased, to whom was to be continued, during the settlement of the estate, the 'reasonable support' which the husband in ordinary cases is presumed to furnish his wife." In re Yoell, 164 Cal. 540, 129 Pac. 999, the court said: "Upon the death of the husband the surviving wife may receive a family allowance when and only when she is a member of the family and receiving or entitled to receive support as such member, and when, even though a member of the family, she has not parted with or relinquished her right to make demand for such allowance. (a) To establish such relinquishment of right, no more apt words could be chosen than those deliberately employed in the agreement under consideration. True, it does not in terms and by name relinquish the right to a family allowance, but it does more than this. The wife covenants that she has renounced and waived all claim which she has or may have as heir of the husband or as his surviving wife. It is only as heir and surviving wife that she could make her demand for a family allowance, a demand which she has solemnly renounced.

It is concluded, therefore, that by the very language of the separation agreement the wife renounced, surrendered, and released her right to make application for a family allowance." In re Roth, 9 Ohio Dec. 429, 6 Ohio N. P. 495, the court held the following contract to be sufficient to bar the claimant's right to a year's allowance as his widow: "I, the undersigned, Amelia Roth, nee Schwappacher, do hereby, certify that I have received from William Roth, one hundred and fifty dollars ($150.00) as payment in full of all my accounts and claims upon him. I, Amelia Roth, do hereby absolutely renounce and waive all matrimonial rights and legal claims upon the said William Roth. Further I promise to annul my suit against William Roth now pending in the court of common pleas, Springfield, Ohio, and never to enter a law suit against him nor raise any claim whatever." In Speidel's Appeal, 107 Pa. St. 18, the court said: "The examiner appointed by consent of counsel, to take testimony and report the facts, found that the appellant entered into a contract of separation with her husband in 1868. That the agreement was signed, sealed and executed; that she at that time, and subsequently, received a certain portion of his estate in pursuance of said contract; that all mutual claims by virtue of their marital rights against each of their respective estates were then relinquished, and that their separation was actual, immediate and continuous. The court concurred with this finding of facts, and affirmed the conclusion of the examiner. A careful examination of the evidence justifies the finding. (The husband) lived some fourteen years after the agreement was executed. During all that time the separation continued. At his death the appellant did not sustain such a relation to him as one of his family as entitles her to claim three hundred dollars worth of property out of his estate." In Dillinger's Appeal, 35 Pa. St. 357, it appeared that a husband and wife agreed to live separate and apart and duly executed articles of separation. At the death of the husband the widow claimed her share of the estate including a claim for the widow's allowance of three hundred dollars. The court said: "In effect and substance, the articles were a solemn and legal renunciation of dower in the husband's estate, and of all interests that might arise under existing or future statutes. Therefore, she has no right to claim in character of his widow. It is against equity and conscience, that she sets up a claim. It is said, she is embraced by the terms of the three hundred dollar law in favor of widows. We think not. We hold the legislature did not mean, by the word widow, a person in her circumstances, and that we should misapply the law, if we gave her the benefit of it."

However in Newton v. Trussdale, 89 N. H. 634, 45 Atl. 646, it appeared that the husband and wife had a controversy over the ownership of their joint property as to the amount belonging to each. For the purpose of settling the difficulty they executed an agreement. On the death of the husband the widow claimed her allowance and the agreement was pleaded as a bar. The court said: "The language . . . employed was apt and proper to effect a division of their joint property, and to provide that the wife's portion should be held as her separate estate, free from the control of her husband. There is no language in the instrument which indicates that the parties intended that the wife should release any claim she might have to the personal estate of her husband in case she survived him. If that had been the intention of the parties, they would doubtless have used proper language to express it. There is nothing in the agreement which can be held to be a bar to her claim for such share of the personal estate of her deceased husband as a widow is entitled to by law. The terms of the agreement did not provide that the parties should live separate, and that the parties did not so understand it is indicated by the fact that they lived together a year and a half afterward. The mere fact that they lived separate a few years before the husband's death, in the absence of anything to show that it was due to the fault of the wife or was even desired by her, is not of itself sufficient to bar her claim for an allowance, or to show that the decree of the probate court granting her one ought on that account to be reversed."

The holding of the reported case to the effect that a separation agreement is not a bar to the widow's right of allowance from the estate of her husband unless the allowance is specifically waived is apparently based on the previous reasoning of the court with reference to antenuptial agreements. It is in direct conflict with the holding of the Missouri Court of Appeals in Fisher v. Clopton, 110 Mo. App. 663, 85 S. W. 623, wherein the proceeding was begun by the plaintiff's application to the probate court for an allowance of four hundred dollars and a year's maintenance out of the personal estate of her deceased husband. The defendant as administrator of the estate objected to the allowance on the ground that in the lifetime of the husband he and she had entered into a deed of separation whereby nearly three thousand dollars was made over to her and she released all claim to or interest in his estate. That portion of the deed read as follows: "And I, Louise Fisher, wife of the said John Fisher, for and in consideration of the sum of twenty-seven hundred dollars ($2,700) heretofore given me by said John Fisher, and his agreement that said moneys shall be and remain my sole and separate, and individual property, do hereby relinquish to him all my right, title and interest in any and all property now held, or owned, or hereafter acquired by him, and for said consideration do hereby, at his instance and request, release and relinquish unto said Thomas Adolph Bickle all my right, title and interest, in and to the above described lands." The court said: "A portion of the case as presented by the plaintiff would indicate that she considers there must be an express stipulation in the contract between husband and wife whereby she, in terms, expressly renounces dower or other interest in her husband's property. That view would be applicable to a case involving a contract for jointure before marriage. . . . And also, it seems, even if such contract be in the nature of jointure and made after marriage. . . . But the defense in this case is not based on jointure, but a contract of separation. . . . And while it must appear in such contract that it was the intent and purpose to renounce all claims in the husband's property, yet there is no statutory requirement that such purpose must be stated in express terms, . . . there is a great difference between a contract for jointure and a contract for separation. In post-nuptial jointure the widow may renounce such provision and take her statutory dower. . . . But no such right is given in cases of contract for separation. The latter class of contracts, though they are postnuptial, are not revocable at the will of the wife, or widow. So, therefore, we rule that the plaintiff in this case is barred of her right to the allowances claimed."

Where there has been a reconciliation and cohabitation between the parties subsequent to the execution of a contract of separation the contract cannot be effectively asserted as a bar to the widow's allowance as by their acts the parties are deemed to have avoided the terms of such contract. Haile v. Hale, 40 Okla. 101, 135 Pac. 1143. See to the same effect, Roberts v. Hardy, 80 Mo. App. 86; Knapp v. Knapp, 95 Mich. 474, 55 N. W. 353.

Discovery — Privilege — Transcript of Court Proceedings.

A transcript of shorthand notes of a proceeding in court which the attorney of a stranger thereto procured to be taken for his information in anticipated litigation is not privileged from inspection.

[See note at end of this case.]

[86]. Appeal from a decision of Lawrence J.

The action was brought by the plaintiff Lambert against the defendant Home for damages for personal injuries.

The facts were as follows. On May 4, 1913, a collision occurred between the defendant's motor car and a taxi-cab the property of the National Motor Car Company, Limited. The taxi-cab was [87] driven by a driver named Sutton. The plaintiff Lambert was riding in the taxi-cab at the time of the collision. Proceedings were subsequently taken in the county court by the defendant against the National Motor Cab Company, Limited, to recover the amount paid by him for repairs to his motor car. An action was also brought in the county court by Sutton, the driver of the taxi-cab, against the defendant for damages for personal injuries. The two actions Home v. National Motor Cab Company, Limited, and Sutton v. Home were heard together on July 23, 1913, before the judge of the West London County Court, who held that the driver of the defendant's car was to blame for the collision; and he accordingly gave judgment for the defendants in the first action and for the plaintiff in the second action. The defendant's solicitors were aware, prior to the hearing of these actions, that the plaintiff Lambert was riding in the taxi-cab at the time of the collision and that he received serious injuries, and they anticipated that in all probability an action would be brought by him after the determination of those two actions. They, therefore, for the purposes of an appeal, if necessary, but mainly in order to be in a position to advise the defendant in the present action whether or not he should defend the proceedings, if any, which might subsequently be brought by the plaintiff Lambert, had a shorthand note taken of the proceedings in the county court actions and a transcript thereof made. As anticipated, the present action was brought by the plaintiff Lambert. In the course of the action an affidavit of documents was made by the defendant, in which he objected (inter alia) to produce the transcript on the ground that it was privileged. The Master held that the plaintiff Lambert was entitled to have inspection of it. The defendant appealed to Lawrence J. in chambers, who dismissed the appeal, but gave leave to the defendant to appeal to the Court of Appeal. The present appeal was accordingly brought.

[90] COZENS-HARDY M. R.—On May 4, 1913, there was a collision between the defendant's motor car and a taxi-cab in which the plaintiff was riding. Two actions were commenced in the county court, one by the defendant against the taxi-cab company, and the other by the driver of the taxi-cab against the defendant. Both the driver of the taxi-cab and the plaintiff Lambert were injured in the collision. These two actions were tried together. The defendant Home, anticipating that an action would be brought against him by Lambert, caused a shorthand note of the county court proceedings to be taken and a transcript thereof made. The anticipated action was commenced. An affidavit of documents was made by the defendant in which he objected to produce (inter alia) the transcript on the ground of privilege. Master Archibald and Lawrence J. held that the plaintiff was entitled to have inspection, and this is an appeal against that decision.

It is admitted that the transcript relates to the matters in question in this action, but it is contended that the document is privileged—that it is in substance a part of the defendant's brief, as a statement of what some, or possibly all, of the witnesses who were present at the collision have sworn, and that it is not fair to require the defendant to produce that which has been brought into existence under the instructions and at the cost of the defendant in anticipation of the present litigation. Now the proceedings in the county court were public. Any one present could listen and take a note of what the witnesses said. The transcript did not involve any such "professional knowledge, research and skill" as Bowen L. J. referred to in Lyell v. Kennedy, 27 Ch. D. 1, 31. There is no original composition in the document. [91] It is a mere transcript of that which was publici juris. A defendant who has obtained at his own cost a copy of a document, not in his possession, which is not itself privileged, cannot decline to produce the copy, although he obtained it in anticipation of future litigation. So here a mere reproduction in a physical form of material which was publici juris cannot, I think, be privileged.

With one exception, the authorities seem to me to support this view. Wood V. C. in Nicholl v. Jones, 2 Hem. & M. 588; Kay J. in Rawstone v. Preston Corp. 30 Ch. D. 116; North J. in In re Worawick, 38 Ct. D. 370, and Stirling J. in Ainsworth v. Wilding [1900] 2 Ch. 315, all laid down principles which seem to me to cover the present case. The only exception is the decision of a Divisional Court in Nordon v. Defries, 8 Q. B. D. 508, which, with great respect, I am unable to follow. The reasoning on which Mathew J. based the judgment of the Court has not, in the argument before us, been attempted to be supported. The authority of Nordon v. Defries, 8 Q. B. D. 508, has been questioned by text-writers. In my opinion the order made by Lawrence J. was quite right, and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BUCKLEY L. J.—The proposition which the appellant is here to affirm may, I think, be stated in the following terms: "That which was said by the witness in the box is, I agree, public property. And it is relevant. It exists in the form of a document. That relevant document is privileged because I wrote the document; or my solicitor for my benefit wrote it or procured it to be written for me." This is privilege based upon reproduction by writing. In my opinion, no such privilege exists. If it did a copy of a document as distinguished from the original would be privileged. The document is not one which has been composed by the writer, or of which the writer is in any way the author. He has done nothing more than reproduce in a physical form that which came into existence in its relevant form when the witness spoke in the box. The writer is comparable to a [92] gramophone or a photographic camera. The document as distinguished from its contents is not relevant. The writing itself is not available at all in evidence. It is nothing more than the proof of the shorthand writer.

It has been sought to sustain the claim to privilege upon the familiar ground that materials coming into existence for the purposes of the trial, or collected by the solicitor for the purposes of the trial, are privileged. The doctrine, in my opinion, is not applicable. The case of Lyell v. Kennedy, 27 Ch. D. 1, is no doubt authority for the proposition that if the solicitor has by search and selection procured copies of or extracts from sources open to any member of the public the collection may be privileged. The point is best stated by Bowen L. J. 27 Ch. D. 31. He says: "A collection of records may be the result of professional knowledge, research, and skill, just as a collection of curiosities is the result of the skill and knowledge of the antiquarian or virtuoso, and even if the solicitor has employed others to obtain them, it is his knowledge and judgment which have probably indicated the source from which they could be obtained. It is his mind, if that be so, which has selected the materials; and those materials, when chosen, seem to me to represent the result of his professional care and skill, and you cannot have disclosure of them without asking for the key to the labor which the solicitor has bestowed in obtaining them." In that class of case the solicitor has done original work and by his professional skill and research has obtained a collection of materials to be used for the purpose of the trial. In the present case there is no original work or collection of materials leading to a result. The only original act done is to reproduce physically material which was public juris and of which any one was at liberty to avail himself.

The authorities are in my opinion uniformly in favor of this view. Nicholl v. Jones, 2 Hem. & M. 588; Rawstone v. Preston Corp. 30 Ch. D. 116; In re Worwick, 38 Ch. D. 370; Goldstone v. Williams [1899] 1 Ch. 47, and Ainsworth v. Wilding [1900] 2 Ch. 315, are all cases in which the principle [93] which I have stated is, in my opinion, to be found. Nordon v. Defries, 8 Q. B. D. 508, with great respect to the learned judges who decided it, is in my judgment wrong. The decision is rested upon a proposition which I think cannot be maintained. The shorthand notes had been taken in an action of Nordon v. Nordon. Discovery of them was asked for the purpose of using them in an action of Nordon v. Defries, 8 Q. B. D. 508, Mathew J. says that in the action of Nordon v. Nordon the shorthand notes would seem to have been clearly privileged. In my judgment they would not have been privileged at all. If there had been subsequent proceedings in Nordon v. Nordon, as upon an inquiry as to damages or a reference before the Master or any subsequent step, the notes taken at the trial of Nordon v. Nordon would not have been privileged. That decision was said to follow the principles laid down in Southwark, etc. Water Co. v. Quick, 3 Q. B. D. 315. That case did not, I think, contain the principle which is supposed to be found in it. There were three classes of documents in that case. The third was plainly privileged. The first two were certain transcripts, and in both cases it will be seen that they were transcripts of conversations at interviews held for the purpose of obtaining information to be submitted to the solicitor for advising in relation to an intended action. The oral statement which was included in the document was a confidential statement, and the question did not arise in a case where the facts were that the oral statement was public and the only work done was to record that public statement in writing.

For these reasons I think that the privilege claimed in this case for the transcripts of the proceedings in the county court in the actions of Sutton v. Home and Home v. National Motor Car Company, Limited, cannot be supported, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

CHANNELL, J.—I regret that in this case, for the first time since I have had the privilege of sitting temporarily in this Court, I am unable to come to the same conclusion as the other members of the Court. I think that the proposition of the appellant is [94] not so fully stated in the commencement of the judgment of Buckley L. J. as to raise the points on which my opinion is based. Adopting his words, with what I think the necessary additions, I should state it: "That was said by the witness in the box is, I agree, relevant, and it was public property in the sense that it might have been heard and might have been recorded by any one; but words are evanescent, other people did not record them, and I did, and I did so solely for my use and protection in the present litigation which I then anticipated. I brought into existence as a document the document of which inspection is asked, and I brought it into existence through my solicitor for the express purpose of instructing my solicitor and counsel both as to advising me whether I should defend the present claim and to enable them to conduct my defence for me if I did defend. It is a part of my brief and I claim privilege for it. The record is not public property, though the words which it records may have been." That, I think, is a full statement of the appellant's case. I see no distinction in principle between the foresight, knowledge, professional skill, and the labour involved in bringing into existence this record as materials to be used at the trial and the professional care and skill used in making a collection of inscriptions on tombstones or extracts from registers for use at the trial, as in Lyell v. Kennedy, 27 Ch. D. 1. Privilege does not appear to me to depend on the same considerations as copyright. Here the document is a full transcript of all the evidence. If it had been a note taken by counsel instructed to watch the previous proceedings, with a view to taking a note of the part of the evidence which in his judgment would be material in the present proceedings, would not that be privileged? And is there any difference? Here the solicitor is said to have in fact underlined the material passages. If this document is to be considered as the proof of the shorthand writer it is I think clearly privileged.

I do not think any of the cases are authorities against my view except Rawstone v. Preston Corp. 30 Ch. D. 116, because I think that in no other case but that was there actual evidence that the transcript was made for the protection of the party in the litigation [96] then before the Court. In Rawstone v. Preston Corp. 30 Ch. D. 116, it is true that the facts raised the point and the argument, view that the document was privileged in the J., but he disregarded it without giving any reasons except that the case was plain. On the other hand, Nordon v. Defries, 8 Q. B. D. 508, is an express authority the other way. I think that was rightly decided. I do not think that that decision depends solely on the view that the document was privileged in the action in which it was taken, and I do not think the authority of the decision is destroyed even if that proposition is wrong. But I am not sure that it was wrong from the point of view of the judges who decided that case. It probably would not have been privileged in such further proceedings as an inquiry as to damages or a reference to a master, but such proceedings do not take place except in very rare cases in the King's Bench Division, and would not have been in the contemplation of Mathew J. I do think that no judge of the King's Bench Division would make an ordinary order for inspection, for the purpose of an appeal, of shorthand notes of the case appealed from taken by one party at his own expense; and that is what Mathew J. probably meant by his statement that the notes would have been privileged in that case.

It is said by counsel that there is a difference of opinion and practice on the point before us between the Chancery and the King's Bench Divisions, and this is quite possible, as the litigation in the two Divisions is of a somewhat different character. In the King's Bench Division there are more cases of disputed facts and of contradictory evidence by unreliable witnesses, and there are more cases of fraudulent claims supported by such evidence, than there are in the Chancery Division, although no doubt such claims do sometimes appear there too. I made, in the course of the argument in this case, some remarks to this effect, and the counsel for the defendant very properly stated to the Court that the plaintiff in this case was personally beyond suspicion, and I hope that nothing which I have said indicates a view to the contrary; but having regard to the nature of the case, he may probably have to rely on the evidence of witnesses of whom the same cannot be said. Moreover, the contradiction [96] between witnesses in collision cases is not by any means always due to dishonesty. It is often a matter of memory, more often still from other causes not necessary to specify now. In cases of this character, in my opinion, the extensive discovery now allowed is mischievous. The disclosure of the case on the other side, which now can generally be obtained, often gives fraudulent claims a chance of success which they would not otherwise have, for they can be framed to meet the case against them. All this may account for the King's Bench judges being inclined to give less wide discovery than the Chancery judges.

I think that the defendant in this case is entitled to retain the advantage which the foresight of his solicitor has for the express purpose of this litigation procured for him. It is said by Mr. Gibbons for the plaintiff that, if there is any chance of a misuse of this information by the plaintiff if he gets it, there is as great or even greater chance of misuse of it by the defendant if he is allowed to keep it to himself, and that seems true, but I do not think it justifies the order asked for. If discovery is ordered the plaintiff will be entitled to obtain a copy of the transcript at a small price per folio, whereas the defendant will have paid a large sum for having the notes taken and transcribed. It may be, indeed I think it is, a case where it would be reasonable for the defendant to agree to treat the notes as having been taken for joint use, each party paying half of the cost, but that is matter for agreement and not for adverse order under the process of discovery. If I were now sitting as judge at chambers I should endeavour to get the parties to come to such an agreement. An adverse order is, under Order XXXI., r. 14, to be made "as the Court or judge shall think right," and although no doubt it has been held that an order should be made in respect of any relevant document for which the party in whose possession it is cannot establish privilege, yet I cannot think it would be a just order to take from a party the advantage which the foresight of his solicitor has obtained for him, and that without even securing payment to him of the expense to which he has been put to obtain it. Further, in this case the document which the defendant has is stated to have been so underscored as to direct attention to the passages which the defendant's solicitor considers [97] material. That part of it certainly is privileged, and so the order made amounts to an order to make a new copy for the plaintiff's benefit, and I do not think such an order ought to be made. These difficulties, however, would not arise if the document is privileged, and my view is that the transcript should be held privileged as a document which has only come into existence for the purpose of this litigation.

I regret that, owing to my being only a temporary member of the Court, it is impossible for me to ask for further time before delivering judgment. I have, unfortunately, not time to write a fuller judgment going more in detail into the authorities, and I should personally prefer to give way to the much better opinions of the Master of the Rolls and Buckley L. J.; but as the matter rather affects the practice of the Division with which I am more familiar, I feel bound to give my judgment for what it is worth. I think the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE.

Transcript of Court Proceedings as Privileged from Inspection.

The reported case is in accord with the majority of the earlier English cases in holding that a transcript of shorthand notes of a proceeding in court, made by a party for the information of counsel in future litigation is not privileged from inspection. Ainsworth v. Wilding [1900] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 315; In re Worswick, 38 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 370; Rawstone v. Preston, Corp. 30 Ch. D. (Eng.) 116; In re Brown, 42 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 501; Nicholl v. Jones, 2 Hem. & M. (Eng.) 588. See also Goldstones v. Williams [1899] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 47. In Rawstone v. Preston Corp. supra, it was said: "The refusal of the motion would lead to an extraordinary extension of the doctrine of privilege of documents, which rests upon well-established principles.

There is privilege in the case of communications between a party and his solicitor, both in an action, and also after the disputes in reference to the action have arisen. Privilege is also extended to the materials collected by a solicitor or his clerk pending the trial of an action, for the purpose, as it is usually phrased, of preparing counsel's brief. There is privilege, but it has nothing to do with this case, in regard to the production of title deeds. In this case not one of those grounds of privilege exists. The transcript is admitted to be relevant. The land, the subject-matter of the arbitration, and the land referred to in the action are not the same.

The evidence was given and the speeches were made in presence of the corporation and their advisers, who, if they had happened to have a shorthand writer in the room, could have had shorthand notes taken for themselves, which they would have a perfect right to use, and although they had not notes taken, it is not a valid objection to the production by the plaintiff of his transcript of the notes which were taken for him."

There is, however, some authority to the contrary. Norden v. Defries, 8 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 508; The Palermo, 9 P. D. (Eng.) 6. And see Gander v. Stansfeld, 5 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 778; 28 L. J. Ch. 436; Rapson v. Cubbitt, 7 Jur. (Eng.) 77. In Norden v. Defries, supra, it was said: "If the plaintiff has a cause of action against the defendants, it is manifest that it would be most important for the plaintiff to be enabled to submit to his counsel a full and precise statement of the evidence given by the defendants and their witnesses at the former trial. We are therefore disposed to give credit to the suggestion that the notes were intended to form materials for the guidance of the plaintiff and his counsel in the prosecution of the present action, and we think that the affidavit of the plaintiff is sufficient to enable us to act upon this view."

In The Palermo, supra, copies of depositions taken by the Board of Trade in the investigation of a collision and furnished by the Board to the owner of one of the vessels were held to be privileged, the court saying: "Here discovery is sought of copies of certain depositions, and these were obtained for the purposes of this action, and as the phrase is, 'to form part of the brief.' Therefore I think that they are privileged, and I shall not inquire for what purpose the original depositions were taken, since it is the copies of which discovery is sought, and which were obtained for the purposes I have stated."

The question seems never to have been passed on in the United States. As to the right to compel an attorney to produce books or papers belonging to his client, see the note to Pearson v. Yoder, Ann. Cas. 1916A 62.

ROGERS

ATLANTIC, GULF AND PACIFIC COMPANY.

New York Court of Appeals—January 5,
1915.

213 N. Y. 246; 107 N. E. 661.

Waste — What Constitutes — Injury
by Third Person.

Injury by the negligence of a stranger is not waste for which the life tenant is liable to the remainderman; waste, which is of two kinds, voluntary or actual, and permissive or negligent; being spoil or destruction done or permitted by the tenant, to the prejudice of the remainderman.

[See 14 Am. St. Rep. 629.]

Life Estates — Right to Recover for Injury to Inheritance.

While the life tenant may recover for injury by negligence of a stranger not only to the life estate, but to the remainder, it is not on the theory of waste, but of trusteeship.

[See note at end of this case.]

Rogers v. Atlantic, etc. Co. 152 N. Y. App. Div. 916, affirmed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Third Judicial Department.

Action for damages. Elizabeth M. Rogers, plaintiff, and Atlantic, Gulf and Pacific Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff in trial court. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion.

AFFIRMED.

Charles Irving Oliver for appellant.
Erskine C. Rogers for respondent.

[249] MILLER, J.—The plaintiff, a life tenant, has recovered a judgment for all of the damages, both to the life estate and to the inheritance, caused by a fire set by the defendant, a canal contractor, on adjoining lands of the state, and negligently allowed to spread to the lands of the plaintiff. The single question involved in this appeal is whether the recovery should have been limited to the damages to the life estate. The right of the plaintiff to recover all of the damages has thus far been maintained on the ground that she is liable to the remaindermen for any injury to the inheritance not caused by them, the act of God or the public enemy. No case is known in which a tenant has been subjected to such a rule of liability, and the proposition is so startling as to demand examination before it is made the ground of a decision by us.

The text-writers, generally, state the rule broadly that [250] the tenant is liable to the reversioner for all injuries amounting to waste, by whomsoever committed, even by a stranger, the only exceptions noted being injuries caused by the act of God, the public enemy, or the reversioner himself, and the obligation of the tenant is frequently likened to that of a common carrier. (See 4 Kent *77.) But Chancellor Kent says: "Perhaps the universal silence in our courts upon the subject of any such responsibility of the tenant for accidental fires, is presumptive evidence, that the doctrine of permissive waste has never been introduced, and carried to that extent, in the common law jurisdiction of the United States" (4 Kent *82), and the text writers, generally, concur in the doctrine that the tenant is not liable for accidental fires. (1 Washburn on Real Property, 116; 1 Cruise's Digest [Greenleaf edition] 139 and note; Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, section 196.) Obviously the word "waste" in the broad, general statements above referred to is used in the legal; not in the popular, sense.

This is an action for negligence against a stranger both to the life estate and the remainder, and it may well be doubted whether the doctrine of waste has any application at all to it. Waste is thus defined by Bouvier: "Spoil or destruction, done or permitted, to lands, houses, or other corporeal hereditaments, by the tenant thereof to the prejudice of the heir or of him in reversion or remainder. . . . Permissive waste consists in the mere neglect or omission to do what will prevent injury; as, to suffer a house to go to decay for the want of repair. And it may be incurred in respect to the soil, as well as to the buildings, trees, fences, or live stock on the premises. Voluntary waste consists in the commission of some destructive act; as, in pulling down a house or ploughing up a flower-garden." "There are two kinds of waste, viz., voluntary or actual, and negligent or permissive. Voluntary waste may be done by pulling down or prostrating houses, or cutting down timber trees; negligent [251] waste may be suffering houses to be uncovered, whereby the spars or rafters, planches or other timber of the house are rotten." (Bacon's Abridgment, vol. 10, page 422.) In the popular sense, any injury may be waste, but it is not waste in the legal sense, unless caused in such manner as to be within the legal definition of either commissive or permissive waste.

The rule contended for is based on Lord Coke's interpretation of two English statutes passed in the 13th century, the statute of Marlbridge, 52 Henry III. chapter 24, and the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edward I. chapter 5. The former provided, "that fermors, during their terms shall not make waste, sale, nor exile of house, woods and men, nor of anything belonging to the tenements that they have to farm, without special license had by writing of covenant, making mention, that they may do it, which thing if they do, and thereof be convict, they shall yield full damage, and shall be punished by amerciamment grievously." The latter provided: "That a man from henceforth shall have a writ of waste in chancery against him that holdeth by law of England, or otherwise for a term of life, or for a term of years, or a woman in dower; and he, which shall be attained of waste, shall lose the thing that he hath wasted, and moreover shall recompense thrice so much as the waste shall be taxed at." Lord Coke construed those statutes as applying to permissive waste. (2 Inst. 145, 303.) But the English cases at least raise a doubt on the point, and there seems to be a distinction between tenancies for years and for life. (See Jones v. Hill, 7 Taunt. 393; Harnett v. Maitland, 16 M. & W. 257; Yellowly v. Gower, 11 Exch. 274; Powys v. Blgrave, 4 DeG. M. & G. 448; Woodhouse v. Walker, 5 Q. B. D. 404; Davies v. Davies, 33 Ch. D. 499; In re Cartwright, 41 Ch. D. 532.) In the last case Kay, J., said: "Lord Coke's words only include permissive waste where there is an obligation to repair." He further [252] said: "Since the statutes of Marlbridge and of Gloucester there must have been hundreds of thousands of tenants for life who have died leaving their estates in a condition of great dilapidation: Not once, so far as legal records go, have damages been recovered against the estate of a tenant for life on that ground. To ask me in that state of the authorities to hold that a tenant for life is liable for permissive waste to a remainderman is to my mind a proposition altogether startling." Bacon's Abridgment contains several pages of examples of actionable waste. (See volume 10, pages 422 to 434; also see Viner's Abridgment, volume 22, pages 435 et seq.) Neither there, nor anywhere in the books, have I been able to find a case of waste instanced, in which the injury was caused by the negligent act of a stranger to the estate, though it has been assumed in some cases that such an injury would amount to waste. Lord Coke gives two reasons for allowing the reversioner to recover of the tenant for waste committed by a stranger: 1. "For it is presumed in law that the former may withstand it" (2 Inst. 145, 146), and 2, "For he in the reversion cannot have any remedy but against the tenant." (2 Inst. 303.) It may be open to some question whether by "stranger" he did not mean the assignee of the tenant, against whom he said that the heir could not maintain an action for waste. (2 Inst. 300.) But, at any rate, it is plain that under that head he referred to voluntary, not permissive, waste. The Court of Chancery did not interfere to prohibit permissive waste. In Castlemain v. Oraven, the master of the rolls said: "But as to repairs, the court never interposes in case of permissive waste, either to prohibit or give satisfaction, as it does in case of wilful waste." (22 Vin. Abr. 523.) Certainly there is no basis for any presumption that the tenant could have prevented such an injury as was done in this case. One of the reasons given for likening the liability of a tenant to that of a common carrier is that it is imposed to prevent collision. (Attersoll [253] v. Stevens, 1 Taunt. 183, 198.) That reason cannot apply with any force except to cases of voluntary waste. Lord Coke does except the case of injuries done by the enemies of the king, and by tempest, lightning, and the like, but in that connection he also instances a case in which it was adjudged "that if thieves burn the house of tenant for life, without evil keeping of lessees for lives fire, the lessees shall not be punished therefor in an action of waste." (2 Inst. 303.) In Halsbury's Laws of England (Vol. 18, p. 499) it is said: "Lessees for years, or from year to year, or for any other period, are liable for voluntary waste, whether committed by themselves or any other person, for, if committed by another, it is their duty, and they are presumed to be able, to withstand it." The case in 1 Taunton (supra) is the one generally cited as the leading case in support of the proposition that the tenant is liable for waste committed by a stranger, but that was a case of voluntary waste, the removal of clay.

Even assuming that by the rule of the ancient common law an injury caused by the negligent act of a stranger both to the estate for life or years and to the reversion or remainder amounted to waste, for which the tenant for life or years was responsible, the reasons for the rule given by Lord Coke either no longer exist or do not apply to the facts of this case. The ancient common-law forms of the action have been abolished and the impediment of the common law against the maintenance of an action for waste by reversioner or remaindermen in case there was an intervening estate (2 Inst. 301; Coke upon Littleton, vol. III, p. *243) was removed in this state by chapter 246, section 47 of the Laws of 1911, which provided: "That it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons seized of an estate in remainder or reversion, to maintain an action of waste or trespass for any injury done to the inheritance, notwithstanding any intervening estate for life or for years." It may be of interest to note [254] that for some reason that provision was apparently concealed in the Supply Bill. It was substantially re-enacted by 1 R. S. 749, section 8, and is now section 1665 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is still undoubtedly true that contingent remaindermen, possibly persons not in being, may not maintain the action, but that is because their estate is contingent, and is not due to any of the impediments of the ancient common law.

Certain other statutes, affecting the obligation of tenants, remain to be considered. The statute of 6 Anne, c. 31, relieved an owner from liability for an accidental fire starting in his house or chamber, and the statute of 14 George III., chapter 78, extended the exemption to such fires starting anywhere on one's estate. Primarily, those statutes were intended to relieve from the rigorous rule of the ancient law which made a person liable for the consequences of a fire originating upon his own premises and spreading to his neighbor's. But they are broad enough to affect the liability of a tenant to reversioner or remainderman, and have been so construed (See 4 Kent *82), and they have been held to be part of the law of this state. (Lansing v. Stone, 37 Barb. (N. Y.) 15, and see Hoffman v. King, 160 N. Y. 618, at page 622, 55 N. E. 401, 73 Am. St. Rep. 715, 46 L.R.A. 672.) Whilst a fire is not accidental, within the meaning of those statutes, if caused by the negligence of the tenant, or his servants (Filliter v. Phippard, 11 Q. B. 347, 63 E. C. L. 347), and the statute literally applies only to a fire beginning on one's premises, there is no substantial reason for making a distinction as to liability of a tenant between an accidental fire and one caused by the negligence of strangers, or between a fire accidentally beginning on the premises and one spreading thereto from adjoining premises. By chapter 345 of the Laws of 1860 (now section 2227 of the Real Property Law) a lessee or occupant of a building is relieved from the obligation to pay rent in case it is destroyed or rendered untenable by the elements or any other cause without any fault or neglect [255] on his part. In the absence of covenant, no obligation rests upon either the landlord or the tenant to rebuild in such case. (Smith v. Kerr, 108 N. Y. 31, 15 N. E. 70, 2 Am. St. Rep. 362.) The law would be in an anomalous state if a tenant, though under no obligation to rebuild or to pay rent, were still answerable in damages, or if, though not liable for the injury or destruction of buildings without his fault, he were still liable for other injuries to the premises though equally without fault. Those statutes do not in terms apply to a case like this, doubtless for the reason that no one had ever attempted to hold a tenant responsible in such case. The written and the unwritten law should be consistent, and the whole body of law governing the obligations of tenants should by analogy be made to harmonize with the said statutory rules.

Moreover, the statutes of Marlbridge and Gloucester were superseded in this state by chapter 6 of the Laws of 1787, which provided: "That no tenant for life or years or for any other term, shall during the term make or suffer any waste . . . without special license in writing making mention that he may do it . . . and whoever shall be convicted of waste shall lose the thing or place wasted and shall recompense thrice so much as the damage shall be taxed at by the jury." That statute was substantially re-enacted by 2 R. S. 334, and is now embodied in sections 1651 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. Whilst the construction given a similar statute of earlier times may have weight, our own statute should be construed according to the social conditions of its time and should not be controlled by the construction of a statute passed in the thirteenth century.

In U. S. v. Bostwick, 94 U. S. 53, 68, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 65, 67, Chief Justice Waite, speaking for the court, said: "It [referring to the implied obligation of the tenant] has never been so construed as to make a tenant answerable for accidental damages, or to bind him to rebuild, if the buildings are burned down or otherwise destroyed by accident." In [256] Sampson v. Grogan, 21 R. I. 174, 42 Atl. 712, 44 L.R.A. 711, it was held by the Supreme Court of Rhode Island in a well-reasoned opinion that the mere acceptance by a life tenant of a devise of real estate, containing a direction to keep in repair, did not impose upon him the duty to rebuild in case of the accidental destruction of buildings by fire. (See, also, Earle v. Arbogast, 180 Pa. St. 409, 36 Atl. 923.) One case only in this state has been called to our attention in which it was held that a tenant was liable for the acts of strangers. (Regan v. Luthy, 16 Daly 413, 11 N. Y. S. 709.) That was a case of voluntary waste. Its authority was questioned by the Appellate Term of the Supreme Court in Rimoldi v. Hudson Guild, 59 Misc. 480, 110 N. Y. S. 881. In Beekman v. Van Dolsen, 63 Hun 487, 18 N. Y. S. 376, it was held by the General Term in the first department that a tenant was not liable, as for permissive waste, because of the partial destruction of the retaining wall, bulkhead and dock upon the leased premises caused by the dock department of the city of New York in changing the bulkhead line, and it was said by Mr. Justice Patterson, after referring to the authorities, that "to constitute this particular kind of waste [i. e., permissive waste] there must have been neglect, omission, suf-ference or permission of the tenant." In Robinson v. Wheeler, 25 N. Y. 252, a tenant was held liable for his own negligent burning of a building. In no case in this state, or anywhere for that matter as far as our research goes, has a tenant been held liable as for permissive waste for the negligent acts of strangers. White v. Wagner, 4 Har. & J. (Md.) 373, 7 Am. Dec. 674, is an extreme case, but that was a case of voluntary waste, and it might have been decided on another ground.

The plaintiff, however, relies upon cases in which the assumed liability of the tenant has been held to furnish ground for the maintenance of the action by him against the wrongdoer. (Cook v. Champlain Transp. Co. 1 Denio (N. Y.) 91; Austin v. Hudson River R. Co. 25 N. Y. 334; Baker v. Hart, 123 N. Y. 470, 25 N. E. 948, 12 L.R.A. 60.) It must be admitted [257] that the ground of the decision in the Cook case makes it precisely in point. It was decided on the authority of Attersoll v. Stevens (supra), which, as I have said, was a case of voluntary waste. It was cited in Baker v. Hart as authority for the statement "that tenant for life or years is bound to answer to the owner for any waste committed, even though it be the act of a stranger," a doctrine which was held to be wholly inapplicable to that case. Moreover, the further language of Judge Finch in that case suggests, if it does not plainly show, that he was speaking of voluntary waste. Austin v. Hudson River R. Co. was an action by lessees, who had erected buildings, for damages caused by their being undermined by the negligent excavation of his own soil by the adjoining owner. The plaintiffs had sublet the premises, but still had a reversionary interest in their unexpired term. Manifestly the plaintiffs were entitled to recover some damages, either the value of the buildings, the cost of their repair, or the value of their use during the residue of the term, and the question as to the true measure of damages was not properly raised at the trial. So that whatever was said as to the application of the Cook case was obiter. It is quite true that both Judge Wright and Judge Allen referred to the case as one of waste, for which the plaintiffs were responsible to the landlord, and cited the Cook case as authority, but it is difficult to determine from the report of the case precisely on what ground a majority of the court put the decision. In one part of his opinion Judge Allen said: "The defendants contend that because their wrongful act may have damaged the inheritance, giving an action to the reversioner, the tenant could have no action for the injury to him. But each may have a remedy for the damages sustained in respect to his particular estate. If the same act deprives the tenant of the temporary enjoyment of his term, and also injures the inheritance, the injury to the tenant is not merged in that done to the owner [258] of the larger and reversionary estate." (p. 344.) It thus appears that there is no binding decision of this court upon the point whether an injury by the negligent acts of third parties is waste, for which the tenant is liable to the reversioner or remainderman, and the consequences of holding such a doctrine would be too serious to justify us in resting the right of the plaintiff to recover upon it.

The doctrine has only been invoked in this state to permit the tenant to recover from the wrongdoer. (Cook v. Champlain Transp. Co. supra; Austin v. Hudson River R. Co. supra; Dix v. Jaquay, 94 App. Div. 554, 88 N. Y. S. 228; United Traction Co. v. Ferguson Contracting Co. 117 App. Div. 305, 102 N. Y. S. 190.) And it may well be that a rule so long recognized may be adhered to without adopting the reason originally assigned for it. In Dix v. Jaquay (supra) the Appellate Division in the third department naturally followed the Cook case, but in a well-reasoned opinion Mr. Justice (now presiding justice), Smith suggested what appears to us to be a much better reason for maintaining the rule than that assigned in the Cook case. Notwithstanding the removal of the impediments of the ancient common law, there will be many cases in which, for a practical reason, the tenant alone can compel redress from the wrongdoer, and it should not be open to the latter to escape liability by asserting the rights of a third party, under whom he does not claim. The tenant has not only possession, but an interest in the premises, in this case, a life estate, and there is equal, if not greater, reason for allowing a full recovery by him as for allowing a depository, who has no interest, but only possession, to recover for the conversion of, or an injury to, the deposit. A bailee, though not liable to the bailor, may recover for the wrongful act of a third party resulting in the loss of, or injury to, the subject of the bailment. (Kellogg v. Sweeney, 1 Lans. 397, 46 N. Y. 291, 7 Am. Rep. 333. And see Mechanics, etc. Bank v. Farmers, etc. Bank, 60 N. Y. 40; Russell v. Butterfield, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 300; Faulkner v. Brown, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) [259] 63; Finn v. Western R. Corp. 112 Mass. 524, 17 Am. Rep. 128; Johnson v. Holyoke, 105 Mass. 80; Chamberlain v. West, 37 Minn. 54, 33 N. W. 114. If the bailee recovers, he holds the recovery as trustee for the bailor. A recovery by either bailor or bailee will bar an action by the other. (Pontiac First Commercial Bank v. Valentine, 209 N. Y. 145, and citations at page 150, Ann. Cas. 1913D 1104, 102 N. E. 5544; Woodman v. Nottingham, 49 N. H. 387, 6 Am. Rep. 526.) The principle is the same as that applied in Madison Square Bank v. Pierce, 137 N. Y. 444, 33 N. E. 557, 33 Am. St. Rep. 751, 20 L.R.A. 335, in which it was held that the payee might recover from the maker the full amount of a promissory note, notwithstanding an indorser had paid part, the plaintiff in such case becoming trustee for the indorser of so much of the recovery as represents the amount paid by the latter.

The recovery in this case might be treated as a substitute pro tanto for the land damaged, as would be the case of the proceeds of a sale (see Ackerman v. Gorton, 67 N. Y. 63); the plaintiff being entitled to the life use of it and becoming trustee of the principal for the remaindermen. (See Smith v. Van Ostrand, 64 N. Y. 278; Leggett v. Stevens, 185 N. Y. 70, at page 76, 77 N. E. 874.) The recovery might be apportioned between life tenant and remaindermen according to their respective interests and the court might require the life tenant, if intrusted with the principal, to give security. (See In re Camp, 126 N. Y. 377, 27 N. E. 799; In re McDougall, 141 N. Y. 21, 35 N. E. 961.) It is for the court to make proper provision for the protection of the rights of remaindermen. The wrongdoer is only concerned in being protected from a second suit, and we are of the opinion that it must be held, as a necessary corollary to the proposition that the life tenant may recover all the damages, that such a recovery will bar an action by the remaindermen.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE

Right of Life Tenant to Recover Damages for Injury Both to Life Estate and to Inheritance.

There is a conflict in the decisions as to a life tenant's right to recover damages for an injury both to the life estate and to the inheritance. The reported case upholding the minority view that such a recovery may be had finds support in two other decisions. Dix v. Jaquay, 94 App. Div. 554, 88 N. Y. S. 228; Willey v. Laraway, 64 Vt. 559, 25 Atl. 436 (tenant in dower). In the case first cited which was an action by a life tenant against a subtenant for cutting down and appropriating timber, the court said: "If the life tenant must wait for an action by the remainderman to determine his liability, his recourse against the wrongdoer must in many cases become ineffective by the delay. Nor can he perfect his right of action by satisfying the damages to the inheritance and then suing. The damages are unliqui-dated. Any amount which he pays in satisfaction must be paid at his peril, with his chance of establishing such amount as the damage done in an action against the wrongdoer. If the remainder is contingent, to whom shall he make satisfaction of the liability? In such case I am unable to conceive of any satisfaction of that liability which would be binding if perchance another became entitled to the remainder upon the happening or not of the contingency named. It will thus be seen that if the judgment below be well-rendered a life tenant at the best is subjected to a dangerous hazard in being compelled to make satisfaction of an unliquidated claim to a remainderman upon his chance of being able to establish that claim in full as damage in his action against the wrongdoer. At the worst the wrongdoer has burdened the life tenant with an absolute liability to one who upon the happening of a contingency shall thereafter become the remainderman without liability to the life tenant, and only with a remote liability to the person who shall upon the contingency thereafter become seized with the remainder. If these premises be sound, the conclusion is irresistible that the wrongdoer must answer to the life tenant for the full damage done both to his life estate and to the inheritance, and the damage to the inheritance recovered by the life tenant is held by him as trustee for the remainderman."

It has been held that if any injury, such as cutting down and carrying away wood and timber, is done to the inheritance by a stranger, a tenant for life may maintain an action for the injury to the possession and also to the inheritance if he has been compelled to satisfy the remainderman for the injury done by the stranger; but if he has not been so compelled, his recovery is limited to the injury to the possession. Wood v. Griffin, 46 N. H. 230, wherein the court said: "Again, there is no necessity for arming the tenant with such power. If he is entitled to recover for the injury to the inheritance, whether he has satisfied the reversioner or not, his recovery must be a bar to a suit by the landlord, and still the trespasser might avail himself, by way of defense of a license, or admission, by the tenant which might in effect defeat the landlord's claim against such trespasser, and besides the landlord might find his claim against the trespasser defeated by the result of a suit prosecuted without his assent, in a manner opposed to his wishes, or by his inability to obtain from the tenant himself the fruits of the suit against such third person. The fact that the tenant is answerable for the injury does not, we think, furnish an adequate reason for sanctioning such doctrines. Where waste is committed by cutting down timber trees by a stranger, the property in them at once passes to the landlord; and he may take them or maintain trover for them; and there surely can be no propriety in holding that the tenant also could have the same remedy, for he has no property whatever in them."

The majority view, however, seems to be that a life tenant cannot recover for an injury to the inheritance. Sagar v. Eckert, 3 Ill. App. 412; Zimmerman v. Shreeve, 59 Md. 357; Yeager v. Fairmont, 43 W. Va. 259, 27 S. E. 234. See also Brown v. Woodliff, 89 Ga. 413, 15 S. E. 491; Polk v. Haworth, 48 Ind. App. 32, 95 N. E. 332; Jordan v. Benwood, 42 W. Va. 312, 26 S. E. 266, 57 Am. St. Rep. 859, 36 L.R.A. 519. In Zimmerman v. Shreeve, supra, the court said: "By the instruction, however, as given by granting the first and fifth prayers of the plaintiff, no reference whatever is made to the several interests or estates of the tenant for life and that of the parties entitled in remainder; and though the cutting of trees, and the hauling away of rails, cross-ties, or other articles made of trees cut upon the premises, may have occasioned serious damage to the estate in remainder, yet, according to the instruction given, the whole amount of damage is required to be rendered to the plaintiff, the tenant for life. This, we think, was error. The jury should have been instructed with reference to the interest or estate of the plaintiff, and the injury thereto by the trespass of the defendant; and not have been allowed to award compensation to the plaintiff for an injury done to the estate of another." In Daffin v. C. W. Zimmerman Mfg. Co. 158 Ala. 637, 48 So. 109, it was held that a life tenant could not maintain trover or trespass for converting or taking trees from an estate, but could maintain trespass quare clausum fregit and recover such actual damages as he sustained to his possession. In Strong v. Strong, 6 Ala. 345, it was held that one who had only a life estate in a slave could recover in an action of trover for the slave only to the extent of the injury to his life interest.

BLAIR

SEITNER DRY GOODS COMPANY.

Michigan Supreme Court—March 17, 1915.

184 Mich. 304; 151 N. W. 724.

Negligence — Fall into Elevator Shaft — Contributory Negligence.

In an action for injuries to plaintiff's wife caused by a fall as she was entering an elevator in a store where, under the evidence, it is not clear whether she exercised a proper degree of care, this question is properly submitted to the jury.

[See generally Ann. Cas. 1913C 568.]

Damages — Cause of Injury — Burden of Proof.

In an action for personal injuries, plaintiff, to sustain the burden resting upon him, must introduce testimony making it more probable that the conditions on account of which a recovery is sought were caused by the accident than that they were due to some other cause.

Husband and Wife — Injury to Wife — Recovery for Loss of Consortium.

A husband cannot recover against a person responsible for injuries to his wife for the loss of the undefined influence of the wife in the family relation and the pleasure of the relationship or for the loss of "consortium," defined as a person's affection, society, or aid, or the right to the conjugal fellowship of the wife and to her company, co-operation, and aid in every conjugal relation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Right of Wife to Sue for Injuries.

A wife may sue for injuries to her person without joining her husband as plaintiff.

Recovery by Husband for Loss of Services.

While the Legislature has relieved married women of certain disabilities and has denied to the husband the right to her earnings and the profits of any business she may carry on, it has not put her domestic duties and labor performed in and about her home for her family upon a pecuniary basis, nor classified such duties as services, nor permitted her to recover for the loss of ability to perform them, and the husband may recover the pecuniary value of a service habitually rendered by the wife which he has lost on account of her injuries.

Error to Circuit Court, Bay county: COLLINS, Judge.

Action for damages. Edmund Blair, plaintiff, and Seitner Dry Goods Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. REVERSED.

[306] It is the claim of plaintiff that because of the negligence of defendant his wife sustained personal injuries. He sued to recover damages for his resulting injury. In his declaration he describes her injuries as—

"Injuries to her back, spine, digestive organs, intestines, kidneys, and bladder and to her uterus and its organs, resulting in appendicitis and a displacement of such uterus and its said organs, all occasioning nervousness, sleeplessness, loss of consciousness, and sexual power, dizziness, and fainting spells."

As a result, he says:

"Plaintiff has been compelled to lay out and expend large sums of money, for medical and surgical care and attention, medicine, care, and nursing in an endeavor to cure her of such injuries, hindrance, and incapacity and to restore such sexual power and consortium, and it will always continue to be necessary for him to expend large sums of money for medical and surgical treatment, care, and nursing that would have been wholly unnecessary to expend had she not received said injuries and been hindered and incapacitated as aforesaid, and by reason of such injuries he has lost the value of her earning capacity, services, and consortium and the large sums which she otherwise would have been able to earn for and save to him in and about her duties as such housekeeper, and in and about similar labor, and in the future he will continue to lose large sums from her said earning capacity being so impaired and by reason thereof and the several losses so sustained by him, including the value of such services and consortium."

Testimony introduced on the part of plaintiff tended to prove that upon an occasion in April, 1912, when his wife, accompanied by two daughters, was shopping in defendant's store, they undertook to use the elevator, in stepping into which, at the invitation of an employee, she fell because the floor of the elevator was below the level of the floor of the store, a condition of things which on account of semi-darkness [307] in the elevator and the invitation aforesaid she did not discover. Issues of fact were raised by the testimony about the negligence of defendant, the negligence of the wife, and the nature and effects of the injuries she sustained and, connected with the last, her previous physical condition. These issues, and others concerning the result to plaintiff, were submitted to a jury, and a verdict for $1,550.40 was returned. Judgment was entered on the verdict, and a new trial was refused.

Over objection that it did not tend to establish a basis for estimating plaintiff's damages, the plaintiff's wife was permitted to testify as follows:

"Q. Prior to your injury what was your relation with your husband with reference to the relation between a wife and husband on occasions?

"A. I was perfectly well on that occasion.

"Q. Had there ever been anything that interfered physically with the acts of intercourse between a wife and husband?

"A. No, sir."

A physician was permitted over objection to answer this question:

"Q. During that time what was her capacity as to discharging the functions of a wife so far as intercourse with a husband is concerned?

"A. I would not think that would be possible."

Other medical testimony upon the subject was admitted, and the plaintiff on direct examination gave the following:

"Q. Is the companionship, the sociability in your home the same now that it was before her injury?

"A. No, sir, it is not. It is less."

On cross-examination, he testified:

"Q. What do you mean by less? Your wife is there all the time as before?

"A. She is there, yes.

"Q. Then why is her companionship less than it [308] was before if she is there with you as much as ever; you can talk and visit with her, associate with her just as well now as before, can you not?

"A. Sometimes, not all the time. The woman is in pain all the time, and when a person is in pain they don't feel much like talking and laughing and joking, nor anything of that kind. They feel more like going and hiding themselves sometimes.

"Q. Then does it simmer down to this, that she is not at times in as cheerful a mood or condition now as she used to be?"

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Is that what you complain of?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Is there anything else in that connection that you complain of?

"A. No, not in particular."

The jury was instructed:

"By consortium as used by me is meant the right of plaintiff as husband to the fellowship of his wife, to her company, co-operation, and aid in every marriage relationship that ordinarily arises and exists as between husband and wife, including the care of his home, attention to household affairs, and such other reasonable discharge of ordinary domestic duties as she was accustomed to render him as his wife, and as is usual as between husband and wife situate as they were."

Also, in stating for what injuries plaintiff's damages should be determined:

"Third, for any and all loss sustained by plaintiff, if any, by the impairment of her ability and power to render such domestic services and perform such work as she, as his wife, was accustomed to render to plaintiff in his household prior to such injuries, including such loss of consortium as I have explained, and such of said services as she would have continued to render but for these injuries, and in determining the amount which you will allow plaintiff, if any, under this third subdivision you will deduct therefrom such sum as you may allow the plaintiff, if any, for any and all expenditures for help in his home for [309] which you may have made him an allowance under the second subdivision last above."

The contributory negligence of plaintiff's wife is established, it is claimed, as matter of law, for which reason the court should have directed a verdict and, failing this, should have granted a new trial. The results of the injury to plaintiff's wife claimed by the plaintiff are not, it is said, made out; they are plainly conjectural.

In plaintiff's bill of the particulars of his damages is an item for—"Expenses in connection with medical and surgical care and attention, medicine, care, and nursing of Louise Blair, wife of plaintiff, heretofore incurred and to be hereafter incurred, $500," and one for "loss of consortium of Louise Blair, as wife, heretofore incurred and to be hereafter incurred $2,000."

These, with a claim of $2,500 for loss of her earning capacity and services as wife, make up the $5,000 demand, to recover which the suit is brought.

The testimony of the plaintiff tended to prove that as she stepped into the elevator she fell, striking with the lower part of her abdomen a stool which was in the elevator, causing a displacement of the uterus and a condition which developed appendicitis. A surgical operation was resorted to some 2½ months after the injury was received, the cost of which is an item of plaintiff's demand. Whether this operation was made necessary by the injuries received by plaintiff's wife in defendant's store, or whether her condition, relieved or attempted to be relieved by the surgical operation, was of long standing and due to other causes, was a subject which received considerable attention at the trial. Upon this subject the defendant preferred the following request, which was refused:

"There is no evidence tending to show that there was anything wrong with any of Mrs. Blair's organs excepting the appendix and uterus, and there is no [310] evidence tending to show that her appendix and uterus were injured by the fall which it is claimed in this case she sustained in defendant's elevator, and there is no evidence tending to show that the surgical operation performed by Dr. Ballard became necessary because of any injury sustained by her in the accident complained of, and therefore the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and I charge you to render a verdict in favor of the defendant."

Defendant offered in evidence the files and records in the suit of Louise Blair (plaintiff's wife) against this defendant, in which she recovered $1,000 damages for the injury in question here, which judgment was paid. They were excluded. They show that in that suit she alleged as damages expenses for medical and surgical care, medicine, and nursing already incurred and to be incurred, and loss of earning capacity, and large sums which she would have been able to earn as housekeeper, etc. The right of the husband in a case of this nature to recover damages for the loss of the services of his wife was and is questioned.

Stoddard & McMillan for plaintiff in error.
DeFoe, Hall & Converse for defendant in error.

OSTRANDER, J. (after stating the facts).— In the brief for appellant argument is addressed to the alleged positive character of the evidence establishing the negligence of plaintiff's wife, the uncertainty of the evidence to establish the injuries claimed to have been received by her, the rulings of the court and the charge upon the subject of plaintiff's loss of consortium, the alleged excessive recovery, and the verdict of the jury which is, it is claimed, opposed to the weight of evidence. These are the subjects of principal discussion and will be considered.

1. It is not clear whether plaintiff's wife did or did not exercise a proper degree of care in entering the elevator under the circumstances she says existed there. The question was for the jury.

2. The nature and extent of the injuries sustained [311] by plaintiff's wife are uncertain. The opinions of the medical men go no further than this: that her condition at the time of the operation and before and after it is not in doubt and, with certain exceptions, might have been the result of the injury. These witnesses relate also other causes for such a condition as existed, and it is plaintiff's claim that by his testimony he has eliminated these other possible causes from consideration, for which reason the proximate cause of her condition is not conjectural. On the other hand, it is the contention of defendant that the testimony is equally convincing that her troubles, relieved by the surgeons, were of long standing. It is very doubtful whether, exercising themselves wholly outside the domain of conjecture and wholly within that of proper and reasonable deduction from such testimony as they believed, the jury could have reached either material conclusion. As was true in Farrell v. Haze, 157 Mich. 374, 391, 392, 122 N. W. 197, a final condition of the patient was made certain by expert testimony. In the Farrell case it was admitted that the cause of the condition was matter for expert determination. In the case at bar the accident (in the Farrell case the treatment) might have produced the known condition. But in this, as in that case, the testimony seems to fall short of showing that it is more probable the conditions, relieved by the surgical operation, were caused by the accident. So much plaintiff was bound to prove. Otherwise recovery depends upon attributing to a particular cause an injury which may as well be attributed to another cause.

3. Consortium has been defined as the person's affection, society, or aid; the right to the conjugal fellowship of the wife, to her company, co-operation, and aid in every conjugal relation. 8 Cyc. p. 614. See Jacobsen v. Siddal, 12 Ore. 284, 7 Pac. 108, 53 [312] Am. Rep. 360; 21 Cyc. p. 1525; Bouvier's Law Dict. p. 402.

"The right of consortium is a right growing out of the marital relation, which the husband and wife have, respectively, to enjoy the society and companionship and affection of each other in their life together." Feneff v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 203 Mass. 278, 89 N. E. 436, 133 Am. St. Rep. 291, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024.

"Per quod consortium amisit" (by which he has lost the companionship) was the phrase used when at the common law plaintiff declared for any bodily injury done to his wife by a third person. 3 Blackstone Commentaries, p. 140. Appellant says:

"We insist that for loss or diminution of his wife's 'marriage fellowship,' of her 'company and co-operation,' that even if her society and companionship is less satisfactory than formerly, that in his association and intercourse with her he finds less comfort, pleasure, or happiness, all of which are matters of sentiment affecting the mind and heart and not the pocket, he cannot recover damages therefor. In this case no evil motive or wilful misconduct on the part of the defendant is claimed. . . . This is unlike an action on the case for seduction, or alienation of the wife's affections, which stand upon peculiar reasons."

At common law when a married woman was injured in her person she was joined with her husband in an action for the injury, and in such action nothing could be recovered for loss of her services or for the expenses to which the husband had been put in taking care of and curing her. There was no allowance for her loss of ability to earn wages, render services and be helpful to others, because these elements of damage, so far as recoverable at all, belonged to the husband. For such loss of services and such expenses the husband alone could sue. 1 Chitty, Pl. p. 84. The common law gave the husband the right to the labor, services, and earnings of his wife.

[313] It is not now an answer to the wife's suit to recover damages for injuries to her person that her husband is not joined as plaintiff. The legislature has relieved her of certain disabilities so called and has denied to her husband the right to her earnings and the profits of any business she may carry on. It has not, however, put her domestic duties and labor, performed in and about her home for her family, upon a pecuniary basis, nor meant to classify such duties as services, nor to permit her to recover damages for loss of ability to perform them. Gregory Oakland Motor Car Co. 181 Mich. 101, 147 N. W. 614. Where there is no intentional wrong, the ordinary rule of damages in every case goes no further than to allow pecuniary compensation for the impairment or injury directly done. If a husband is injured and recovers his damages, his wife cannot usually recover damages. The husband has usually, as a result of his action, been compensated for his pain and suffering, past and future, for loss of time, for diminution of capacity to earn money. The minor children of an injured father and those of an injured mother may suffer on account of the injury, but it has never been considered that they had an action therefor. The negligent defendant is supposed to have made full pecuniary compensation to the injured parent. Their loss is regarded not as direct, but consequential and remote.

If a husband may recover for the loss of consortium resulting from physical injury to the wife occasioned by negligent conduct of the defendant, the wife may recover for loss of consortium of the husband under similar conditions. The right affected, if it may be properly called a right, is mutual. No reasoning will now support a recovery by one which will deny it to the other spouse.

"No case has been brought to our attention, and after an extended examination we have found none, [314] in which an action for a loss of consortium alone has been maintained merely because of an injury to the person of the other spouse, for which the other has recovered, or is entitled to recover, full compensation in his own name, when the only effect upon the plaintiff's right of consortium is that, through the physical or mental disability of the other, the companionship is less satisfactory and valuable than before the injury." Feneff v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 203 Mass. 278, 280, 89 N. E. 436, 437, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024, 133 Am. St. Rep. 291.

If plaintiff has in fact, on account of his wife's injury, lost a service which she habitually rendered, then, as service, and according to the pecuniary value of it, he ought to be permitted to recover. Recovery should be according to the fact. For loss of consortium, of the undefined and indefinable influence of either spouse in the family relation, and the pleasure of the relationship, neither may recover. The Massachusetts decision in Kelley v. New York, etc. R. Co. 168 Mass. 308, 46 N. E. 1063, 38 L.R.A. 631, 60 Am. St. Rep. 397, relied upon in Gregory v. Oakland Motor Car Co. supra, and often cited in text-books and opinions of judges has been distinctly overruled as to the point now being considered. Feneff v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. supra; Bolger v. Boston El. R. Co. 205

Mass. 420, 91 N. E. 389. While our own former decisions do not distinctly rule the point, still Bowdle v. Detroit St. R. Co. 103 Mich. 272, 61 N. W. 529, 50 Am. St. Rep. 366, is plainly not opposed to it. Nor do I think Gregory v. Oakland Motor Car Co. wrongly decided; no specific claim having been made that the damages were excessive, and the objection being that the husband could not recover at all for loss of services of his wife. As to the elements which may be considered by a jury in fixing the pecuniary loss of the husband, the charge delivered in that case was in some respects opposed to the conclusion I have reached (although to that portion of the charge no objection appears to have been made), and some of [315] the decisions of other courts quoted with approval permit a jury to consider what I now think they should not be permitted to consider in estimating the value of the wife's services.

The testimony referred to should not have been received, the court erred in his instructions upon the subject of loss of consortium, and, more doubtful, but nevertheless tangible, plaintiff did not fairly sustain the burden of proving that the probable cause of the wife's injuries, relieved by a surgical operation at the cost of the husband, was the injury for which defendant was held responsible.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial granted.

NOTE.

Right of Husband to Recover for Loss of Consortium in Action for Personal Injuries to Wife where Statute Gives Wife Right of Action for Such Injuries.

It is the purpose of this note to review the recent cases discussing the right of a husband to recover for loss of consortium in an action for personal injuries to his wife, where the statute gives the wife the right to recover for such injuries. The earlier cases on this question are collected in the note to Marri v. Stamford St. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1912B 1120.

The rule prevailing in the majority of jurisdictions is that the statutes generally known as the married women's property acts authorizing a married woman to sue for personal injuries in her own name without joining her husband, and making the amount recoverable her separate property, do not deprive the husband of his common-law right to sue for the loss of the services, society, and companionship of his wife resulting from her personal injuries. The Little Silver, 189

In Garrison v. Sun Printing, etc. Assoc. 207 N. Y. 1, 100 N. E. 430, the rule was followed in an action by a husband for damages for the illness of his wife caused by the publication of words, libelous per se, reflecting on her character. The court said: "The question is presented whether a husband may recover for loss of services of his wife caused by her sickness resulting from mental distress which in turn was caused by the defendant's willful and malicious publication concerning her of defamatory words actionable per se. . . . Reaching the conclusion . . . that the wife might have recovered damages for the mental distress and physical sufferings caused by the publication of defendant's libel, it follows that plaintiff as her husband may maintain this action for loss of society and services. He had a right to these. The services were presumably of pecuniary value to him and any wrong by which he was deprived thereof was a wrong done to his rights and interest for which he may recover damages." In Chattanooga v. Carter, 132 Tenn. 609, 179 S. W. 127, a recovery was had by a husband for the loss of the services of his wife by reason of personal injuries sustained by her. Referring to a statute removing the disabilities of coverture, the court in sustaining the judgment said: "The act in question does not affect the legal rights and duties of that relationship further than to emancipate the wife from her disabilities that attached to the relationship. Embraced in these disabilities are her incapacity to act for herself with respect to her property, to make contracts, to bind herself personally, to sue and be sued. In fact, the wife was placed on that footing enjoyed by the husband as to the right to hold, manage, control, use, enjoy, and dispose of all property; to make any contract in reference to it and to sue and be sued. The act does not deprive either the husband or wife of the conjugal relationship, with its duties and rights. It results that there was no error in the action of the Court of Civil Appeals in sustaining the judgment in favor of the husband, and it is affirmed."

In Alabama a statute which requires the wife to sue alone for torts against her person or reputation, is held not to emancipate her from her household duties or to deprive the husband of the right to recover for the loss of her domestic services and society. People's Home Telephone Co. v. Cockrum, 182 Ala. 547, 82 So. 86, wherein it was said: "While the present statute requires the wife to sue alone for torts against her person or reputation, this court has held that this statute does not emancipate her from her household duties or deprive the husband of the right to her domestic service and society, or relieve him of the duty of providing for her in sickness and in health." The husband may not sue for the injury itself, but has a right of action for the loss and damage he has sustained as a proximate result of the injury done to the wife."

In some jurisdictions the rule obtains that the statutes relating to the status of married women have so altered the marital relation as to deprive the husband of his common-law right to recover, in the case of personal injuries to the wife by a third person, for the loss of consortium. Whitecomb v. New York, etc. R. Co. 215 Mass. 440, 102 N. E. 863, following Bolger v. Boston El. R. Co. 205 Mass. 420, 91 N. E. 389. See also Bean v. Portland, 109 Me. 467, 84 Atl. 981. And see the reported case. Compare McCauley v. Detroit United Ry. 167 Mich. 297, 133 N. W. 11; Gregory v. Oakland Motor Car Co. 181 Mich. 101, 147 N. W. 614. The case last cited apparently supports the majority rule and one of the decisions relied on in that case is Kelley v. New York, etc. R. Co. 108 Mass. 308, 46 N. E. 1063; 60 Am. St. Rep. 397, 38 L.R.A. 631, which, as the reported case points out "has been distinctly overruled as to the point now being considered," by the cases of Feneff v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 203 Mass. 278, 89 N. E. 436, 133 Am. St. Rep. 291, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1024; Bolger v. Boston El. R. Co. 205 Mass. 420, 91 N. E. 389. The reported case does not hold that the case of Gregory v. Oakland Motor Car Co. supra, was wrongly decided because no specific claim was made in that case that the damages were excessive, "the objection being that the husband could not recover at all for loss of services of his wife." It is also said in the reported case that the charge delivered in Gregory v. Oakland Motor Car Co. supra, as to the elements which may be considered by a jury in fixing the pecuniary loss of the husband was in some respects opposed to the conclusion reached in the reported case. In Bean v. Portland, 109 Me. 467, by a husband to recover damages for injuries sustained by his wife in an accident, the court in holding that he was not entitled to recover said: "There is no legal foundation for the suit brought by the husband to recover for loss of his wife's services and the expenses connected with her injuries and recovery, and in fact this claim is not urged by counsel in argument. Charles A. Bean was not present at the time of the accident, and he neither received any bodily injury nor suffered damage in his property," which are the statutory prerequisites for the maintenance of this form of action, R. S. Chap. 23 sec. 76."

CUE

v.

PORT OF LONDON AUTHORITY.

England—Court of Appeal—June 15, 1914.

[1914] 3 K. B. 892.

Workmen's Compensation Act — "Average Weekly Earnings" — Casual Laborer.

Where an injured employer has been for over three years employed as a casual laborer by the person in whose service he was injured, but has during that time also worked casually for others, his "average weekly earnings" are to be calculated on the average of the earnings of similar laborers in the employment in which he was injured, and not by aggregating his earnings in all employments.

[See note at end of this case.]

[892] Appeal from an award of the judge of the Southwark County Court sitting as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

On August 16, 1913, James Cue, a workman employed by the Port of London Authority, met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, which resulted in his death. He worked as a corn porter, and whilst discharging grain at the Commercial Docks fell into the dock and was drowned. His widow and children applied for 300l. compensation and gave his earnings for the last three years as averaging 2l. 8s. per week. The employers, the Port of London Authority, alleged [893] that his earnings in their employment during the three years next preceding his death amounted to 146*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*

It appeared that the deceased workman was a casual labourer and had worked for the employers for three years, averaging about forty-two weeks for each year. During the twelve months from August 2, 1912, to the end of July, 1913, he also earned 67*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* as a casual labourer in the employment of the Cunard Thompson Line. He was only employed by the employers when there was a job and a vacancy, and there was no obligation on him to work for them, and no obligation on them to employ him.

The employers admitted liability; alleged that his average weekly wages earned with them during the previous three years were 18*s.* 9*d.*; that that sum multiplied by 156 in accordance with Sched. I. (1.) (a) was less than 150*l.*; and they paid 150*l.* into Court.

The learned judge held that the deceased had concurrent contracts of service with the employers and the Cunard Thompson Line; his average weekly earnings were admitted to be 18*s.* 9*d.* a week with the former and 11*s.* 5*d.* 2*d.* with the latter, so that during the last twelve months he earned 2*l.* 3*s.* 11*d.* a week; that amount multiplied by 156 under Sched. I. (1.) (a) came to more than 300*l.*; therefore he awarded the applicants 300*l.*

The employers appealed on the grounds that there were no concurrent contracts of service and that the learned judge ought to have assessed the compensation due to the applicants at an amount not exceeding the sum of 234*l.*, i. e., 30*s.* a week, representing the average wages of a workman of the same grade, multiplied by 156.

[896] COZENS-HARDY, M. B.—This is an appeal which raises a point as to the principle upon which the earnings of a casual porter employed by the Port of London Authority ought to be ascertained.

Now it has been my fate in at least three cases, namely, Perry v. Wright [1908] 1 K. B. 441; Snell v. Bristol [1914] 2 K. B. 291, and Barnett v. Port of London Authority [1913] 2 K. B. 115, to go at some length into what in my view is the true principle to apply. Having listened to all the arguments in the present case, I do not desire to detract from or vary one single sentence in any of those judgments, but it is right, having regard to what we have heard from Mr. Pollock, that I should say a few words. The deceased man, who met with his death by an accident undoubtedly arising out of and in the course of his employment, had been employed casually by the Port of London Authority for about forty-two weeks in each of the three years next preceding his death, that is on the average, or, in other words, he was employed for parts of 126 weeks during the three years. He was also employed by another shipping [897] company for a considerable time during which he earned much higher wages.

The case before the learned county court judge was put in this way: The Port of London Authority said, "Add up the actual earnings which he has made in our employment and divide it by the proper number of weeks, and that will be the right figure," and then they submitted to an award for a sum which they now admit to have been inadequate. They now offer 234*l.*, arrived at in the manner which I shall describe.

The learned county court judge based his judgment on this. He said it was a case of concurrent contracts, one with the Port of London Authority, another with a shipping company; and that what had to be done was this, to make a very simple calculation, to add up the total earnings under those concurrent contracts, and that that would give sufficient to entitle the dependents to the maximum figure under the Act. It has been scarcely contended here—in fact I am entitled, I think, to say that it has not been contended—that the decision of the learned judge on that ground can be supported. It is quite clear there were no concurrent contracts: there were successive contracts, and the point about concurrent contracts was not argued by counsel for the defendants. I think, therefore, that the learned judge's decision so far as it was based on that ground cannot be supported. Prima facie, therefore, the case ought to go down for a new trial; but Mr. Pollock has ingeniously sought to raise this point. He says that, assuming that it is a casual contract, the proviso in Sched. I. paragraph 2 (a), has nothing whatever to do with the case; that we have to find on the language of the Act itself what were the actual average earnings of the man; that we can do it, and that we can only go to the proviso if necessary. I am not in sympathy with that view. I can see no justification for saying that we are to disregard the clear words of the Act in Sched. I. paragraph 1 (a) (i.), where it speaks of the weekly earnings under the same employer. I think it is altogether wrong to disregard those words, and to say that we are not called upon to consider what were his earnings under the same employer. Mr. Pollock relied on these words of Sched. I. paragraph 2 (a): "average weekly earnings shall be computed in [898] such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated." It is very curious drafting, but I think that means that the average weekly earnings shall be computed in the manner which is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated under the same employer. Then the proviso says there may be difficulties in doing that. Take the case of a "season" occupation, as it is sometimes called, such as harvesting, and of a man who is injured during harvesting, when it is common knowledge that his earnings are much higher than they are during the rest of the year. That is a case in which we cannot have regard to that period as at all decisive or sufficient to enable us to arrive at the rate at which he was actually being remunerated. The proviso says: "Where by reason of the shortness of the time during which the workman has been in the employment of his employer, or the casual nature of the employment, or the terms of the employment, it is impracticable at the date of the accident to compute the rate of remuneration, regard may be had to the average weekly amount which during the twelve months previous to the accident was being earned by a person in the same grade employed at the same work by the same employer, or, if there is no person so employed, by a person in the same grade employed in the same class of employment and in the same district." Throughout it seems to me that what we have to find as best we can is what were his weekly earnings under the same employer for the particular period in question. In some cases that is three years. In other cases it may only be for twelve months. This is a casual labourer; and the proviso expressly mentions the casual labourer. The casual labourer was held to be within the old Act in Lysons v. Knowles [1901] A. C. 79, where a man was only employed for a few days, but it was quite obvious that injustice was done by the provisions of that Act. Then this strange clause was put in; I say strange, but it is still more strange when we look at Sched. I. paragraph 2 (b), because, having said in the earlier part that what we have to ascertain is the earnings of the workman under the same employer, the proviso [899] goes on to say that if there are two concurrent contracts we are to add up the earnings under both of them. It is a very strange piece of drafting for which I have not heard a word of commendation uttered by anybody; certainly no word of commendation has ever fallen from the Bench.

The arbitrator has to find what the amount of earnings under the same employer would have been for the last twelve months; and I think this also is clear: that in cases to which the proviso applies we cannot take the average earnings of men in the same class and disregard the fact that the particular workman in question may be a specially bad man, an average man, or a specially good man. We have to deal with the particular grade, and there is a grade of these porters. Some may be better than the average and some lower than the average. I think without any difference of opinion in any Court it has always been held that, acting under paragraph 2 (a), the personal qualifications of the man may be considered, and that the mere average is not conclusive of the matter. Mr. Wallace does not dispute that as a proposition, but he says there is no evidence here that the deceased man was other than an average man; that that being so, the thing we must have regard to is what were the average wages of this grade; and that the average wages were 30s. a week. By his amended notice of motion he has offered to accept an award of 234l. on that footing. This is the point on which alone I have felt any difficulty. What we have to ascertain as best we can is what were the average earnings or would have been the average earnings of this man during the previous three years. We cannot ascertain that in the same way as we should where a workman has been employed for three years under a contract for so many shillings a week. The test we have to apply is not what would his earnings have been in another employment of the same class, but what is it reasonable to suppose that his earnings would have been in the previous twelve months, and not the three years. What we have to find is not what this man could have got in the whole market, but what would have been his average earnings under the same employer. It is said that in arriving at that we ought to disregard the fact that if he had gone elsewhere he might have got [900] more than he got at the Port of London. If, as is said, the Port of London Authority are in the habit of paying lower wages than other employers, that, of course, is a fact that would be taken into consideration, but with the evidence before us that this particular man when employed by other people did earn wages considerably in excess of the average of 30s. a week, and having regard to the fact that the learned county court judge seems to have disregarded altogether that consideration, I think that the case ought to go back to him to be dealt with, not on the footing of Mr. Pollock's contention, and not necessarily on the footing of Mr. Wallace's contention, but that he should have regard to the personal qualifications of the man. He seems to have disregarded them and proceeded on an entirely different footing.

For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed, and there must be a new trial unless the parties can agree on a figure.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The learned judge in the Court below has given the applicants the compensation claimed upon the footing of concurrent contracts. He says that the deceased workman had entered into contracts of service both with the respondents and the Cunard Thompson Line during the twelve months immediately preceding his death. In my opinion the judgment proceeding on that ground was erroneous. It is not a case of concurrent contracts of service. Perhaps these may be called successive contracts, because technically, even with casual employment, for the time of the actual employment there was a subsisting contract, but it was merely casual employment; that is to say, there were no running contracts under which the employer was entitled to require the labour of the workman or under which the workman was entitled to demand employment from the employer. Sched. I, paragraph 2 (b), is a useful clause applying to cases where there are strictly concurrent contracts of service, where a workman may have contracts at the same time running with two or more employers during the same week or month or whatever the period may be. During part of the day or part of the week he would work for one employer, and during another part of the [901] day or another part of the week, as the case may be, he would work for another employer. In that case the weekly earnings under the two are added so as to ascertain what his earnings were, and they are to be treated as if those were the earnings earned in the employment of the employer for whom he was working at the time of the accident. Paragraph 2 (b) refers to concurrent contracts properly so called, and not to a case of casual employment where there are no co-existing contracts at all. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment below was erroneous.

Then it was argued that the learned judge ought to have ascertained the average weekly earnings which the workman was in fact earning, and that they ought to have been ascertained by taking the aggregate earnings under all his employers during the last year. The short answer to that is that the schedule does not give the workman remuneration on that basis. Sched. I, paragraph 1 (a) (i.), applies where the workman has been in the employment of the same employer for some time; if for three years, then his earnings are to be ascertained on that basis. If for less than three years, the earnings are to be ascertained on the basis of the period of his actual employment whatever that period may be under the same employer. Then it may be that the period is so short or for some other reason we cannot fairly estimate the workman's wages; either not fairly towards the workman or not fairly towards the employer, especially where the period is very short. In the present case, as there was only a casual employment, paragraph 1 (a) (i.) cannot be applied. It is impracticable to apply that paragraph because under it the man's earnings cannot be ascertained. Then paragraph 2 provides that "For the purposes of the provisions of this schedule relating to 'earnings' and 'average weekly earnings' of a workman the following rules shall be observed:—(a), average weekly earnings shall be computed in such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated." In my opinion that means was being remunerated by the same employer. It may be that the man was ill during part of that time, and could not work, it may be that work was short, it may be that some holidays intervened, it may be that there were exceptional circumstances under which it would not be fair [902] to take the strict application of paragraph 1 (a) (i.). Then his earnings must be computed in the manner best calculated to give the rate per week at which he was being remunerated. Then comes the proviso which does in my opinion apply to the present case. There is a provision "that where by reason of the shortness of the time during which the workman has been in the employment of his employer, or the casual nature of the employment, or the terms of the employment, it is impracticable at the date of the accident to compute the rate of remuneration." Here it is impracticable by reason of the casual nature of the employment. It would be unfair to the workman to take only his employment under the Port of London Authority, because his average there would work out at something like 18s. 9d. a week. Then we may have regard to the average weekly amount, which during the twelve months previous to the accident was being earned by the man; and this is where the twelve months comes in; previously it was three years. When we take the average for the purpose of this paragraph we may have regard to what during the twelve months previous to the accident was being earned by a person in the same grade employed at the same work by the same employer. The word "same" being repeated in this proviso indicates that it is to that employment that we are to look in order to fix a scale of compensation under the statute. We are to have regard to the weekly amount which during the twelve months previous was being earned by a person in the same grade and at the same work under the same employer. It does not follow from that—in fact the contrary has been established—that although we may refer to the grade or to the position in which the man was being employed, workmen in the same grade are all equal. Some workmen are better than others, and if the man in question was a superior workman evidence may be given of that fact with a view of increasing the compensation that should be paid. But the amount of compensation would be limited by the grade of men employed in the same work by the same employer; that is the limit of the compensation. In determining the amount of compensation to which the man is entitled we may also have special regard to his personal qualifications. I can see no difficulty in [903] the present case in arriving at the compensation on that basis. It has not been done in the Court below.

In Snell v. Bristol [1914] 2 K. B. 291, Cozens-Hardy M.R. first of all pointed out during the argument that it was wrong to add together the actual earnings of the man with various employers in order to arrive at his wages earned. Then he says, [1914] 2 K. B. 298: "The learned judge really seems to have thought that the only question was: Is it to be 12s. 6d., which is half the average, or is it to be the half of 2l., which the man himself had earned during the previous twelve months? that, I think, is not the test. Those earnings are elements which may be taken into consideration, and that is all." Sir Samuel Evans P. in the same way said, [1914] 2 K. B. 295: "It would be wrong for the judge in this case, or in any other case, to adopt a hard and fast rule and to say that a man has actually worked for a twelvemonth and has had the average weekly earnings of so and so. If that is adopted as a hard and fast rule it is wrong; but that is obviously not only a consideration, but a very important consideration, in making a computation as to what the average weekly earnings of a man ought to be estimated to be." That really means this: that in arriving in the best way we can at what the average weekly earnings ought to be estimated at under the Port of London Authority we may have regard to what his earnings were elsewhere, what his conduct has been, what his qualifications were, in order to see whether or not he is entitled to be regarded as capable of earning, and whether he would probably have earned, the maximum rate of wage paid by that employer.

On these grounds I think the case ought to go back to the learned judge for the compensation to be settled, and that there ought to be a new trial.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The learned county court judge has decided the amount of compensation to be awarded to this applicant on the principle of there being concurrent contracts which he was entitled to take together. The man was a casual labourer. He worked for two different employers, [904] the Port of London Authority and the Cunard Thompson Line. Now the nature of casual employment of that kind is quite well known. The contract that exists is the contract that arises from the taking on of men to do a job and the job is for a whole day or a half-day, as the case may be. As soon as that job is done the contract is done. He then on the next day, or if he has only worked half a day possibly the same day, takes another job from another employer, but he does not do that till the first job is finished. The result of that is that he only takes the second job, on which the contract arises, after the first one is finished, and he only takes a later one after the former one is finished. They never exist together, and I have been from the moment that this case was opened at the greatest loss to see how two contracts can possibly be concurrent when they never exist together. Indeed the respondent to the appeal has never attempted to uphold the learned county court judge's judgment on that basis, and, as I gather, it was not a point that was argued before the judge or was expressly taken. But the respondent seeks to uphold the amount of the award of compensation on another ground, namely this, that the man being employed casually, and it being possible to ascertain for the twelve months preceding this award of compensation what his average weekly earnings were, that amount is to be taken as the amount of his average weekly earnings; that is to say that, inasmuch as taking the whole time that he has worked for the previous twelve months he has averaged something like 45s. a week, that and that alone is the thing which is to be looked at in arriving at what his average weekly earnings for that period were. Now that seems to me to proceed upon an erroneous construction of the opening words of Sched. I. paragraph 2 (a). It proceeds upon a construction which gives the meaning to those words that in the case of casual employment we are to look at what the man has earned under any number of employers, and say that those are his average weekly earnings for the purpose of the paragraph, namely, that "average weekly earnings shall be computed in such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated." I think that is an erroneous construction. "Average weekly earnings" in paragraph 2 must [905] be read as having the same meaning as "average weekly earnings" in paragraph 1, and it means average weekly earnings under the same employer. It was conceded by Mr. Pollock that anybody apart from authority and having regard to grammar and common sense would read it in that way, but he said there were authorities which obliged us to read it in a different way. I have heard no authority which comes within any measurable distance of laying down such a meaning for those words, and I think therefore that they must be read in the way that has been mentioned by the other members of the Court, namely, that his earnings must be computed in such a manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated by the employer under whom he was working, and it seems to me that if that were not the meaning paragraph 2, sub-paragraph (b), would be quite without meaning; because the opening words of sub-paragraph (a) are not confined to casual labour, they apply to contract labour, and every other labour, and therefore, if that be the proper meaning, the earnings under every employer would have to be taken together and the provision as to concurrent contracts would be quite meaningless. Also I think the proviso to paragraph (2.) (a) points very strongly in that direction too, because it says that where by reason of the shortness of the time or the casual nature of the employment or other matters it is impracticable to compute the rate of remuneration, regard may be had in the first instance to the average weekly amount which during the twelve months previous to the accident was being earned by a person in the same grade employed at the same work by the same employer.

Now, if the opening words of (2.) (a) would apply to every employer, why, when we cannot apply them, should we go to a person in the same grade employed by the same employer? It seems to me that the two must be read together, and we go to a person employed by the same employer first because we are dealing with the remuneration paid by the same employer; and it is only when we cannot find a person in the same grade employed by the same employer that we go to a person employed somewhere else of the same grade in the same district. If that is so, it is clear that the award cannot [906] be supported on the ground on which the respondent seeks to support it.

The right principle which has to be applied has been laid down in several cases. It is this. In a case like this it is impracticable to ascertain the remuneration in the ordinary way; we must therefore look at a person in the same grade; we look at the average earnings of persons in the same grade, and then, if there be any special qualification in the man with whom we are dealing which would make him likely to earn more than the average or less than the average, regard must be had to that personal equation, as it has been called, as well. That is the principle which will have to be applied by the judge when this case comes before him again. The only doubt that I have had is whether there is any evidence at all of differentiation of this man from other men before the county court judge. The applicants did not run their case on that line at all, and therefore no positive evidence was given, and the only evidence was that the deceased had in fact earned during the previous twelve months more than the average wages of persons in the same grade employed by the same employer; but as that was brought about by his being employed by a company who paid higher wages for part of the time, I have some doubt whether that really was evidence of exceptional ability or steadiness or industry on the part of this man. But on the whole I think, as the applicant raised an erroneous contention before the county court judge, as the main contention by the respondents, the present appellants, before the county court judge was also erroneous, and as the county court judge's decision was erroneous on a principle which was not contended for by either side, it is more satisfactory that the case should go down and be retried. It seems to me that the fact that the workman had earned more than the average wages of a person in the same grade employed by the same employer cannot be used to raise his average weekly earnings above the maximum earnings of persons in the same grade employed by the same employer. That is the outside to which we can go. We must still have regard to earnings of persons in the same grade employed by the same employer, and if his wages are higher than the maximum [907] earned by persons in that grade he cannot be entitled to that excess. I agree, therefore, that this case should go down for a new trial.

Appeal allowed.

NOTE.

The reported case, construing the phrase "average weekly earnings" as used as the criterion of the allowance to be made under a workmen's compensation act, holds that where the injured person has been for several years employed as a casual laborer by the employer in whose service he is injured, compensation must be based on his earnings in that employment; without regard to the amount contemporaneously earned in the service of another. For a discussion of the meaning of the phrase "average weekly earnings" in a workmen's compensation act, see the notes to White v. Wiseman, Ann. Cas. 1913D 1021, and Shipp v. Frodingham Iron, etc. Co. Ann. Cas. 1914C 183.

v.

CITY AND COUNTY OF DENVER
ET AL.

Colorado Supreme Court—July 8, 1914.

58 Colo. 1; 143 Pac. 284.

Municipal Corporations — Right to Construct Improvement Jointly with Railroad Company.

Denver Charter Amendment, May 20, 1913, § 355, created a tunnel commission to construct a railroad tunnel through the Rocky Mountains to transport freight, passengers, water, and electricity, provided that if the tunnel should be originally constructed for the transportation of freight and passengers, that right should not be destroyed or needlessly interrupted by the extension of the use for the passage of water, electricity, etc. The amendment also provided that two thirds of the cost of the tunnel should be paid by a bond issue of the city; that the other third should be paid by a railroad company, which should have the right to operate trains through the tunnel, the title to which should be in the city, but with the right of the railroad company to purchase the same. The city had not declared its intention to build a water system, power plant, or any public utility of which the tunnel was to form a part, nor by which it was to be of any use to the city whatsoever. It was to have the perpetual right to use the tunnel free of rent, as an aqueduct, and to install conduits therein to bring water into the city, to operate a pipe line, and an electric line through the tunnel, and to use it for drainage if it so desired, also to have full benefit of any one that might be found in driving the tunnel, and the right to subject it and the tracks herein to use of any other railroad desiring the same on terms which would be exceedingly onerous to any other railroad. Held, that the ordinance was violative of Const. art. 11, §§ 1, 2, prohibiting a city from lending its credit to any company or corporation for any purpose; and from making a donation of money or bonds in furtherance of a work jointly with any person, company, or corporation, etc.

Error to District Court, Denver, county:
ALLEN, Judge.

Action for injunction. Daniel A. Lord, plaintiff, and City and County of Denver et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

I. N. Stevens, Harry A. Lindsay, Joseph O.

[3] SCOTT, J.—This action is by a citizen and taxpayer, to restrain the City and County of Denver from issuing its bonds in the amount of three millions of dollars, to aid in the construction of a proposed tunnel to be known as the "Moffat Tunnel." It seems that a statement of the facts must be extended to an unusual length in order that the matters to be determined may be properly understood.

The questions raised were determined in the court below upon a demurrer to the complaint. The complaint alleges the organization and existence of the City and County of Denver under the XXth article of the Constitution; and that on the 20th day of May, 1913, an amendment [4] to the charter of the city and county was adopted, known as section 355. This section purported to create a Tunnel Commission, to consist of three members, and at the same election, the members of such commission were elected. Among other things provided by the said amendment, were the following:

"All the powers granted to the City and County of Denver by Article XX of the Constitution of the State of Colorado, and otherwise existing by operation of law, including the power of eminent domain and authority to make all necessary filings under the laws of the State of Colorado and the United States, are hereby conferred upon said Tunnel Commission, to acquire, construct, build, assist in building and constructing, operate, maintain, lease and dispose of, a transportation tunnel, together with necessary approaches thereto, through the main range or divide of the Rocky Mountains under or near James Peak, to be known as the 'Moffat Tunnel,' for the purpose of transporting freight, passengers, water and electricity, or for any one or more of such purposes; provided, however, that in the event said tunnel shall be originally constructed for the transportation of freight and passengers, the right shall be retained by the City and County in perpetuity, to construct and operate, or to authorize the construction and operation, through such tunnel, of an aqueduct, pipe line or other apparatus for conveying water from the western to the eastern portal, for use by the City and County of Denver, and its inhabitants for domestic purposes, irrigation, power or other uses; also the right to extend or authorize the extension through the same, of cables, wires or other apparatus for conveying electricity manufactured west of the western portal thereof, to be used for power, lighting or other purposes, by the city and its inhabitants; and to permit the use thereof, upon some fair and equitable basis, by any and all railway lines desiring such use; but in enlarging said tunnel or otherwise preparing it for, and subjecting it to the said water or electric uses, the original use to which it shall have been subjected, shall not be destroyed, impaired or needlessly interrupted. [5] And if in constructing said tunnel, mineral in paying quantities shall be discovered therein, the commission shall have power to make such contracts and take such other steps in relation thereto as will secure for the city and county, the benefit of such discovery or discoveries.

"The construction, management, operation, lease and sale or disposition of said tunnel and its subjection to the transmission of water and electricity, shall be in the exclusive control of said Tunnel Commission, including the disbursement of all funds provided in connection therewith.

"The commission shall institute and defend all litigation affecting its duties or powers or arising from the exercise thereof, or in relation to its trusts, and all expenses of such litigation shall be paid by the treasurer, out of the General Fund upon the warrant of the commission.

"The commission may also provide that a portion of the funds needed for construction of the tunnel may be furnished by individuals or corporations interested in the same, and may enter into contracts with such individuals or corporations interested in the same, and may enter into contracts with such individuals or corporations with reference to the construction, control, management, operation and future lease, sale or disposition of the same; provided always, that until the city and county shall have been reimbursed in full for any and all moneys so expended by it, together with interest thereon, and is released from all financial liability in connection therewith, it shall retain the ownership of said tunnel and the right to regulate and control the same itself, or by its representative or agent, or by contract as hereinbefore provided.

"And provided further, that the rights in and to said tunnel hereinbefore reserved to the city and county in perpetuity, shall be perpetually retained, notwithstanding any lease, sale or other disposition of said tunnel or its use. If upon investigation the commission shall decide that said tunnel is desirable and its construction feasible, that body shall determine the amount of general bonds of the city [6] and county necessary to be issued, and the rate of interest the same shall bear per annum; and the commission may by ordinance of the city council, submit to the vote of the taxpaying electors, at any time, at any election held in the city and county, after the adoption of this amendment, for whatever purpose such election may be called, whether such election be general or special, or at a special election called upon their request for the purpose, the question of whether the city and county shall issue its general bonds maturing in not less than fifteen, nor more than fifty years for such purpose, in such amount, and at such rate of interest as has been determined by said commission; and the council shall pass the necessary ordinance to call said election at the time so fixed by said commission; and the Clerk and Election Commission shall publish the necessary notices for calling and holding said election at the time so fixed, and they and all other officers, shall perform the duties incumbent upon them by law for the legal holding of said election.

"The commission may also submit any proposition concerning its powers or trust at any municipal election. All propositions shall be submitted in the way, at the time, and in the manner and form prescribed by said commission.

"When there is so submitted to the taxpaying electors the question of incurring a general indebtedness of the city and county, for the foregoing purpose, if a majority of the votes cast thereon shall be in favor of the proposition so submitted, it shall thereby be adopted, and such adoption shall be a sufficient authorization for the issuance of the bonds in the amount thereby provided for, and maturing on the date therein fixed, and the same, when issued, shall be and constitute a valid general indebtedness of the City and County of Denver for said purpose, and the provisions of this section relative to the issue, sale and redemption of bonds, shall apply thereto; the vote upon such election shall be canvassed and the result declared by the proper officers as provided by law.

[7] "The council shall pass such ordinance as said commission shall deem necessary respecting the issuance of said bonds, or to the full exercise of all the powers herein given it, in the form recommended by the commission and without amendment, and the Mayor shall sign the same.

"The City and County of Denver shall annually levy a sufficient tax for the creation of a sinking fund to discharge in full the principal of, and interest on, the bonds issued hereunder, unless the ordinance adopted, as hereinabove provided, shall contain suitable provisions otherwise to insure the prompt payment of said interest as the same shall become due, and also for the creation of a sinking fund sufficient to discharge in full the principal of said bonds at maturity.

"This section and any provision of the charter referred to herein shall remain in full force, so far as may be necessary for the purpose of securing the prompt payment of the bonds issued hereunder, and until said bonds are fully paid shall be irrevocable:

"The inhabitants of the City and County of Denver by the adoption of this charter amendment do find and declare that the said tunnel, will in their judgment, be of local use and convenience to the people, and that it is also absolutely essential to the future growth and welfare of said city and county."

It is then alleged that the tunnel commission so created, proceeded to determine and did determine, the approximate cost of the tunnel, together with the necessary approaches thereto, through the main range or divide of the Rocky Mountains, under or near James Peak, and for that purpose the same could be constructed for not to exceed $4,420,000, and that acting under the authority assumed to be conferred, by the city charter amendment, the commission on the 8th day of October, 1913, entered into a written agreement with the Denver and Salt Lake Railroad Company, for the construction of such tunnel.

This agreement recites that the railroad company owns and operates a railroad from the City of Denver [8] to Steamboat Springs, Colorado, and is engaged in the extension thereof to Craig, Colorado, and shall be further constructed and extended to Salt Lake City, Utah; that the railroad company desires to use, lease, operate and maintain and ultimately to acquire, the said tunnel, for railroad and transportation purposes, subject to the city's use for conveying water and electricity, and the city's power and control over said tunnel for the purpose of assuring fair and equitable rates to other railroads using said tunnel; and that in consideration of the premises, the railroad company is willing to grant the use of its tracks for the distance of thirty miles east of the eastern portal of said tunnel, and for a distance of seventy-five miles west of the western portal of said tunnel in perpetuity, to other railroads desiring to use the tunnel, on the terms and conditions afterwards provided in the agreement; that a survey has theretofore been made by the Continental Tunnel Railroad Company, and rights of way have been secured by said company, in the land office of the United States for the location of the proposed tunnel.

It is then agreed that in pursuance of the power conferred by the said charter amendment, the tunnel commission will procure the services of engineers of experience, and the construction of the proposed tunnel, and fix the compensation to be paid such engineers, and that this payment shall be made from the funds provided for the construction of the tunnel; or in case of failure of the city to vote the bonds provided in the agreement, that the railroad company shall pay one-third, and the tunnel commission two-thirds of said expenses: that an estimate of the costs of the tunnel shall be made by the engineers, and which tunnel shall be adapted for and with a single-track railroad, having an inside clearance of not less than sixteen feet in width, and not less than twenty-one feet in height, and suitable for said city's use not only for railroad transportation purposes, but also for the conveyance of an ample supply of water for domestic and irrigation purposes, and electricity for power and [9] lighting purposes for the City and County of Denver, and the inhabitants thereof, and which said tunnel shall have grades not exceeding two per cent cut for railroad purposes.

The tunnel commission further agreed, that in case the engineers report the probable cost of construction of the tunnel and the approaches, ready for the installation of facilities for the transportation of water and electricity for use by the City and County of Denver, and ready for the electric operation of a single-track railroad, shall be $4,500,000 or less, then the tunnel commission shall undertake the construction, building and completion of said tunnel, approaches and stationary railroad facilities, and provide and pay $8,000,000 by and through the issuance of general bonds of the City and County of Denver, to be issued in accordance with the amendment; such bonds to bear interest at not more than five per cent per annum, interest payable semi-annually, and shall be payable fifty years after their date.

It was also provided for the retirement of such bonds and the creation of a sinking fund. It was then agreed by the commission that if the probable cost reported by the engineers did not exceed $4,500,000 and if the lowest satisfactory bid confirms such estimate, that the tunnel commission shall build said tunnel upon conditions that the railroad company shall pay the entire excess of costs over and above the sum of $3,000,000; further, that the payments required by the railroad company shall be deposited as thereafter agreed, and that the consideration of such payments, together with the right to use the tracks of said railroad company, are for an option provided for in the agreement, by which the railroad company is granted the right to use, lease, operate, and maintain, and ultimately to acquire the said tunnel from said tunnel commission, as provided in the agreement. The tunnel commission was to institute and defend all litigation affecting its duties and powers, or arising from the exercise thereof, or relating to the administration of its trusts, and to exercise the power of [10] eminent domain, and all of the expenses therein incurred, are to be included as a part of the costs of the tunnel.

The tunnel commission further agreed that the railroad company may at any time purchase said tunnel for railroad transportation.

purposes, upon the payment by the railroad company, of the $3,000,000 of the bonds provided for, or so much thereof as may be sold for the purposes thereof, with all accrued interest, and that the title of the said tunnel and its approaches, shall thereupon immediately vest in the railroad company. The tunnel commission is, on demand of the railroad company, to execute and deliver to the railroad company, such other and further assurance of title as may be necessary in the premises; subject, however, to a perpetual easement in the city for the transmission of water, and electric current for light, heat and power, and also subject to the perpetual right reserved by the city and county, to have said tunnel equipment and approaches, and tracks of said railroad for a distance of thirty miles east of the eastern portal and for a distance of seventy-five miles west of the western portal, used by other railroads, as provided in the agreement.

The railroad company agreed that if the estimate of the engineers for the reasonable cost of said tunnel, necessary approaches and stationary railroad facilities, ready for laying of pipes and the installation of facilities for the transportation of an ample supply of water for domestic and irrigation uses, and of electricity for power and lighting purposes, for the City and County of Denver, and including said single-track railroad, to be $4,500,000 or less, then one-third of said estimate costs of construction, building and completion of said tunnel, approaches and facilities shall be deposited by said railroad company, concurrently with the two-thirds thereof deposited by the tunnel commission.

The railroad company further agreed that the tunnel commission should build and construct the tunnel, necessary approaches thereto, and facilities for transportation [11] of water and electricity as aforesaid, including said single-track, and that the railroad company should pay any excess of cost above the said sum of $3,000,000.

It was also agreed that the title to the said tunnel and its necessary approaches, shall be vested in the City and County of Denver, and shall remain the property of said city and county, until the same shall have been purchased and fully paid for by the railroad company.

It was further agreed that the railroad company should pay the interest on all the bonds to be issued and sold by the city, so long as any such bonds are unpaid and outstanding, plus one per cent per annum on all said bonds outstanding, to comply with the sinking fund for the provision of the retirement of said bonds, and should also pay the entire cost of maintenance, equipment and operation of said tunnel, including the necessary motive power.

The railroad company further agreed to provide trackage rights for the use of said tunnel and its approaches by other railroads under fair and reasonable trackage agreements containing the usual proper covenants and conditions customarily embodied in trackage agreements, between railroads, and upon condition that each other railroad desiring to use the said tunnel and its approaches, may do so only, upon payment of one-half of the interest upon the actual cost of construction and equipment of the tunnel, and its approaches, on a basis of five per cent of all sums paid by the constructing parties, for construction and equipment and motive power of said tunnel and its approaches, together with such proportion of the cost of maintenance and operation of said tunnel and its approaches, as the number of car wheels of each road so using said tunnel, shall bear to the total number of car wheels passing through said tunnel.

The railroad company further agreed to furnish at its own cost, and to provide all electric current necessary for the operation of the tunnel and its approaches, and to supply all the necessary equipment, including motive [12] power, for the operation of the tunnel. The railroad company further agreed to permit to the railroads having trackage rights to the use of the tunnel, to use its tracks and facilities for a distance of thirty miles from the east portal, and seventy-five miles from the west portal, provided that any such railroad so using the tracks and facilities, shall pay interest at the rate of three per cent per annum based upon the reasonable cost of reproducing the tracks so used, at the time of acquiring the right of way, and that each railroad shall in addition, and as a condition precedent, pay to the railroad company for maintenance and repairs, a percentage of the actual cost thereof based upon the car wheels estimate. The railroad company further agreed that it would on or before the maturity of the bonds of the city, exercise its option to purchase said tunnel by the payment of the principal of the $3,000,000, or so much thereof as may have been sold.

It is further agreed by the railroad company, that it will immediately, upon the beginning of the construction of the tunnel, proceed in the construction of its lines from Craig, Colorado, toward the Colorado and Utah line, and will within five years from the date of the completion of the tunnel, have its lines fully and continuously in regular, daily operation to the City of Salt Lake.

It was also agreed between the parties, that before any contract is let for the construction of the tunnel or any part thereof, the tunnel commission shall deposit with a depository to be agreed upon, $3,000,000 of bonds of the City and County of Denver, and that the railroad company will deposit with the said depository, its proportion of the total cost of the said tunnel in cash or current marketable securities so deposited, to be sold by the party so depositing as it may desire, and all proceeds to be deposited with the depository.

It was mutually agreed further, that the money so deposited by the contracting parties shall be paid out in the same ratio or proportion, as the total amount furnished by the parties shall bear to each other.

[13] It was further mutually agreed that the exclusive right shall forever be reserved in perpetuity in the City and County of Denver, "to construct and operate through said tunnel, an aqueduct, pipe line, or other apparatus for conveying water from the western to the eastern portal, for use by the said City and County of Denver; for domestic, power, and other purposes; also the right to extend through the same, cables, wires and other apparatus for conveying electricity, to be used for power, light and other purposes by the city; subject to the conditions that all installation of equipment and use of said tunnel and approaches for the purposes aforesaid, shall not destroy, impair, or unreasonably interrupt the uses of said tunnel for said railroad purposes."

It was further agreed that the tunnel commission shall take such steps as may be permissible under the existing laws, or by procuring appropriate legislation, as will secure exclusively to the city, the benefit of any or all veins of mineral, or mineral deposits, that may be discovered in constructing the tunnel, provided that no mining operations or mining development shall, at any time or in any manner, interfere with, impede, endanger, or destroy the use of said tunnel or its approaches for transportation purposes. All funds were to be paid out upon order of the tunnel commission. Contracts were to be let by bid, the tunnel commission to reserve the right to accept or reject any such bids.

It was also provided, that upon completion of the tunnel and its approaches, the railroad company should be entitled to the possession and operation of the same for railroad transportation purposes, such possession and operation being subject to the use, rights and easements reserved to the city.

It was further agreed that the cost of the special election to determine the question of issuance of the $3,000,000 bond issue, shall be paid, one-half by the city, and one-half by the railroad company. It was likewise provided that in case of failure of the railroad to pay the interest on the outstanding bonds of the city, or to [14] deposit the one per cent sinking fund as provided, or failure in any other of the material provisions of the contract for a period of three months, then the tunnel commission may declare the contract terminated and all sums paid by the railroad company shall be held as liquidated damages.

The complaint further alleges that after the execution of this agreement the question of the issuance of $3,000,000 in bonds, was properly submitted and adopted.

There are but two questions presented for determination: 1. Is the issuance of the bonds by the city and for such a purpose, inhibited by the constitution; 2. If not, then is the provision of the contract and proposition to issue such bonds extended for the full period of fifty years, in contravention of sec. 8, art. XI of the Constitution limiting the period for the extinguishment of a city debt to fifteen years.

Sections 1 and 2 of art. XI of the Constitution provide:

"Sec. 1. Neither the state nor any county, city, town, township or school district, shall lend or pledge the credit or faith thereof, directly or indirectly, in any manner to, or in aid of any person, company or corporation; public or private, for any amount or for any purpose whatever, or become responsible for any debt, contract or liability of any person, company or corporation, public or private, in or out of the state."

"Sec. 2. Neither the state nor any county, city, town, township or school district, shall make any donation or grant to, or in aid of, or become a subscriber to, or shareholder in, any corporation or company, or a joint owner with any person, company or corporation, public or private, in or out of the state, except as to such ownership as may accrue to the state, by escheat or by forfeiture, by operation or provision of law; and except as to such ownership as may accrue to the state, or to any county, city, town, township or school district, or to either or any of them, jointly with any person, company or corporation, by forfeiture or sale of real [15] estate for non-payment of taxes, or by donation or devise for public use, or by purchase by or on behalf of any or either of them, jointly with any or either of them, under execution in cases of fines, penalties or forfeiture or recognizance, breach of condition of official bonds, or of bond to secure public moneys, or the performance of any contract in which they or any of them may be jointly or severally interested."

Prior to the adoption of our constitution, the policy of extending public aid to private corporations, had grown to be alarming. Judge Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations, 1 Dill. § 313 and 318, points out the evil effects arising therefrom. This policy he suggests had become a mania, particularly in the west; that it had resulted in attempted repudiation upon the part of both states and municipalities, and says:

"The most noted of extraordinary or extra-municipal powers conferred upon municipal and public corporations, is the authority to aid in the construction of railways by subscribing to their stock, issuing negotiable bonds as a means of paying their subscription, and taxing the inhabitants or the property within their limits to pay the indebtedness thereby incurred regarded in the light of its effects, whatever may be thought of its constitutional soundness, there is little hesitation in affirming that this invention to aid the enterprise of private corporations has proved itself baneful in the last degree."

To prevent this evil, there began the adoption of constitutional amendments by many of the states, denying the right of the legislature to grant such powers. Our constitution was adopted at a time when the subject was much in the public mind. An examination of the proceedings of the constitutional convention shows the introduction of several resolutions upon the subject, and repeated redrafts of these sections, with the result that sections 1 and 2 of art. XI are broader in scope, and more specific in the matter of restriction, than any similar constitutional provision considered or brought to [16] our attention. Indeed, it would seem that language could not make plainer the intent of the framers of the constitution, to utterly prohibit the mingling of public moneys with those of private persons, either directly or indirectly, or in any manner whatsoever.

These sections of the constitution have been before this court, for interpretation at least, as to the spirit and intent. The case of Colorado Cent. R. Co. v. Lea, 5 Colo. 192, was decided within a very short period after the adoption of the constitution. Two of the three judges, then constituting the Supreme Court, had served as members of the constitutional convention. The question of public benefit was urged in that case, as here. It was there said:

"That the construction of the proposed line of railroad would be of great benefit to the county and its citizens; that it would give them increased and superior facilities for traffic and commerce with both the Atlantic and Pacific seaboard, do not make it any the less a donation within the intent of the inhibition.

"These and similar considerations of public benefit and advantage, had constituted for years, under our territorial government, the basis of appeals for and grants of county and municipal aid to railroad companies, and it was undoubtedly the intention of the framers of the Constitution, whether wisely or not, to prohibit, by the fundamental law of the new State, all public aid to railroad companies, whether by donation, grant or subscription, no matter what might be the public benefit and advantages flowing from the construction of such roads. I understand the framers of the Constitution and the people who adopted it, to have intended, by this provision the declaration of a broad policy of prohibition, forbidding state, county and municipal aid to railroad and other companies in any of the modes specified.

"If the existence of a public benefit is to give such an agreement the character of a sale of the stock, and take it out of the constitutional prohibition, then the prohibition is utterly nugatory, and [17] valueless, as such consideration would exist in every probable case."

Speaking of the sections of the Constitution under consideration and other provisions in restriction of authority to incur public debt, in the case of People v. May, 9 Colo. 80, 10 Pac. 641, it was said:

"It was their duty not only to provide against the recurrence of evils, patent and already experienced, but also to guard every point where abuses were liable to creep into the administration of public affairs. The waste, extravagance, frauds, peculations, defalcations and tax burdens, disgracing and incumbering the administration of American municipalities, county, town and city, had long been national topics of discussion, written about by publicists, denounced by the press and resolved about by political parties, and were known to the country at large. The effect of this was to make the honest and economical administration of affairs, whether town, city, county or state, practically the most important question that came before the convention."

It may be well to consider briefly the material facts as presented by the record. The railroad company owns and operates a railroad, beginning in the City of Denver and extending westward and over and beyond the range of mountains, through which the tunnel is proposed to be constructed. The agreement is in effect that the city will issue and sell its bonds in payment of two-thirds of the expense of the construction of such tunnel and its approaches, and to provide the same with railroad tracks for the operation of the company's trains through said tunnel. The railroad company to contribute one-third of the expense of such tunnel. The city is to sell, and the railroad to purchase, the city's interest in the tunnel upon payment to the city of the amount invested, with interest, within a specified time, and in the meantime to use the same as a part of its railroad line, and to pay the interest on the city's bonds.

The city has not projected, provided for, nor has it declared its intention to build, construct, own or operate [18] a water system, power plant, or any other public utility, of which the tunnel is to form a component part, or in which it is to be of any use to the city whatsoever.

Stripped of non-essentials for consideration here, and of improbable contingencies and remote possibilities, the foregoing statement presents the gist or rather the meat of the agreement between the city and the railroad company:

The railroad company operates its line over the mountains. It is important, and may be necessary for it to reduce its grade by going through the mountain by means of a tunnel. The city agrees with it, to issue its bonds in payment of two-thirds of the expense of driving the tunnel, constructing the railroad tracks, and proper approaches with the other necessary equipment to enable the railroad company to connect with its tracks at both ends of the tunnel. For this the company agrees to pay the interest on the bonds, and finally the principal, and upon such payment is to receive full title to the tunnel as constructed, for its purposes. Plainly this is in violation of the constitutional provisions; in that the city pledges its faith and credit for the benefit and use of the railroad corporation, and as plainly this is in aid of the railroad corporation.

It is likewise just as clear that this constitutes a joint enterprise between the city and the company, to last until the company shall have purchased the city's interests. By every legal test it is a partnership.

Do the other provisions of the agreement relieve it from this limitation of power.

Counsel for the defendants in error assert that there are four reservations in the contract that take it out of the inhibition of the constitution. We will consider these in the order and in the exact language presented:

"1. The perpetual right to use the tunnel free of rental or charge, as an aqueduct, and to install conduits therein for the purpose of bringing water from the western slope to be used by the city and its inhabitants."

[19] The agreement specifically provides that all the money contributed by the city shall be expended in the construction and equipment of the tunnel for railroad purposes alone. Not a dollar of this fund is to be used to install conduits or other means for the purpose of bringing water from the western slope to be used by the city and its inhabitants.

The engineers were to report the probable cost of the tunnel ready for the installation of facilities for the transportation of water and electricity for use by the City and County of Denver, and ready for the electrical operation of a single-track railroad, and for the building and completion of said tunnel, approaches, and railroad, and stationary railroad facilities.

The tunnel is thus to be ready only for the installation of city facilities, but is to be fully equipped for the purpose of railroad operation by the company, including the approaches and tracks. In another part of the agreement it is said the tunnel is to be "ready for the laying of pipes" by the city.

In the agreement, the rights of the city are specifically referred to as "easements." The agreement specifically provides, not for construction for the city's use, but the right only to the city of an easement.

"To construct and operate through said tunnel, an aqueduct, pipe line, or other apparatus for conveying water from the western to the eastern portal for use by the said City and County of Denver, for domestic, power, and other purposes, also the right to extend through the same, cables, wires and other apparatus for conveying electricity, to be used for power, light and other purposes by the city; subject to the conditions that all installation of equipment and use of said tunnel and approaches for the purposes aforesaid, shall not destroy, impair, or unreasonably interrupt the uses of said tunnel for said railroad purposes."

Counsel for the city in their brief say:

"For drainage and other purposes, it is necessary to have the center of the Moffat Tunnel slightly [20] higher than either portal; and, as a matter of fact, the western portal of the tunnel, as now proposed, will be fifty or sixty feet lower than the eastern portal. These facts have given rise to a doubt in the minds of many intelligent people as to the ability of the city to bring water through the tunnel from the western slope. This doubt does not, however, exist in the minds of educated engineers. It arises through a want of knowledge and experience on the part of the ordinary, though educated and intelligent laymen. In reality, the circumstances detailed present no difficulty whatever. By employment of what may be termed the 'inverted siphon' principle, all difficulty is overcome."

They also submit a drawing showing a vertical section of the mountain, the line of the proposed tunnel, the portals, and the line of level, and argue that the conveyance of water through the tunnel after its construction for railroad purposes, is an engineering possibility.

But this is not intended or suggested as a part of the agreement under which the city is to spend its money, to obtain which it must levy a tax upon its citizens.

Besides this, it is conceded that the city has no rights to the use of water west of the proposed tunnel, or that it has declared a purpose to acquire any such right, or has any intention to so do, or that it has a purpose to convey water through such tunnel, or by any other means, for the use of its inhabitants or otherwise, or that it has a purpose to attempt to convert such an engineering possibility into an accomplished fact. Indeed, under the express provision of the charter amendment the purpose of the tunnel is not necessarily for the conduct of water or electricity, but for any one of four purposes, for it recites, "for the purpose of transporting freight, passengers, water and electricity, or for any one or more of such purposes." And the amendment again recites: "But in enlarging said tunnel or otherwise preparing it for, and, subjecting it to, the said water or electric uses, the original use to which it shall have been subjected, shall not be impaired or needlessly interrupted." [21] The "original use" can be none other than for railroad transportation purposes, and by the Denver and Salt Lake road.

The second reservation to the city, relied on by counsel to sustain their contentions is as follows:

"2. The perpetual right, free of rental or charge, to install wires, together with all other apparatus that may be necessary, and bring electricity through the tunnel for lighting and power and other uses by the city and its inhabitants."

What has been said concerning the first proposition applies with equal force to this one, which deals with the possible transmission of electric current. Clearly the record discloses no intent or purpose upon the part of the city, to acquire power for the generation of electricity at a point beyond the tunnel or at any other point, or to engage in the generation and distribution of electricity for any municipal or other purpose.

And if it did so intend, certainly it would not undertake the construction of a tunnel at an expense to the city, of three millions of dollars, in the face of the common knowledge that electric current may be as easily conveyed over the mountains as through a tunnel, and at a comparatively insignificant expense.

The third reservation in the agreement, cited by counsel and upon which reliance is had, is:

"3. The ownership of mineral veins discovered in constructing the tunnel, and the perpetual right, free of charge, to locate the same and mine the ore therein; provided the city acquires the legal right to such veins; and provided also that such mining shall not interfere with, impede, endanger, or destroy the use of the tunnel for transportation purposes."

Certainly it will not be seriously contended that a municipality as such, can have the lawful right to levy a tax upon its citizens, in the absence of specific constitutional authority, for the purpose of locating mining claims, and engaging in the mining of metalliferous ores.

If it may do so in Grand and Gilpin counties, it may [22] with equal right and more propriety, so engage in the well known mining districts of Cripple Creek, Telluride or Leadville. We know of no authority wherein it has even been suggested that such a business comes within the range of municipal purposes. Besides, the discovery of valuable ores in the proposed tunnel can be said to be nothing more than a very remote possibility, and it will hardly be said that prospecting for ores, is a municipal power. But by what right may the city and the railroad company contract as to the ownership of ores located upon premises to which neither of the contracting parties have any right, title or interest.

The fourth and last proposition upon which counsel rely is the following:

"4. The perpetual right to subject the tunnel and the railway tracks therein to use by any other railroad desiring such use, including outside trackage rights over the line of said Denver & Salt Lake Railroad for such other railroads, covering a distance of seventy-five miles westerly from the western portal of the tunnel and thirty miles easterly from its eastern portal; such use of the tunnel and trackage rights to be upon reasonable terms to the other railroads so using the same; said terms being already specified in the written contract of October 8th, 1913, between the city and the railroad company."

If it is within the constitutional prohibition for the city to make donation, or grant to, or in aid of one railroad; or to lend or pledge its faith or credit, in aid of one railroad, or to become a joint owner with one railroad, clearly it is within such prohibition to do so with two or more railroads.

This proposition is but a repeated offense against the constitution. It involves another and only a possible contingency. It does not appear that any other railroad company desires or ever will desire, to avail itself of any such privilege, if it be a privilege. And if so, then under the agreement, it must be by a future contract with the Denver & Salt Lake Railroad Company [23] alone, and upon terms dictated by that corporation. Such agreements are to be the usual trackage agreements between railroads, in addition to other specific charges. It is true that in general the basis of the terms of such contracts are set out in the contract between the city, and the Denver & Salt Lake Company, but the latter company is to avail itself of all financial benefit. For instance it is provided that each railroad so using the tunnel, must pay one-half of the interest upon the actual cost of construction and equipment of the tunnel and its approaches, on the basis of five per cent of the cost both to the city and the Denver & Salt Lake Company, including motive power, and the proportionate cost of maintenance. Thus, if four of the great railroad companies, whose lines now enter the City of Denver, and some of which now extend both east and west of the city, with connections extending to both seaboard, should conclude that the use of the proposed tunnel would be of benefit to them in making shorter, through routes, or for other reasons, and if the city should conclude that this would be of material commercial advantage to it, an object apparently much desired by the citizens of Denver, then under this provision of the contract, the Denver & Salt Lake Railroad Company is empowered to charge each of such roads $112,500 annually, under the fictitious item of interest, in addition to the usual trackage agreements and other fixed charges provided by the agreement now being considered.

Not because there would be any such interest to pay, for the interest provided for would in the case suggested, amount to but one-half of what these four railroads alone must pay. Upon the estimated cost of construction at $4,500,000, and of five per cent as the rate of interest, these four roads would pay as an annual arbitrary and indefeasible sum, not to the city, but to the Denver & Salt Lake Railroad Company, of $450,000. This right is thus given to that railroad company in perpetuity.

[24] Thus, during the life of the proposed bonds alone, fifty years, each road so to use the tunnel, must first agree to pay to the Denver & Salt Lake Railroad Company, the sum of $5,925,000 for the use and benefit of that company. And this same right is given to the railroad company, to so tax every additional railroad that may desire to use the tunnel.

Certainly such manifest inequality and injustice, both to the city and to other companies, cannot act as an inducement for such companies to make use of the tunnel. Indeed, it would seem to present such a serious obstacle to the accomplishment of such purpose, as may be absolutely prohibitive. In this feature alone the contract between the city and the Salt Lake Company, if not a grant of subsidy, is indefinitely worse, for it confers the power upon the Salt Lake Company to levy tribute upon every other railroad company that may desire to make use of the tunnel. This is a flagrant violation of the constitutional provision.

From our consideration of these provisions inserted in the contract, we are irresistibly forced to the conclusion that they were inserted, not for the accomplishment of a legitimate municipal purpose, but rather in an effort to evade the constitutional prohibition.

Counsel urge that the question here is one for legislative determination, and point out that by elections, both by the voters and tax payers separately expressed, the legislative will of the municipality has been manifested in terms not to be mistaken. This manifestation of the will of the people of the municipality has been constantly before us in the consideration of the case.

But the question we are now considering is not one of the will of the municipality, but, is solely a question of limitation of power. We have not overlooked the rule of construction adopted by this court in an opinion written by the late Chief Justice Steele, in the case of Denver v. Hallett, 34 Colo. 308, 83 Pac. 1068, but rather to reiterate and emphasize it. It was there said:

"In a number of cases before this court as well [25] as the court of appeals, it has been held that with respect to municipal corporations, except as limited by the constitution, the general assembly has plenary power; that it is clearly a legislative function to determine what power shall be granted, what withheld, and what restrictions shall be imposed in the exercise of the powers granted. . . . The supremacy of the legislative authority over municipal corporations is not, however, in all respects unlimited, but the limitation must be sought in the national or state constitution."

It will certainly not be contended that either by the legislature of the state, or by the legislative powers of a municipality, such powers as are expressly prohibited by the organic law, may be exercised by either. Ours is a constitutional government, wherein the sovereign will of all the people, as expressed in the constitution, is supreme, beyond the express limitations of which a municipality may not go. If the municipality may offend, then so may the individual. If this may be done in case of the levy of a prohibited tax, it follows that it may be done in a case involving life or liberty; the Bill of Rights is then no protection, and the constitution becomes a rope of sand.

It is said that under the provisions of sec. 1, art. 20, there is the implied power to do that which is attempted in this case. The provision relied on is:

"The municipal corporation known as the City of Denver, etc., shall have the power, within or without its territorial limits, to construct, condemn, and purchase, acquire, lease, add to, maintain, conduct and operate, waterworks, light plants, power plants, transportation systems, heating plants, and any other public utilities or works or ways local in use and extent, in whole or in part, and everything required therefor, for the use of said city and county and the inhabitants thereof, and any such systems, plants, or works or ways, or any contracts in relation or connection with either, that may exist and which said city and county may desire to purchase, in whole or in part, the same or any part thereof may [26] be purchased by said city and county which may enforce such purchase by proceedings at law as in taking land for public use by right of eminent domain, and shall have the power to issue bonds upon the vote of the taxpaying electors, at any special or general election, in any amount necessary to carry out any of said powers or purposes, as may by the charter be provided."

Nowhere in sec. 1, art. 20 can there be found express alteration or limit of the prohibition contained in secs. 1 and 2 of art. XI, and all municipalities operating under the 20th art. are clearly subject to such limitations.

It is said in 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 399, and heretofore approved by this court:

"It is a general and understood proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers and no others: First, those granted in express words; Second, those necessarily or fairly implied in, or incident to, the powers expressly granted; Third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of power is resolved by the court against the corporation, and the power is denied. Of every municipal corporation the charter or statute by which it is created, is its organic act. Neither the corporation nor its officers can do any act or make any contract or incur any liability not authorized thereby. All acts beyond the scope of the powers granted are void."

From what has been said, it is clear that the declaration in the amendment to the charter, § 355, to the effect that the tunnel will be of local use, and convenience to the public, and is essential to the future growth and welfare of the city and county, cannot prevail as against an express constitutional prohibition of the power therein attempted to be exercised.

Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 537, 45 Pac. 824; 50 Pac. 674, was a case where there was an attempt to violate constitutional limitations similar to ours.

In that case a flume company was the owner of a [27] water supply and system of pipes by which it brought water to the city limits. A water company had pipes and all necessary facilities for distributing water to consumers throughout the city. These two companies entered into an agreement constituting the water company sole agent for the flume company for the sale of its water to the city. The entire distributing plant was then turned over to the city. This was in form of a lease to five citizens of the city, who in turn granted a sub-lease to the city. One of the considerations of the lease was that the water company should cause a railroad to be constructed from the City of San Diego to a point in Mexico. The court held:

"That these reasons, and for these alone, the contract was held invalid by the learned judge of the Superior Court. As to the other objection above stated he says in the opinion referred to: 'While it is very evident from the terms of the contract that the hope that a railroad would be constructed was one of the moving causes for the city authorities entering into the contract, it was not in my opinion a consideration of the contract, but merely a condition subsequent which falls because invalid, without affecting the other provisions of the contract.' And in his conclusions of law he holds: 'That said lease and sublease were not void because the amount agreed to be paid was a subsidy to or in aid of the construction of a railroad.' These conclusions are based upon findings to the effect that the city waived the construction of the railroad, and that neither the city nor its mayor acting in its behalf, was induced to enter into the contract by any promises or representations of the officers or agents of the water company that the railroad would be built."

And again the Supreme Court said: "The result of the foregoing discussion is that the contract of the city with water company is held invalid upon at least two grounds: 1. Because the city was led by the contrivance of the water company to agree to pay, under the name of rent, a subsidy to a railroad; and, 2. Because the mayor had not sufficient authority to execute it on the part of the city."

[28] Counsel for the city cites many cases upon which they rely, and which it seems proper to carefully consider.

Among these is Denver v. Hallett, 34 Colo. 393, 83 Pac. 1066. But that case involved simply whether or not the issuance of bonds by the city for the construction of an auditorium within the city and for public use, was a municipal purpose within the meaning of the laws of the state. The question did not involve that of aid to a private corporation, or any joint ownership or partnership with such person or corporation. It was an entirely different and distinct proposition and can in no way aid in the determination of the case at bar.

I apprehend that if the proposition there, involved an agreement between the city and a private party, wherein the city was to pay two-thirds of the cost, and a private person or corporation was to pay one-third of the cost, with each party reserving the right to separate and different uses of the building, or to different parts thereof, and coupled with the provision that the city should thereafter sell its interest therein to the private party for its own uses, the bond issue could not and would not have been sustained.

From a careful examination of the authorities cited in the able and exhaustive briefs of counsel on both sides of this controversy, and from such examination as we have been able to make in the limited time at our disposal, we do not find one that even hints that it is within the ordinary powers of a municipal corporation to construct an improvement, convenience or necessity with the avowed and declared purpose of selling the same or an interest therein, to a private person or corporation. This seems to be repugnant to every conception of the term; "municipal purpose."

In this case however, counsel contend that the agreement to sell was a mere option. But the city has expressly agreed to sell and convey title to the railroad company for a stipulated price, and the railroad company has agreed to buy and pay the agreed price. This [29] constitutes an executed contract, not an option. But if it were said to be an option, it is still a contract to sell, and for such reason the purpose of the city is the same.

Counsel for the city cite also as tending to sustain the validity of the proposed bond issue, the following cases: Walker v. Cincinnati, 21 Ohio St. 14, 8 Am. Rep. 24; Sun Printing, etc. Assoc. v. New York, 152 N. Y. 257, 46 N. E. 499; 37 L.R.A. 789; Admiral Realty Co. v. New York, 206 N. Y. 110, 90 N. E. 245, Ann. Cas. 1914A 1054; Haeussler v. St. Louis, 205 Mo. 656, 103 S. W. 1034.

Walker v. Cincinnati, supra, involved the validity of an act of the legislature authorizing cities of one hundred and fifty thousand or more inhabitants, under conditions specified in the act, to provide for the construction of a line of railway over terminals, of which one should be within the city.

The specific case was, that the City of Cincinnati voted bonds for the construction of, and did construct a railroad extending from the City of Cincinnati, to the City of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee.

The provision of the Ohio constitution said to be violated was: "The general assembly shall never authorize any county, city, town, or township, by vote of its citizens or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any joint stock company, corporation, or association whatever; or raise money for, or loan its credit to, or in aid of any such company, corporation or association."

It will be seen that the provision of the Colorado constitution is broader and more exclusive than the one stated, in that it denies this power to the state as well as to corporate subdivisions, and uses the terms, "directly," or "indirectly," "in any manner," "public or private," "for any amount," or for "any purpose whatsoever," or "become responsible for any debt," "contract or liability," "in or out of the state," "make any donation to," "grant, or in aid of," "subscribe to," "shareholder in," "joint owner with," etc.

[30] But in that case the purpose of that section of the constitution was distinctly stated to be; "the mischief which this section interdicts is a business partnership between a municipality or subdivision of the state, and individuals or private corporations or associations. It forbids the union of public and private capital or credit, in any enterprise whatever. In no project originated by individuals, whether associated or otherwise, with a view to gain, are the municipal bodies named, permitted to participate in such manner as to incur pecuniary expense or liability. They may neither become stockholders nor furnish money or credit for the benefit of the parties interested therein. Though joint stock companies, corporations and associations only are barred, we do not doubt that the reason of the prohibition would render it applicable to the case of a single individual. The evil would be the same, whether the public suffered from the cupidity of a single person, or from that of several persons associated together."

Such action of the city was there sustained upon the sole ground that it was the exclusive enterprise of the city. This is the view expressed by the same court in later cases, and it was expressly stated in Cincinnati v. Dexter, 55 Ohio St. 93, 44 N. E. 520; that "In Cincinnati v. Walker, the constitutionality of the act is there placed upon the ground that the construction of an improvement of that kind, to be owned exclusively by the municipality, does not involve an alliance of public and private capital or credit, nor constitute a loan of municipal credit to, or raising money for, or in aid of other parties, incorporated, or unincorporated, and, therefore, it is as competent, by legislation to authorize municipal corporations to construct improvements of that nature, and provide means therefor by taxation, when deemed essential to the public interests, as to authorize them to acquire and hold property for other needed public uses, and make other municipal improvements."

In the case of Pleasant Tp. v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 138 U. S. 67, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 864, 11 S. Ct. 215, the [31] court speaking through Mr. Justice Brewer, so recognized the distinction made by the Ohio court in the Cincinnati case. This was a case arising under the provision of the Ohio constitution and under which, aid to a railroad corporation was held to be repugnant.

Discussing the spirit of such a constitutional provision as we are now considering, it was said:

"The significance of its inhibition is read in the evil which it was intended to remedy. Common was the practice, therefore, of issuing municipal bonds to aid in the construction of railroads. The practice was felt to be evil, stimulating unnecessary railroad enterprises, and injuriously affecting the interests of the taxpayer. The universal method of railroad enterprises was through private corporations. The possibility of other methods was unknown, or not seriously contemplated. So, when the people by their constitution prohibited public aid to private corporations, obviously the thought was that all public assistance to the building of railroads was prohibited. The ingenuity of the lawyer and the legislator, by means of which the letter of this prohibition was avoided, and a city enabled to construct a railroad running from itself to other parts of the county, as a great highway of approach and distribution of its business, was obviously not expected or foreseen. We are not criticising the decision in Walker v. Cincinnati, 21 Ohio St. 14, supra, as an erroneous construction of the constitutional provision. We simply note the fact that the statute therein construed was a skillful avoidance of its generally understood scope."

Since the Cincinnati case was decided, the supreme court of Ohio has considered the same question in other cases and in each of these, has denied the validity of a statute authorizing a grant of aid to a railroad corporation. Taylor v. Ross County Com'rs, 23 Ohio St. 22; Wyscaver v. Atkinson, 37 Ohio St. 80; Counterman v. Duplin Tp. 38 Ohio St. 515.

Taylor v. Ross County Com'rs, supra, is a very exhaustive [32] discussion of the question and it was there said, among other things:

"But the tenth section is a constituent part of the plan or method provided by the act for accomplishing its objects. That section provides, that the 'County Commissioners shall have power, and they are hereby authorized, to lease said road, constructed under the provisions of this act, before or after completion, . . . or to sell the same for such compensation and upon such terms as may be agreed upon by said commissioners and lessee or purchaser. . . . Thus, by section ten, it appears the commissioners, or other public authorities operating under the act, are invested with authority to sell or lease the road either before or after completion. It would be within their power to sell what is called the road at any time, certainly after the making of the contract. Now, in such case, what is sold? Substantially the right to use the public bonds to construct a work which becomes the property of the purchaser as fast as it is built."

And again: "The extent of such aid can make no difference. The mandate of the constitution is, that such aid shall never be authorized. Whatever is furnished must be exacted by taxation; and whether the amount be large or small, to recognize the authority under which it is sought to be imposed, would be to deny the protection guaranteed by the constitution to every tax-payer."

In Wyscaver v. Atkinson, supra, after quoting and approving the doctrine of other Ohio cases it was said:

"And I will add, that it make no difference whether the scheme for the union of public and private money or credit, originates with the party or parties representing the public or the private interests. In short, the thing prohibited is the combination in any form whatever of the public funds or credit of any county, city, town or township with the capital of any other person, whether corporate or unincorporated, for the purpose of promoting any enterprise whatever. From these views it is plain that the statute before us manifests an intent to do [33] that indirectly which, if done directly, would constitute a palpable infraction of the constitution, for which reason it must be declared inoperative and void."

Sun Printing, etc. Assoc. v. New York, supra, involved the validity of a statute authorizing cities of over a million inhabitants to construct railroads therein which shall be deemed public highway, at their own expense, etc.

This was a case where the city of New York constructed at its own expense a system of subways for transportation purposes. The city was to own these in perpetuity and to lease the use thereof to a private corporation for a limited term. The subways were to be constructed entirely within the city and for the use of the public therein. The court held that this was not in violation of a constitutional limitation similar to our own, for the reason that the improvement was to be constructed entirely by the city, to be owned by the city and in perpetuity, and that it was not in aid of a private corporation, nor was there any joint ownership, nor mingling of public funds with that of private persons or corporations. But it was held in that case that such a lease by the city in perpetuity, would be in violation of the constitution, and construed the leases proposed, to be for a limited term only.

That case clearly distinguishes the right of a city to construct and perpetually own as its sole property, such a public improvement, from a joint ownership, or, aid of, or the loan of the city's faith or credit to a private corporation.

Speaking of the constitutional inhibition the court said:

"This provision should be construed with reference to the evils it was intended to correct. It first found place in the Constitution in 1874. Prior to this, there had been upon the statute books that which was commonly known as the Town Bonding Act. Under it numerous railroads had been built upon the bonds procured from towns through which they were constructed in return for stock issued by the [34] corporations. The inhabitants of the towns were induced to give their consent through supposed benefits that would result to their property and upon representations that the earnings of the road would provide dividends upon the stock, with which they could pay their bonds. In some instances the bonds were procured and sold and the roads never built. In many other cases the roads in a few years were sold out under foreclosure of mortgages and the stock cut off. So great was the evil and so heavy was the burden upon the towns that relief was sought through a constitutional provision. It was this evil that the provision in question was intended to correct, and with this situation in view it should be construed. There had been, at that time, no attempt on the part of municipalities to construct and own railroads. Such a project had not been publicly promulgated, discussed or contemplated. The towns had subscribed for the stock in private corporations and in most instances they had lost. Hence, the provision that they should not give any money or loan their credit to or in aid of any individual, association, or corporation, or become owners of stock or bonds of any such individual, association or corporation. This was not intended, nor does it prohibit municipalities from constructing their own roads and paying therefor when necessary and authorized by the legislature."

It was further said in that case, that "we do not understand that the views above expressed are in conflict with the Ohio cases. In that state the constitution does not limit municipal expenditures to a city purpose. We do not, however, wish to be understood as approving of these cases, especially in so far as they sustain the right of a city to construct a railroad mainly outside of its own territory and state."

In the case at bar, there is not only the objection that there is a grant of lease in perpetuity, but of an absolute sale of the tunnel itself, reserving only an easement for the possible purpose of conducting water and electricity through it, and which shall in no way interfere [35] with the railroad's exclusive and perpetual use for railway transportation purposes.

The case of Admiralty Realty Co. v. New York, supra, involved the question of the lease of the subways then constructed and owned by the city, and of the construction of additional subways, by the city and to be owned by it; and the lease by the city of all these.

This was no different in principle from the case of Sun Printing, etc. Assoc. v. New York, supra, and it was expressly said:

"It is to be noted that there is no provision that the city shall loan its credit by guaranteeing payment of the bonds by which it is assumed the Interborough Company will raise the money which it is to expend."

The case of Haeussler v. St. Louis, supra, was one which involved an issue of city bonds for the following purpose:

"For the construction and maintenance of a municipal bridge for public use by railroads, street cars, vehicles of all kinds and pedestrians, over and across the Mississippi river and located within the corporate limits of said city of St. Louis, and the state of Illinois, and for the purchase of all lands to be used for approaches in connection therewith, and which said bridge shall at all times, be and forever remain a free bridge; provided, however, the city reserves the right to grant franchises for the use of such bridge for public service purposes, upon such terms and compensation as may be prescribed by ordinance; and, provided further, that no such franchise shall confer an exclusive right in respect to such public service purposes upon the grantee thereof."

This was authorized by a state statute, and by an act of congress permitting one end of the bridge and the approach thereto in the state of Illinois.

But here likewise, the city exclusively was to construct and forever own the bridge, and which was to remain a free bridge forever, with the right of the city to [36] grant franchises but not exclusive, for the use of such bridge for public service purposes.

It was held in that case that this was not in violation of a constitutional provision similar to the one we are discussing and the reason therefor was expressly stated as follows:

"These ordinances in no wise violate the constitutional provisions quoted. Under these ordinances not a dollar is given to any individual or corporation, nor by them has the city become a subscriber to the capital stock of any railroad or other corporation. On the other hand, the city is to be the absolute and sole owner of the proposed public improvement, and is to have the absolute and sole control and management thereof. Similar constitutional provisions in like cases have been discussed by the courts, and in practically every case the holdings are against the contentions of the plaintiffs. Sun Printing etc. Assoc. v. New York, 152 N. Y. 257, 46 N. E. 499, 37 L.R.A. 788; Brooke v. Philadelphia, 162 Pa. St. 123, 29 Atl. 387, 24 L.R.A. 781; South St. Paul v. Lamprecht Bros. Co. 88 Fed. loc. cit. 454, 31 C. C. A. 585; Prince v. Crocker (Boston Subway Case) 166 Mass. 347, 44 N. E. 446, 32 L.R.A. 610; Walker v. Cincinnati, 21 Ohio St. loc. cit. 55, 56, 8 Am. Rep. 24; Pleasant Tp. v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 138 U. S. loc. cit. 74, 11 S. Ct. 215, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 864.

"It may be true that, under the terms of the ordinances and the law, the city can grant to railway and street car corporations the right to use the public highway, so constructed, owned and controlled by it; but that does not change the ownership nor the control. Such is true of every highway controlled by the city. Such privileges can be granted, provided the public way is not seriously impaired for public use."

It should be noted that in no case brought to our attention involving a similar constitutional provision, has the right of a state, city, county, township or other corporate entity of the state, being sustained to aid a private [37] corporation, by means of subscription to stock, the issue of bonds, by joint interest or ownership, or through direction or indirection, or by any means or device whatsoever. Indeed, this question has been so well settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, and appellate courts of the states, that we find no recorded case since that of Pleasant Tp. v. Etna L. Ins. Co. supra, decided in 1891, in which there has been an attempt to violate, or evade such a constitutional limitation, until the present case.

All cases cited as tending to sustain the contention of the city here, are those wherein the municipality is the sole contributor to the enterprise and the sole owner thereof, and in perpetuity. In none of such cases was there commingling of public and private funds, in any form or manner whatsoever. That a city may, with the good faith purpose of constructing or enlarging a municipal water plant, construct a tunnel or other improvement, reasonably necessary to convey its supply of water or an essential part thereof, to the city and at any point beyond the limits of the city, cannot be questioned.

This power is clearly conferred by section one of the 20th article, and has been universally held to exist, as implied within the express power to construct, own and maintain such municipal water plant. But this must be by the municipality alone, and as being a public purpose for which taxes may be levied.

The question presented here is entirely different from that where a city undertakes to construct such a tunnel, with such necessary and good faith purpose, with its own funds, and to be so exclusively owned by the city. But the proposed bond issue here, is clearly both in letter and spirit, within the inhibition of secs. 1 and 2 of art. XI, of the constitution, and is void. So holding, it becomes unnecessary to consider the question concerning the length of time for which such bonds may run.

The judgment is reversed with instruction to overrule the demurrer and proceed in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

[38] GABBERT, J. (dissenting).—At an election held May 20, 1913, section 355 of the charter was adopted by the electors of the city. By this section a tunnel commission was created, and provisions made for the issuance of bonds to raise funds with which to construct the "Moffat Tunnel," and on February 17, last, the taxpayers of the city, voted in favor of issuing such bonds. It is the validity of these bonds which is the subject of inquiry, and the only question involved in this proceeding, and the question thus presented must be determined by ascertaining whether the city, by our fundamental law, the constitution of the state, is without power, or is inhibited to create an indebtedness by the issuance of the bonds in question, for the purposes and under the conditions specified in section 355 supra, and the contract hereafter noticed, in order to raise funds with which to construct the tunnel. The amendment to the charter, section 355, and the authorization of the voters to issue the bonds are legislative acts adopted by the people of Denver under their charter. It is elementary, as often declared by this court, that a legislative act will not be declared unconstitutional, unless it is clearly and palpably so, and, in cases of doubt every intendment will be made in favor of its constitutionality, and that courts will only interfere in cases of clear and unquestioned violations of the fundamental law. In other words, a legislative act must be held constitutional, unless its unconstitutionality is established beyond a reasonable doubt.

The majority opinion declares the city is without authority to authorize the issuance of the bonds involved, because inhibited by sections 1 and 2 article XI of the constitution. With due deference to the majority, it is submitted, that this is not tenable. In substance, so far as material to consider, sections 1 and 2 article XI provide (39) that a city shall not lend or pledge its credit, directly or indirectly in any manner to, or in aid of any corporation for any amount, for any purpose, or become responsible for any debt or liability of any corporation, nor shall it make any donation to, or in aid of any corporation, or become a joint owner with such corporation. That neither of these provisions is violated, is clear when section 355 of the charter, and the contract entered into between the tunnel commission, and the Denver and Salt Lake Railroad Company are analyzed. Section 355 creates a tunnel commission, and confers upon that body all the powers granted to the city by article XX of the constitution, and otherwise existing by operation of law; authorizes the commission to acquire, construct, build, or assist in building, a tunnel through the main range of the Rocky Mountains, in the vicinity of James Peak, and the necessary approaches thereto, to be known as the "Moffat Tunnel," for the purposes of transporting freight, passengers, water, and electricity; provided that in the event the tunnel shall be originally constructed for the transportation of freight and passengers, the right shall be reserved by the city in perpetuity to construct and operate, through such tunnel suitable apparatus for conveying water and electric current from the western to the eastern portal for the use of the inhabitants of the city, and to permit the use of the tunnel, upon a fair and equitable basis, by any and all railway lines desiring such use. It also provides the commission may arrange that a portion of the funds needed for the construction of the tunnel may be furnished by corporations, and that the commission may enter into contracts with such corporations with reference to the construction, control, future lease, sale, or disposition of the tunnel, but expressly provides that until the city shall have been reimbursed in full for all moneys expended by it with interest, and is discharged from all financial liability in connection therewith, it shall retain the ownership of the tunnel, and that the rights reserved to utilize it for the transportation [40] of water and electricity, shall be perpetually retained, notwithstanding any sale or lease of the tunnel. The section then provides that if on investigation the commission shall find that the construction of the tunnel is desirable and feasible, that that body shall determine the amount of bonds necessary to be issued for that purpose, and may by ordinance of the city council, subject to the vote of the taxpaying electors, the proposition of issuing such bonds, and if it is carried, that annually thereafter, a tax shall be levied to raise funds to discharge the interest and the principal of the bonds as they mature, unless suitable provisions for these purposes are otherwise made, and finally declares, "The inhabitants of the City and County of Denver, by the adoption of this Charter Amendment, do find and declare that the said tunnel will, in their judgment be of local use and convenience to the people, and that it is also absolutely essential to the future growth and welfare of the said City and County."

After the adoption of this section the commission entered into a contract with the Denver and Salt Lake Railroad Company, which owns and is operating a line of railroad from Denver west, the salient features of which are as follows: The tunnel shall be constructed by the commission and two thirds of the cost, or three million dollars is to be paid by the city, and one-third by the railroad up to four and one-half million dollars, and the excess above that amount, if any, is to be paid by the company; that the amount to be paid by the company shall be deposited with a depository, to be mutually agreed upon, or secured in a suitable manner; that the company shall pay the interest on the bonds and provide a sinking fund to discharge them at maturity, and that the consideration for the obligations which it thus assumes, is the right to operate and maintain the tunnel for railroad purposes, and ultimately acquire it for this purpose. It requires the railroad company, upon the request of the city, to allow any other railroad company to use the tunnel, and its tracks and facilities for a [41] distance of thirty miles east and a distance seventy-five miles west of the tunnel, upon specified conditions. The contract requires the company to commence work upon the extension of its road from Craig to Salt Lake contemporaneously with the commencement of work upon the tunnel, and complete it within five years after the completion of the tunnel. By the contract the company is given the option on or before the maturity of the bonds, to purchase the tunnel by the payment of the principal of such bonds, and accrued interest thereon, but this option is subject to the perpetual right of the city to transport through the tunnel, water, and electric current, and also subject to the perpetual right reserved by the city to have the tunnel, approaches and tracks outside used by other railroads. In other words, the option extends only to the purchase of the tunnel by the company for its own railroad operation purposes, and does not give the company the right, in the event of such purchase, to interfere with the use of the tunnel by the city for any of the other purposes for which it is to be built by the city. The company is to operate the tunnel for railroad purposes at its own expense. Finally, the contract provides that if the company, after completion or during the construction of the tunnel, fails to pay the interest on the bonds or deposit the necessary amount in the sinking fund, or comply with any other material provision of the contract for three months, it may be terminated by the commission, and all moneys paid by the company thereunder forfeited and held as liquidated damages. It contains other provisions which are not of any moment in determining the validity of the bonds.

From the foregoing synopsis of the provisions of section 355 and the contract, it is apparent that there is not a word or line in either which violates, in letter or spirit, the inhibitions contained in sections 1 and 2, article XI, of the constitution. The city has not loaned or pledged its credit to, or in aid of the railroad company in any amount, or in any manner, for any purpose whatever; it [42] has not become responsible for any debt, contract, or liability of the company, neither has it made any donation or grant to, or in aid of the company. In brief, the construction of the tunnel is undertaken by the city alone for its own benefit, and the tunnel is, and remains its own exclusive property until the option to purchase is exercised. True, the company is to furnish at least one third of the cost of the tunnel, but the city is not obligated to refund the sum thus advanced, and incurs no liability of any kind in connection with such advancement. On the contrary, if the company fails to comply with the obligations imposed upon it by the contract, it forfeits the advancement to the city. The consideration for the advancement by the company is an option to purchase the tunnel, and a lease or license to lay tracks in the tunnel, and operate its trains through the same. It would certainly be an anomalous proposition to say that because the city had undertaken to construct the tunnel it was without authority, for a valuable consideration, to contract in advance to sell or lease it for one of the purposes for which it was constructed. No such inhibition is found in the provisions of the constitution under consideration, and it is impossible, in my opinion, to deduce from either section 355 of the charter, or the contract, that by this arrangement the city has pledged its credit to, or in aid of the company; become responsible for its debts, or made a donation to it. The option to purchase and lease or license given the company is nothing more than the exercise of wise business judgment on the part of the commission, which assures the use of the tunnel for one of the main purposes for which it was designed, and in effect provides for a return upon the investment by the city, until the option to purchase is exercised, and then if exercised, leave such rights in the city as will enable it to require the purchaser to permit the use of the tunnel by other railroad companies, and the other purposes for which it is designed. Nor in the event the company purchases the tunnel, nor under the arrangement existing, until the option to purchase is exercised, is [43] there any joint ownership which the constitution inhibits. The tunnel is the property of the city. It has no interest whatever in the railroad or its operation; this belongs exclusively to the railroad company, and in case it purchases the tunnel its ownership is for a purpose with which the city is in no manner connected. The city will still have the right to use the tunnel for the transportation of water and electricity, but this right belongs to it alone. The joint ownership which the constitution inhibits, is a joint ownership for the same purpose or use. Neither can it be said that because the section provides that the commission may assist in building the tunnel, it thereby lends aid to a corporation which the constitution inhibits, as that would depend upon whether under any contract the commission entered into, by virtue of provision of the section, aid was given contrary to constitutional restrictions. It is therefore manifest that plaintiff in error has not only failed to establish beyond a reasonable doubt, that section 355 of the charter or the contract violate the constitutional provisions under consideration, but it appears clearly and beyond question that they do not.

Suppose the tunnel commission had been given power in the first instance to construct the tunnel at the expense of the city, by the issuance of bonds, and after it had been constructed, had been authorized in a legal manner to enter into a contract with a railroad company, operating a line of road from the city west, to lease the tunnel to the company for railroad purposes, and give it an option to purchase the tunnel, it certainly could not be said that such authority was inhibited by the constitution. Between such an arrangement and the one made there is no difference in effect or principle, except that the commission by entering into the arrangement it has in advance, as authorized to do by section 355, has exercised sound business sense for the reason provision has been made before any money is expended which assures the use of the tunnel for the transportation of freight and passengers; the payment of a valuable consideration upon the [44] money expended, and for a sale which will reimburse the city for all expenditures. Such an arrangement is to be commended, rather than condemned upon the theory that thereby constitutional limitations are violated, when in effect it is simply the exercise of good business judgment.

Counsel for plaintiff in error contends that the city is without power to issue the bonds because a municipal corporation cannot exercise any powers except those expressly granted; or fairly implied as incident to such powers, or those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation. This is a sound proposition of law, but in no sense applicable. Denver is operating under a special charter by virtue of the provisions of article 20 of the constitution. In Walker v. Cincinnati, 21 Ohio St. 14, 14 Am. Rep. 24, an act of the legislature of Ohio which empowered the city to build a railroad from the city to Chattanooga was under consideration. The supreme court of Ohio held, that unless prohibited by the constitution it was within the legitimate scope of legislative power to authorize a city to construct a railroad in which it had a special interest. In this connection it should be noted, that Judge Dillon in his work on municipal corporations, from which counsel for plaintiff in error have quoted extensively, says in effect that in the absence of special restrictive constitutional provisions, it is competent for the legislature to authorize a municipal corporation to construct railways in which such corporation has a special interest, and impose upon its citizens taxes for that purpose. If Denver could construct a railroad to Salt Lake, including the tunnel, clearly it may construct one of the important links in the line, namely, the tunnel alone, on its own account, and in consideration of a railroad company aiding in constructing it, give such company a lease and option to purchase. Otherwise the tunnel would not benefit the city. Our own court has repeatedly held that the object of article XX was to confer upon the people of Denver, not only the powers expressly mentioned in that article, but every [45] power the legislature theretofore possessed in making a charter for Denver.

It was upon the basis that the people of the city of Denver possessed power to legislate with respect to charter provisions that we held in the Auditorium case (Denver v. Hallett, 34 Colo. 303, 83 Pac. 1066), it was within the power of the people of the city of Denver to provide by charter for the erection of an auditorium, and to issue bonds to discharge the indebtedness for that purpose, for the reason that the people of the city possessed the power to legislate on this subject. That is precisely the situation in the case at bar. Authority has been conferred upon the tunnel commission to build the Moffat tunnel, through legislation by the people of the city, which they have the power to enact. They have provided for the issuance of bonds for this purpose; they have declared that the tunnel will be of local use and convenience to the people, and that it is absolutely essential to the future growth and welfare of the city. It is manifest from the topography of the country west of the city, the necessities of the city, and the beneficial results which will follow the construction of the tunnel that these declarations have ample foundation upon which to base them. If the city could build an auditorium, which it was evident was not necessary for any municipal purpose, in the ordinary meaning of that term, and could not result in any financial benefit to the people of the city, except as it would serve to attract national conventions of various organizations which might meet here at long intervals of time, it certainly cannot be successfully asserted that the electors of Denver may not make provision by appropriate legislation, to construct a tunnel for the transportation of freight and passengers which will be of benefit to the people every day in the year.

Counsel for defendants in error contend that special authority is conferred upon the city to construct the tunnel under article XX of the constitution. It is unnecessary to discuss this question, as it is clear the city is not inhibited from constructing such tunnel by that section.

[46] Counsel for plaintiff in error suggest that some portions of section 355 are invalid because they undertake to empower the city to engage in business which it cannot be permitted to engage in. In answer to this it is only necessary to say, that where a part of an act is unconstitutional it does not vitiate the part that is good, when the good and bad can be clearly separated, and the good is complete in itself, and does not depend upon the void portion. They also urge that the section violates section 8, of article XI of the constitution. In the opinion of the writer this contention is not tenable.

In my opinion the judgment of the district court sustaining the validity of the bonds should be affirmed.

NOTE.

Power of Municipality to Enter into Partnership Contract for Construction of Improvement.

The few cases passing on the point are in accord in holding that a contract whereby a municipality engages jointly with a private individual or corporation in the construction of an improvement for joint use is invalid as a loan of the municipal credit for private benefit. Armstrong Realty Co. v. New York, 206 N. Y. 110, Ann. Cas. 1914A 1054, 99 N. E. 241 (affirming Hopper v. Wilcox, 76 Misc. 345, 135 N. Y. S. 384; Admiral Realty Co. v. New York, 151 App. Div. 888, 135 N. Y. S. 1097, and Ryon v. Wilcox, 151 App. Div. 890, 135 N. Y. S. 1140); Alter v. Cincinnati, 56 Ohio St. 47, 46 N. E. 69, 35 L.R.A. 737. See also the reported case. In several cases there are dicta to the same effect. Garland v. Montgomery County, 87 Ala. 223, 6 So. 402; Atkinson v. Ada County, 18 Idaho 282, 108 Pac. 1046, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 412; Walker v. Cincinnati, 21 Ohio St. 14, 8 Am. Rep. 24; Wyscaver v. Atkinson, 37 Ohio St. 80; Cincinnati v. Dexter, 55 Ohio St. 93, 44 N. E. 520; Brode v. Philadelphia, 230 Pa. St. 434, 79 Atl. 59; Colburn v. Chattanooga Western R. Co. 94 Tenn. 43, 28 S. W. 219. In Alter v. Cincinnati, supra, an action brought to test the constitutionality of a statute known as the waterworks act, which in effect was interpreted to authorize the city to enter into a joint enterprise with private corporations, it was declared that such a legislative provision was unconstitutional in that it sanctioned the commingling of public and private capital in contravention of the constitution. The disputed statute read as follows: "Section 8. If said commissioners should deem it inexpedient or inadvisable to proceed under section 7 of this act; then, in order to provide for the construction of water-works, if there be none existing, or for the enlargement, improvement or addition to existing water-works, said commissioners are hereby authorized to contract, in the name of the city, with any person, company, or corporation, their successors or assigns, for the construction of such works, or such enlargements, extensions, improvements or additions, as an entirety, in accordance with the surveys, plans and specifications that may be adopted, and for the exclusive privilege of connecting such enlargements, extensions, improvements, or additions to the existing water-works, and for a lease on behalf of such city of such water-works of such enlargements, extensive improvements or additions to the same; from the person, company or corporation, their successors or assigns so constructing the same, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, and may by said contract or lease, pledge the income of such water-works as so constructed and enlarged, to secure the payment of the rentals provided in said lease. And said commissioners are hereby authorized to convey to such person, company or corporation, their successors or assigns, any property or rights acquired, or which may become necessary to acquire, under the provisions of section 6 of this act or authorize the use of any property which may be necessary to enable the said person, company or corporation, their successors or assigns, to complete the construction or enlargements, extensions, improvements or additions to existing water-works, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon; provided, however, that no such lease shall be made for a longer period than forty years, renewable forever, with the right reserved to said city, upon six months' notice in writing, at the end of each period of ten years, or at such shorter period as may be agreed upon during the term of said lease, to purchase said water-works, or the enlargements, extensions, improvements, and additions to the water-works, under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon in said contract; and provided, further, that in making such contract, said commissioners shall be governed by all the statutes now in force relative to competitive bidding, and the making of contracts. And provided further, that if said commissioners enter into said contract and lease, as herein provided for, then said work shall be operated, managed and conducted by such city as provided by law." The court said: "The serious question is, whether this section eight is constitutional. Section six of article eight of the constitution is as follows: 'The general assembly shall never authorize any county, city, town or township, by vote of its citizens, or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any joint stock company, corporation or association whatever, or to raise money for or loan its credit to, or in aid of, any such company, corporation or association.' . . . This section of the constitution not only prohibits a 'business partnership,' which carries the idea of a joint or undivided interest, but it goes further and prohibits a municipality from being the owner of part of a property which is owned and controlled in part by a corporation or individual. The municipality must be the sole owner and controller of the property in which it invests its public funds. A union of public and private funds or credit each in aid of the other, is forbidden by the constitution. There can be no union of public and private funds or credit, nor of that which is produced by such funds or credit. The whole ownership and control must be in the public. The city may lease from an individual or corporation any property of which it may need the use, or having property the use of which it does not need, it may lease the same to others, but it cannot engage in an enterprise with an individual or corporation for the construction or erection of a property which, as a completed whole, is to be owned and controlled in part by the city, and in part by an individual or corporation. . . . It will be noticed by a careful reading of section eight, that the water-works and the enlargements will be owned by the person, company or corporation constructing them, that the existing water-works are owned by the city, that to these water-works so owned by the city, an individual or corporation may make enlargements, extensions, improvements and additions to be owned by the person or corporation making them, and to be connected with the existing works, and to be leased to the city upon such terms as may be agreed upon. When the enlargements, extensions, improvements and additions shall be thus made, completed and connected with the existing water-works so owned by the city, the enlargements, extensions, improvements and additions, together with the existing works, all taken together, will constitute one completed whole—one water-works system, one water-works—owned in part by the city, and in part by the individual or corporation, and thereby the union of public and private capital and funds in one enterprise will become complete. The provision that the works shall be operated, managed and conducted by the city, does not relieve the matter, because before the city can operate the works, it must first obtain a lease upon such terms as may be agreed upon, and that puts it beyond the power of the city to operate and control the works as sole proprietor. It would be a joining of two properties owned by different parties, together, to make one property, the parts owned by each being necessary to the successful operation of the whole, and each owner having his say as to the terms and conditions upon which the whole should be operated. The existing water works would be so tied to the extensions as to be dependent upon them, and the extensions would be so tied to the existing works as to be of but little value without them. It is this close connection and dependence one upon the other that constitutes both together as a single whole, and makes a union of public and private funds and credit. The existing works are to be connected with the new improvements, and are thereby to lend aid to the person, company or corporation making and owning such new improvements. The case is not like a city leasing a building or water-works plant owned by another, because in such case the leased property, would stand upon its own merits, and would not, before or after the lease, become merged into the other property of the city so that the whole would become one property, and make the property of the city dependent upon the leased property for its value and utility. Whether the city has the right to appropriate private property, for the sole purpose of selling the same to a private person, company or corporation, as provided in the sixth and eighth sections, may well be doubted. We regard the eighth section of the act as clearly in conflict with section six of article eighth of the constitution, and therefore void." And in Admiral Realty Co. v. New York, 206 N. Y. 110, Ann. Cas. 1914A 1054, 99 N. E. 241 (affirming Hopper v. Wilcox, 76 Misc. 345, 135 N. Y. S. 384; Admiral Realty Co. v. New York 151 App. Div. 888, 135 N. Y. S. 1097, and Ryon v. Wilcox, 151 App. Div. 890, 135 N. Y. S. 1140), wherein it appeared the city of New York entered into a contract with certain private corporations for the construction of subways, the court held that the terms of the contract did not warrant the conclusion that the relation between the city of New York and the traction company was a partnership but was that of lessor and lessee and on this basis the contracts were upheld. The court intimated several times in the course of its decision that if the circumstances were such as to support the conclusion of the existence of a partnership transaction then the contracts could not be sustained. Thus it was said: "In attacking these contracts much is said about a joint ownership of property, about the speculative partnership between the municipality and the railroad company and about the obnoxious pooling of the proceeds derived from the joint operation of municipal and privately owned property. While these arguments indirectly are entirely pertinent and legitimate, we must not allow them to obscure the exact and only question presented to us in this connection." And in distinguishing the case from that of Alter v. Cincinnati, supra, the court said: "When we keep in mind that under the Brooklyn contract, most favorable for the appellants' argument, the municipality and the private corporation each retains the title to and ownership of its property, and that the only joinder of the two is under a contract for joint operation for a limited period, we see that this comes far from presenting a situation such as was held to be illegal in Alter v. Cincinnati, 56 Ohio St. 47, which of the Ohio decisions cited by the appellants is especially relied on. In that case the court had before it for consideration a constitutional provision not unlike that now before us as affecting the validity of a statute for the construction and extension of water-works by municipalities. In brief this statute provided that a municipality and a private owner might become the joint owners of indivisible interests in a single water system, and this was condemned by the court." In an opinion by Chief Justice Cullen in the same case wherein he dissented as to the nature of the contract in question the rule was more emphatically stated as follows: "That this contract creates a partnership, and a very one-sided partnership at that, between the city and the railroad company seems to me entirely clear. Indeed, it is so denominated by the railroad company in its proposals to the city. That if the agreement was between private individuals or corporations it would create a partnership is settled law, because the parties are entitled to share in the profits as such (Manhattan Brass, etc. Co. v. Sears, 45 N. Y. 797; Burnett v. Snyder, 81 N. Y. 550, 555; Leggett v. Hyde, 58 N. Y. 272), though it must be conceded that the city's chance of sharing is somewhat remote. But it is contended, assuming that a partnership is created, that there is no violation of the constitutional provision. The learned judge who decided the case at Special Term has written: 'The city does not give its property, it leases it; the city does not guarantee the yearly $6,335,000, for it does not pledge its credit that this amount will be realized; leasing property, even if the lease be so valuable as to enable the lessee to borrow on it, is not lending the lessor's credit to the lessee, and finally there is no express prohibition in the constitution against mingling public and private property, or against a partnership.' I am constrained to differ with the court on each of these propositions. I have already shown that a gift of property may be as easily made by a lease as by a conveyance of a fee. It seems that there are in this state leases for 990 years at an annual rent of three peppercorns. (Elmira v. Dunn, 22 Barb. (N.Y.) 402.) Who is the real owner of the property, the landlord or the tenant? The gift of the use for a year of a building renting for twenty thousand dollars annually is greater than the gift of the fee of a building worth only ten thousand dollars. Equally clear is it that a city may loan its money or credit to a corporation without guaranteeing its bonds or other obligations. It is urged that the constitutional inhibition is against loaning money or credit, but not against loaning property. Even that technical argument fails in this case because the agreements to spend the money to build the subway and to lease it, when built are, but interdependent parts of a single and entire contract. If, therefore, the terms of the lease are such that the use of the property is given in aid of the corporation, the money which the city agrees to expend to create the property is equally so given. So, also, while the word partnership is not mentioned in the constitutional inhibition, it is as clearly condemned as if named, for the inhibition is in terms so comprehensive as necessarily to include partnerships. In every partnership the credit of each partner is pledged so far as the common venture is concerned in aid of each of his copartners, except in a special partnership, and there the capital contributed by the special partner is equally pledged for the same purpose. On this last proposition authority is not wanting."

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court of Alberta.

Action for damages. Franklin Seaford Jackson, plaintiff, and Canadian Pacific Railway, defendants. Judgment for plaintiff in trial court. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court of Alberta. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. APPEAL DISMISSED.

O. M. Biggar, K.C. and Geo. A. Walker for appellant.

Frank Ford, K.C. and G. M. Blackstock for respondent.

Geo. A. Walker, solicitor for appellant.

Mahaffy & Blackstock, solicitors for respondent.

[232]. THE CHIEF JUSTICE.—The respondent, an engine-driver in the employ of the appellant company, was severely injured whilst in the performance of his duty. The jury found the appellant "guilty of negligence from the fact that the mail crane was in faulty condition and that the plaintiff was injured by it in the performance of his duty." They awarded the plaintiff $27,000 damages.

I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion the amount of the damages is too large. There is, however, a general consensus of authority that it is for the jury alone to fix the amount of damages to be awarded in an action and that under ordinary circumstances the verdict should not be set aside merely on the ground that the damages appear excessive. Where the damages are manifestly so unreasonable that no body of twelve men could have honestly given such a sum, or where it is shewn that in arriving at the amount the jury took into consideration something which they ought not to have taken, or failed to take into consideration something which they ought to have taken, there may be ground for the court to set aside the verdict. It is not, however, a ground [233] for interference that the damages seem to the court too large and more than would to most people have seemed ample.

One might assume that the jury have not sufficiently taken into account the accidents of life, and that they probably misapprehended the effect of the figures in the actuarial tables produced, but, with all respect, I do not think that is sufficient to justify us in granting a new trial on the ground that the jury have gone beyond a figure which any jury of reasonable men properly informed as to the question which they were to decide could have reached.

In Thoms v. Caledonian R. Co. [1912-13] Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 804, Lord Kinnear said:

"Now it is impossible to read the account of this man's history and his present position without seeing that no amount of damages could ever be considered as real compensation for the personal injury he has suffered. It is obvious that that is not a consideration which can be pressed to any logical conclusion because the result of it would be that the defender, in a case of personal injury, might be ruined, and yet the pursuer not compensated. And, therefore, that cannot be treated as a ground for any exact or logical estimate of damage, but I think it is a consideration which may fairly lead us to think that, upon a question of this kind a larger latitude, within the bounds of reason, is to be allowed to a jury than upon matters which are capable of anything like exact calculation.

The same might well be said of the respondent in the case as it comes before us.

This court held in Fraser v. Drew, 30 Can. Sup. Ct. 241, that where a case has been properly submitted to a jury and their findings upon the facts are such as might be the conclusions of reasonable men, a new trial will not be granted on the ground that the jury misapprehended or misunderstood the evidence, notwithstanding that the trial judge was dissatisfied with the verdict.

[284] The case of The Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. Roy, decided in this court in November, 1913, might be consulted with advantage. On that appeal the only question pressed was as to the amount of the damages.

That the damages were excessive, was the only ground for setting aside the judgment that was urged by the appellant at the argument before us. I do not think the damages, though undoubtedly high, are so excessive as to warrant the interference of this court on that ground. I do think, however, that the trial judge did not direct the jury as fully as was desirable as to the measure of damages which the plaintiff was entitled to recover. True, he told them that they were not to award punitive damages, but the instruction would, I think, have been more intelligible to lawyers than to a jury of laymen. I cannot help thinking that the amount of the damages awarded indicates that the jury did not properly appreciate the considerations on which they had to assess these damages.

There is yet another serious objection to this judgment being allowed to stand. Although, as I have said, the amount of the damages was the only question discussed, on the hearing before this court, the notice of appeal by the defendants to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta claims that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants.

Now there was, I think, misdirection by the learned judge at the trial. After referring to the [285] order of the Board of Railway Commissioners, dated the 20th November, 1908, which provides that "such crane must be erected at a distance of not less than 7' 1½" . . . in position" (i. e., from the centre of the track), he continues—"that briefly is the allegation of negligence on the part of the plaintiff that this crane was erected or allowed to be closer to the track than the order of the Board of Railway Commissioners provided. That question I must leave to you, whether or not that crane was permitted to be closer to the centre of the track than the order provides for. That is the question which you must determine." And further on he says:

"The defendants in this case would be liable for the acts of their servants or workmen if they did construct this crane closer to the track than the order of the Board of Railway Commissioners provided."

It may perhaps be assumed that the order was passed for the protection of railway employees in the position of the plaintiff, though, of course, unless this were so, he could advance no claim founded upon it. The judge, however, did not instruct the jury that they must not only find a breach of the statutory duty, but also that this was the cause of the accident.

The failure to give such a necessary instruction was the main reason why the Privy Council directed a new trial in the case of Grank Trunk R. Co. v. McAlpine [1918] A. C. (Eng.) 838, Ann. Cas. 1914A 532. At page 846 the judgment reads:

"Where a statutory duty is imposed upon a railway company in the nature of a duty to take precautions for the safety of persons lawfully travelling in its carriages, crossing its line, or frequenting its premises, they will be responsible in damages to a member of any one of these classes who is injured by their negligent omission to discharge, or secure the discharge of, that duty properly, but the injury must be caused by the negligence of the company or its servants.

"In the last passage quoted from the charge of the learned judge [286] in the present case, he did not point out to the jury that it was necessary, in order that the plaintiff should recover, that the omission to whistle or to give the warning, or both combined, and not the folly and recklessness of the plaintiff himself, caused the accident. For all that appears, the omission to whistle might not have contributed in any way to the happening of the accident. The jury, instructed as they were, may well have been under the impression that the two alleged breaches by the company of its statutory duties—the two faults of which the jury found them guilty—rendered them liable whether or not those faults caused to any extent the injury to the plaintiff or the contrary.

"These are, in the main, the reasons which led their Lordships to the conclusion that a new trial should be directed."

In precisely the same way in the present case the jury, instructed as they were, may have concluded that the breach by the defendants of the order of the Board of Railway Commissioners, of the 20th November, 1908, rendered them liable whether this fault caused the injury to the plaintiff or the contrary.

Though, for these reasons, I am of opinion that there was misdirection of the jury, yet as the appellant has not raised the point I do not think this court should send the action for a new trial on this ground. The respondent ought to have had an opportunity to argue that the verdict shews, as perhaps it does, that the jury were not misled by the misdirection and that no substantial injustice has been caused thereby.

Though I find much that is unsatisfactory about the conduct of this trial and its results, I cannot say that there is sufficient ground for setting aside the judgment. I have not come to this conclusion without much hesitation, and I think it would be unfortunate if the case were to be regarded as any precedent for awarding such enormous damages in similar actions in the future.

BRINGTON, J.—This is an appeal on the ground of excessive damages. There is nothing else put forward [287] to support it except the untenable objection to evidence admitted to shew how much an annuity might be purchased for. This practice of using such evidence to help a jury in arriving at a reasonable estimate has been in daily use for many years in our courts.

The objection that because a man called to testify what his company held to be the market price could not vouch for the accuracy of the tables upon which it and such life companies proceed, therefore the evidence was inadmissible, seems to me as unsound as it would be to object to the evidence of actuaries resting their estimate upon the basis of the "Carlisle Tables," for example, because none of them can vouch personally for the accuracy of the figures upon which such tables rest. The truth is the evidence which was adduced was of little value and made nothing of by the learned trial judge or the jury so far as we can see, but that is quite another thing and furnishes no ground for setting aside the trial, which seems to have been eminently fair.

It is impossible to say there was a miscarriage of justice by reason of anything connected therewith.

To come to the real ground of appeal resting upon excessive damages it may be admitted the damages are large and possibly larger than we as a jury would have assessed.

But can we say they are such as to demonstrate that the jury must necessarily have proceeded upon an erroneous basis or been moved by some indirect motives in arriving thereat?

The almost uniform course of this court has been to refuse to interfere with the mere assessment of [288] damages when maintained by the local court having usually an immense advantage over us in the way of fairly appreciating the damages which must be measured in light of many local conditions.

But I must respectfully decline to accept the suggestion of counsel for appellant, and apparently some of the judges below, that the possibilities of a permanent investment producing eight per cent. per annum forms a proper basis of estimating the value of this verdict simply because that may be a fair rate of interest at the present moment.

We all know, if we can recall the economic history of other provinces, that this will not continue. And some other arguments put forward by counsel and in a measure countenanced in the court of appeal seem to me untenable.

It seems, for example, assumed, as matter of course, that the earnings of the respondent at the time of the accident must be taken as basis for life. They are properly taken in ordinary cases as basis of estimating pecuniary loss of a temporary character. But in the case of a young man only thirty-two years of age, when probably earnings would increase, being disabled for life, there is no rule of law preventing the jury from contemplating the possibilities of the future in that regard.

Again, it was even suggested that the pain and suffering of him injured could not enter into the basis of the estimate of compensation. I dissent entirely from any such proposition. Physical and mental pain and suffering have always, by law, entered into the basis of such estimates, and when these must endure for a lifetime, or the victim be reduced to the deplorable condition of the respondent, it is hard to place [289] the limit of an adequate compensation therefor. And the possible need of attendance to help and comfort him in decay may also be considered.

It is quite true that in cases resting upon the "Fatal Accidents Act," pain and suffering are excluded from the basis of the estimate for damages. In such cases the estimate must be confined to the mere monetary considerations bearing upon the case of survivors who have suffered in a monetary sense as well as otherwise by the death of him upon whom they were dependent for the deprivation of what they might reasonably have hoped to enjoy.

No such rule obtains in the case of him suffering and suing for such damages as caused thereby.

We may yet hear it urged that a man reduced to the impotent condition in which respondent, a young man with the prospects before him of increasing his earnings and savings and thereby adding to the comfort of his life and enjoyment thereof, when so reduced ought to be treated as a helpless creature who can enjoy life no longer and hence might as well be kept, or keep himself in some asylum or house of refuge for a few cents a day, and thereby ameliorate the sad condition of the unfortunate offender in the like position the appellant is now in.

I prefer resting as usual upon the broad common sense of an intelligent jury as being more likely to fix justly the amount which the wrongdoer should pay than to look for justice in anything which might be determined in a very logical way either thus or otherwise.

The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

[290] DUFF, J. (dissenting).—With respect I am unable to concur in dismissing the appeal. While the charge of the learned trial judge is not in any way open to exception I have been unable to satisfy myself, after considering the whole of the evidence, that a jury appreciating the evidence and making due allowance for the risk of accident (negligence apart) in a hazardous pursuit, would have given the verdict now before us.

There is, of course, no difference of opinion as regards the principle; which is well settled. The facts are carefully considered in the judgment of Mr. Justice Beck and it is unnecessary to repeat what he has said.

I think there should be a new trial.

ANGELL, J.—Having regard to all the circumstances of this case—the plaintiff's earning capacity prior to his injury, his comparative youth, the pain and suffering to which he was subjected, his probable total incapacity for work in the future, and the inconvenience, discomfort and unhappiness which his condition is likely to entail during the rest of his life—it is, in my opinion, not possible to say that the verdict in this case is so excessive that it is apparent that the jury must have been influenced by views and considerations to which they should not have given effect; Johnston v. Great Western R. Co. [1904] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 250; Cox v. English, etc. Bank [1905] A. C. (Eng.) 168. If the only element of damage were the plaintiff's actual pecuniary loss, it might be argued with great force that an attempt had been made to award him full and [291] complete compensation; and when the loss to be compensated for has a money value capable of precise ascertainment there is no good reason why that should not be done. But with such other elements of damage, as I have indicated, present, which must be taken into account, while the jury should not attempt to give full compensation, it is almost impossible to say that an amount awarded short of what would distinctly shock the conscience, it so great that a new trial should be ordered purely on the ground of its excess.

The admission of evidence as to the expectation of life of a person of the plaintiff's age and as to the cost of an annuity equal to his income is made a ground of appeal. The objection is based on the alleged lack of qualification of a witness who gave this evidence and the misleading character of the evidence itself.

Standard mortuary tables shewing the expectancy of life and the cost of an annuity at given ages are admissible in evidence; Rowley v. London, etc. R. Co. L. R. 8 Exch. (Eng.) 221; Vicksburg, etc. R. Co. v. Putnam, 118 U. S. 545, 7 S. Ct. 1, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 257. The appreciation of the value to be put upon such tables in any particular case may always be affected by appropriate cross-examination and by directing the attention of the jury, by other relevant evidence and by argument, to considerations calculated to lead to the conclusion that the plaintiff's expectation of life should be regarded as less than the average and that his continued receipt during the full period of his expectation of life of the income which he enjoyed when injured was subject to many contingencies.

If a witness called can verify a mortuary table produced [292] in evidence as one in actual use by a company dealing in that class of business I do not understand it to be the law that he must possess knowledge sufficient to enable him to explain the basis on which the table was prepared or to give an opinion worth something as to its reliability or correctness in order to render his evidence, quantum valeat, admissible. No doubt such tables are not conclusive and the jury should be warned to take into account the contingencies to which the continued receipt of his income by the plaintiff would have been subject had he not met with the injury for which he sues. In the present case those contingencies were called to the attention of the jury by the learned trial judge by reading a passage from a judgment in which they were referred to. He was not asked further to emphasize them or specially to warn the jury against attaching too much weight to the evidence now objected to. No doubt its value had been fully discussed by counsel for the defendant in his address. No objection was taken either at the trial, in the notice of appeal to the Appellate Division, or in the appellant's factum in this court to the accuracy or sufficiency of the charge itself. At bar counsel suggested non-direction only; Creveling v.

Canadian Bridge Co. 51 Can. Sup. Ct. 216. Misdirection upon any aspect of the case was not even hinted at.

The verdict is, no doubt, large, but a case has not been made for interfering with it or for ordering a new assessment of damages, which, if an experience not uncommon should be repeated, might not result favourably to the defendants.

The appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

[293] BRODEUR, J.—The only question in this case is whether a new trial should be granted because the amount granted by the jury for damages is excessive.

It is a railway accident. The plaintiff (respondent) was a locomotive engineer, an employee of the appellant company. He seems to have been incapacitated for life. He was earning a sum of about $2,100 a year. There was not much evidence given as to the damages, which should be granted and the verdict was for the sum of $27,000.

I am inclined to think that the amount is excessive, and if I had been on the jury I would certainly not have given so large a sum. But the charge to the jury seems to have been fair and it was for them to decide as to the amount.

I am sorry that we have to accept their verdict. It is to be expected that some day legislation will be passed in the provinces, where it does not exist now, by which those verdicts could be reduced by the courts of appeal.

In the circumstances, I cannot do otherwise than to dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

NOTE

The reported case sustains a verdict awarding $27,000 damages for personal injuries whereby the plaintiff, a railroad engineer thirty-two years old, earning $2,100 a year, was totally incapacitated from labor for life. The several judges, concurring in the decision refer to the damages as "too large," and "possibly larger than we as a jury would have assessed," but lay down the rule that an appellate court should not interfere with the amount of the damages awarded unless "the damages are manifestly so unreasonable that no body of twelve men could have honestly given such a sum." The cases discussing what is an excessive verdict in an action for personal injuries not resulting in death are reviewed in detail in the notes to Cleveland, etc. R. Co. v. Hadley, 16 Ann. Cas. 1 and Ruck v. Milwaukee Brewery Co. Ann. Cas. 1913A 1956.

PEOPLE

v.

TOMLINS.

New York Court of Appeals—December 15 1914.

216 N. Y. 240; 167 N. E. 496.

Self-defense — Duty to Retreat — Person Assaulted in His Dwelling.

The owner of a dwelling attacked therein is not bound to flee, but may stand his ground and kill his assailant; this being the rule both at common law and under Penal Law (Consol. Laws, c. 40) § 1055.

[See note at end of this case.]

Criminal Law — Review — Necessity of Exception.

Code Cr. Proc. § 528, declares that, in case of a death sentence, the Court of Appeals may order a new trial, if justice requires it, though no exception was taken. No exception was reserved to an instruction charging that accused, whose assailant attacked him in his dwelling house, should have retreated. Accused claimed self-defense, and admitted, on cross-examination, that if he had fled from his house he would have been safe. Held, that a conviction of murder in the first degree must be reversed, though no exception was reserved to the instruction, for it deprived accused of all benefits of his plea of self-defense.

Appeal from Trial Term of Supreme Court, Rockland county.

Criminal action. Newton Tomlins convicted of murder in first degree and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Frank Comesky for appellant.

Thomas Gagen for respondent.

[241] CASBOZO, J.—The defendant shot and killed his son, a young man of twenty-two. The shooting took place on August 26, 1913, in the little cottage in Stony Point where the son had been born and reared. On the trial, the father maintained that he had acted without premeditation, when blinded by passion because of blows and insults. He maintained also that he had acted justifiably, in lawful self-defense. It will not be helpful to state the details of the tragedy. It is enough to say that the verdict of murder in the first degree is sustained by ample proof. We have, therefore, only to inquire whether there was material error in the court's statement of the law. The jury were properly instructed that homicide in self-defense is not justifiable unless there is reasonable ground to apprehend a design on the part of the person slain to commit a felony, or to do some great personal injury to the slayer, and unless also there is reasonable ground [242] to apprehend that the danger is imminent. These instructions were coupled, however, with a statement that it was the defendant's duty, if possible, to retreat and escape. "A man," said the court, "has no right to resort to force and violence against another, even where the danger is imminent, even where he has reasonable cause to believe that he is in danger, unless he has no reasonably safe means of escape and retreat. Before a man can use force and violence under the law for his own protection, the danger must be imminent; he must have reasonable cause for believing that the danger exists; and then he must be so situated, he must be in such a position, that he cannot safely retreat. That is the law, gentlemen. We may not feel always like retreating in the face of an attack; it may not seem manly to us, but it is the law that if a man can safely retreat, and thereby escape a conflict with another, he must do so, even though it may not seem dignified and manly. To justify this defendant, applying the law to this case, in shooting his son, or shooting at him, or using any force against him, he must have had reasonable cause for believing, not that the boy some time in the future might do something against him, but he must have had reasonable cause for believing that the boy right then, when he came down those stairs and landed on the kitchen floor, was about to attack him. Even then, he would have had no right to use a weapon, or any other force, if he could have gotten away from danger by retreating, if he could have gotten off the porch, and gone across the lot, and down the road, or around the house, or anywhere, to a place of safety, then the law says that he should have done so, and that he had no right to use the weapon against his son, unless all reasonable means of retreating were cut off, and the boy was threatening him with bodily injury, or putting his life in danger."

We think that these instructions are erroneous as [243] applied to the case at bar. The homicide occurred in the defendant's dwelling. It is not now, and never has been the law that a man assailed in his own dwelling is bound to retreat. If assailed there, he may stand his ground, and resist the attack. He is under no duty to take to the fields and the highways, a fugitive from his own home. More than two hundred years ago it was said by Lord Chief Justice Hale (1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 486): "In case a man is assailed in his own house, he 'need not fly as far as he can, as in other cases of se defendendo, for he hath the protection of his house to extrise him from flying, for that would be to give up the possession of his house to his adversary, by his flight." Flight is for sanctuary and shelter, and shelter, if not sanctuary, is in the home. That there is, in such a situation, no duty to retreat is, we think, the settled law in the United States as in England. It was so held by the United States Supreme Court in Beard v. U. S. 158 U. S. 550, 15 S. Ct. 962, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 1086. In that case there was a full review of the authorities, and the rule was held to extend not merely to one's house but also to the surrounding grounds. That case has been followed by the same court in later decisions. (Alberty v. U. S. 162 U. S. 499, 16 S. Ct. 864, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 1051; Rowe v. U. S. 164 U. S. 546, 557, 17 S. Ct. 172, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 547.) The same rule is enforced in Michigan (Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150; People v. Keuhn, 93 Mich. 619, 53 N. W. 721); in New Jersey (State v. Zellers, 7 N. J. L. 220); in Vermont (State v. Patterson, 45 Vt. 308, 12 Am. Rep. 200); in Wisconsin (State v. Martin, 30 Wis. 216, 11 Am. Rep. 567); in Alabama (Green v. State, 96 Ala. 29, 11 So. 478); in Georgia (Haynes v. State, 17 Ga. 465); in Florida (Wilson v. State, 30 Fla. 234, 11 So. 556, 17 L.R.A. 654); in Ohio (State v. Peacock, 40 Ohio St. 333); in North Carolina (State v. Taylor, 82 N. C. 554); and in other jurisdictions. It is also stated as undoubted law in all the leading treatises. (1. Wharton Crim. Law, sec. 633; 1 Bishop's Crim. Law, secs. 858, 859; 3 Russell on Crimes 207, 213; 2 East Pleas of the Crown 372; Foster's Crown Cases, c. 3, p. 273.) The rule is the same whether the attack proceeds from some other occupant or [244] from an intruder. It was so adjudged in Jones v. State, 76 Ala. 8, 14. "Why," it was there inquired, "should one retreat from his own house, when assailed by a partner or co-tenant, any more than when assailed by a stranger who is lawfully upon the premises? Whither shall he flee, and how far, and when may he be permitted to return?" We think that the conclusion there reached is sustained by principle, and we have not been referred to any decision to the contrary. The duty to retreat, as defined in the charge of the trial judge, is one applicable to cases of sudden affray or chance medley, to use the language of the early books. (Blackstone Com. bk. IV, ch. XIV; East Pleas of the Crown, supra; Russell on Crimes, supra; People v. Fiori, 123 App. Div. 174, 188, 108 N. Y. Supp. 416.) We think that if the situation justified the defendant as a reasonable man in believing that he was about to be murderously attacked, he had the right to stand his ground.

The cases in this court relied on by counsel for the People hold nothing to the contrary. People v. Sullivan, 7 N. Y. 396, is referred to as a case where the homicide was in the defendant's dwelling. The murdered man and the defendant lived in a boarding house. Their rooms were on different floors. The affray started in the defendant's room. The two men separated, and the defendant's victim went down stairs. At the foot of the stairs he turned and went back. The defendant, instead of taking shelter in his own room, remained on the landing of the stairway. The fight was renewed, and the murder followed. It was with reference to that situation that the court said that the defendant was under a duty to avoid the encounter. He had only to enter his own room and he would have been safe. The court did not hold that it was his duty to abandon his home and take refuge in the streets. Its brief opinion, little more than a summary statement of its conclusion, betrays no purpose to lay down a rule so far in conflict with precedent. Other [245] cases, such as People v. Kennedy, 153 N. Y. 346, 54 N. E. 51, 70 Am. St. Rep. 557; People v. Constantino, 153 N. Y. 24, 47 N. E. 37; People v. Johnson, 139 N. Y. 358, 34 N. E. 920, and People v. Carlton, 115 N. Y. 618, 22 N. E. 257, are instances either of sudden broils in public places or of the voluntary renewal of a quarrel which had once subsided. A man who is himself the aggressor or who needlessly resumes the fight, gains no immunity because he kills in his own dwelling. General statements to the effect that one who is attacked should withdraw, must be read in the light of the facts that led up to them. We think also that there is nothing in the statutes of this state that enlarges in such conditions the duty to retreat. The present statute (Penal Law, section 1055) is a re-enactment of the Penal Code (section 205) and this in turn was a re-enactment in substance, though not in form, of the Revised Statutes (2 R. S. 630, section 3). The notes of the revisers state that the revision was intended to be declaratory of the law as stated by most of the writers on the subject (citing Russell on Crimes 699, 700), and as established by decision in Massachusetts and New Jersey.

The portions of the charge, which we thus hold to be erroneous, were not excepted to by the defendant's counsel; and the question remains whether the erroneous statement of the duty to retreat requires us to reverse in the absence of an exception (Code Crim. Proc. section 528). The defendant admitted, on cross-examination, that it was possible for him to run away from the house, and escape the danger. The charge that it was his duty to escape, if he could, was, therefore, equivalent to an instruction to the jury that the defendant had failed to justify the homicide on the ground of self-defense. It was thus a direction to find the defendant guilty, at least of some degree of crime. (People v.

Walker, 198 N. Y. 329, 334, 91 N. E. 806.) The situation is the same in effect as if the issue of self-defense had not been submitted to the jury at all. It was submitted in form, but not in [246] substance, for the submission was coupled with instructions that predetermined the answer. It is the defendant's right to have the question of his guilt determined by the verdict of a jury rather than by the judgment of this court; and whatever our own opinion of his guilt may be, we cannot say, until it has been passed upon by a jury, that justice has been done. (People v. Jung Hing, 212 N. Y. 893, 404, Ann. Cas. 1915D 883, 106 N. T. 105.)

The judgment of conviction should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Right of Person Assaulted on His Own Premises to Repel Attack without Retreating.

Introductory, 918.

Person Assaulted in His Dwelling, 918.

Person Assaulted in His Place of Business, 921.

Person Assaulted Outside His Dwelling or Place of Business, 922.

Introductory.

The earlier cases discussing the right of a person assaulted on his own premises to repel the attack without retreating are reviewed in the notes to State v. Bennett, 5 Ann. Cas. 997; State v. Brooks, 15 Ann. Cas. 49, and State v. Sumner, 74 Am. St. Rep. 707. This note presents the recent cases on the subject.

Person Assaulted in His Dwelling.

It is well settled that where a person is assaulted in his own dwelling, without any fault on his part, he is not required to retreat, but may stand his ground, and use such force as may be reasonably necessary to repel the attack. Hutcherson v. State, 165 Ala. 16, 50 So. 1027, 138 Am. St. Rep. 17; Hutcherson v. State, 170 Ala. 29, 54 So. 119; Watts v. State, 177 Ala. 24, 59 So. 270; State v. Bissonette, 83 Conn. 261, 76 Atl. 288; State v. Perkins, 88 Conn. 360, 91 Atl. 265, L.R.A. 1915A 73; Russell v. State, 61 Fla. 50, 54 So. 360. And see the reported case. See also Com. v. Croson, 242 Pa. St. 19, 89 Atl. 821.

"In effect the jury was instructed that if one is attacked unlawfully in his own dwelling-house by one who is attempting to make a forcible and unlawful entry therein, he is not obliged to retreat, but he may use such means as are absolutely necessary to prevent the assailant's forcible entry, even to taking life. It is justifiable homicide if it appears that the resistance is neither greater in degree nor earlier in time than is necessary, unless the householder, under such circumstances, should take the opportunity of the unlawful entry to kill the intruder to gratify his hatred, malice or illwill, when the killing will be least manslaughter. . . . An assault on one's house can be regarded as an assault on the person, within the meaning of the law with reference to self-defense, where the purpose of the assault is an injury to the person of the occupant or members of his family, to accomplish which the assailant attacks the house in order to reach the inmate. In this connection it is said, and settled, that in such case the inmate need not flee from his house in order to escape injury by the assailant, but he may meet him at the threshold, and prevent him from breaking in, by any means rendered necessary by the exigency; and, upon the same ground and reason, that one may defend himself from peril of life, or great bodily harm, by means fatal to the assailant, if rendered necessary by the exigency of the assault." State v. Perkins, 88 Conn. 360, 91 Atl. 265, L.R.A.1915A 73.

Where a man and his wife are living together in the same house, the law imposes on the one who is free from fault in bringing on an encounter no duty to retreat from the other. Hutcherson v. State, 165 Ala. 16, 50 So. 1027; 138 Am. St. Rep. 17; Hutcherson v. State, 170 Ala. 29, 54 So. 119; Watts v. State, 177 Ala. 24, 59 So. 270. In Hutcherson v. State, 170 Ala. 29, 54 So. 119, the court said: "The evidence was without dispute that the killing took place in the dwelling house of both defendant and deceased. Defendant was the wife of the deceased, and they were living together in this house. There must be some where a person may stop and defend himself or herself, when they have the right otherwise to do so. The fact that two may live in the same house, have the same dwelling, or place of business does not take away from either in favor of the other the right to stop there and defend himself." In Watts v. State, 177 Ala. 24, 59 So. 270, it was said: "In the course of his oral charge the trial judge instructed the jury that, before defendant could successfully plead and establish self-defense, it was necessary for him to show that at the time of the killing there was no convenient or reasonable mode of escape open to him by retreating and declining combat, unless by retreating he increased his danger. Defendant duly objected to this part of the charge, the insistence being that this principle, though ordinarily applicable, cannot be applied to a killing in defendant's own home. The reason of the rule is said to be that 'the law regards a man's house as his castle, or, as was anciently said, his tutissimum refugium, and, having retired thus far, he is not compelled to yield further to his assailing antagonist. When he has reached this refuge, he may stand at bay, and may turn on and kill his assailant, if this be apparently necessary to save his own life; nor is he bound to escape from his house in order to avoid his assailant. Jones v. State, 76 Ala. 8, 16.

The rule is of ancient origin, and indeed deeply rooted in the elemental instincts of humanity. In its original applications it doubtless had in view only attacks from external aggressors, but in the case of Jones v. State, supra, it was held equally applicable to partners and tenants in common; the court declaring that 'the doctrine of retreat, or of declining combat by retreat, has no application to cases of this character, and that the right of self-defense may be perfect without it, where one partner or cotenant is assailed by another, each being equally entitled to the possession of the house or premises where the attack is made.' The reasoning of the court in support of this conclusion is, we think, convincing. In the recent case of Hutcherson v. State, 170 Ala. 20, 54 So. 119, the defendant killed her husband in the house jointly occupied by them as a dwelling; and the doctrine of Jones v. State, supra, was applied. A charge was there requested by defendant 'that it was not necessary for the defendant to retreat, because the facts in the case show that the defendant was in her own castle,' and for its refusal the judgment of conviction was reversed. The report of the case shows only that the attack and the killing occurred in the home which the defendant and the deceased were jointly occupying. In the present case it appears without dispute that the house in which the killing was done had been occupied jointly by defendant and deceased as their common home, and was then so occupied, except that about 10 days previously deceased had separated herself from her husband and children, and was in the exclusive occupation of one of the two rooms of the house. Had the evidence showed that defendant went into this room and was there attacked by his wife, the case might be different, and it may be that a due regard for the sacredness of human life would require a qualification of the principle announced in Jones v. State, and Hutcherson v. State, to the extent that those occupying separate rooms under a common roof should be held to the duty of retreating each to his own quarters, or at least from the other's quarters, rather than to stand there and kill, if such retreat might reasonably avoid the necessity of killing and offer safety to the one assailed. The evidence, however, does not show that defendant entered his wife's room, nor that he was anywhere but in his own room, when he fired the shot that killed her. The rooms were adjoining, and the door open between them; and it is at least inferable from defendant's testimony that he met the alleged assault standing in his own room. There is, therefore, no occasion to consider the exceptional case above suggested. It results that the charge of the trial court on this phase of the case was erroneous in predicating the duty of retreat under the circumstances described by defendant in his testimony before the jury."

No obligation to retreat from an assault on a person in his own house arises from the fact that the assailant is in the house by invitation. State v. Bissonnette, 83 Conn. 261, 76 Atl. 288, wherein the court said: "We think that error is well assigned upon that portion of the charge which relates to the duty of a person assaulted within his own home to retreat before killing his assailant. The general rule is that where one, without fault himself, is assaulted in his dwelling-house, he need not retreat from his assailant, but may resist the assault even to the extent of taking the life of his adversary when necessary. It is claimed that there is an exception to this rule, and that when the assailant has come into the house by invitation, express or implied, as for business purposes, and while there gets into an altercation with the owner and starts to assault him, the latter is required to retreat reasonably to avoid the conflict. The charge complained of does not make this distinction, but gives the jury to understand that in any case the person assailed in his own house should, if he can do so without leaving his house, withdraw somewhat in order to avoid the conflict. The evidence on both sides showed that Demery was not in the defendant's house with any respect for it or its master. He did not greet the defendant as he entered it. He gave directions with respect to what should be done within it. He declared himself to be the master of it. He then proceeded to assault the owner of it as he was seated in his chair. The defendant claimed that Demery entered the house wrongfully, with the purpose to assault and kill him. The charge complained of did not sufficiently meet this aspect of the case."

A person who is entitled to remain in a certain part of a building is not excused from retreating when assaulted elsewhere therein. State v. Dyer, 147 Iowa 217, 124 N. W. 629, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 459. In that case the court said: "It does not appear that defendant was on his own premises when he claims to have been assaulted by the deceased. The most that can be said is that he had a room in the house of the deceased which he called his own, and that he made his home there. The alleged assault was not made upon him while he was in his room, but in the dining room or parlor of the house belonging to the deceased. This was not defendant's castle. It belonged to and was occupied by the deceased, and defendant was not, under the circumstances, permitted to stand his ground in order to defend his premises. In other words, the duty of retreat applied to him just the same as if he were upon the street, or in any other place where the rights of disputants were equal. Generally speaking, the duty of retreat applies in this jurisdiction, and the rule was correctly stated by the trial court in its instruction which is now challenged."

Where a defendant has fallen short of bringing himself within the protection of the rule that the law accords to a guest the right of the owner to repel an attack without retreating, a refusal to give the jury such an instruction is proper. Dawson v. State, 148 Ala. 672, mem. 41 So. 803; Thomas v. State (Ala.) 69 So. 315. In the case first cited the charges requested were in part as follows: "(1) I charge you that if you believe from the evidence that the defendant was assaulted by Robert Thomas in such a manner as was calculated to lead a reasonable man to believe that defendant was in great danger to life or limb from the assault, and the defendant did so believe, and you should further find from the evidence that the defendant was free from fault in bringing up the difficulty, then the law would not require the defendant to retreat before striking in self-defense, if you further believe from the evidence that the defendant was at the home of Helena Wilson by her invitation. (2) I charge you that if the defendant was invited to the home of Helena Wilson, and that while there, so invited, he was attacked by one not in the family of said Helena Wilson, then the law does not cast on him the duty to retreat.

(4) I charge you that if you believe from the evidence that Helena Wilson invited the defendant to her home, and the defendant was assaulted while there by one not a member of that home, without fault on his part, then the law would not require the defendant to retreat before striking in self-defense." The court said: "Charge 1, requested by defendant, was properly refused, as it was misleading. There was evidence on the part of the state that when the shooting was done the defendant was outside the inclosure which constituted the home of Helena Wilson, and the jury might infer from this charge that the privileges of the home extended to that phase of the testimony, construing 'at her home' to include the road outside her gate. Charge 2 is subject to the same criticism, beside being elliptical. . . . Charge 4 was properly refused. It was calculated to mislead the jury. There was no evidence in this case of any striking in self-defense, except the shooting by the defendant, so that, applying the charge to the facts in this case, the jury might infer the right to shoot in self-defense, without regard to the nature or violence of the assault or the degree of peril." In Montgomery v. State, 160 Ala. 7, 49 So. 902, the following instruction was before the appellate court for consideration: "The law has long been settled that a guest in a dwelling house is entitled to the protection that the law affords the owner or more permanent occupant, and he may repel trespassers in and upon the house, and repel assaults, actual or menaced, as if he were under his own roof and within his own doors." Holding that the instruction was inapplicable and therefore misleading, and also mere argument, the court said: "Conceding that, in the house of his son, he was (under proper circumstances) excused from the doctrine of retreat, and might, while in it, make reasonable resistance to all assaults not provoked by himself, yet no person is permitted by the law to turn his castle from 'a shield to a sword,' for purposes of 'offensive effort against the lives of others,' for, as was tersely said by one of our great judges (McClellan), 'it is a shelter, but not a sally port.' 'If he leaves its shelter to encounter a danger beyond its precincts, he is in no better attitude, before the law, than if he had come from any other place, and voluntarily entered upon a combat, from the peril of which he was secure, but for his own act. It is immaterial that, after he has armed himself and emerged from his house, he encounters a necessity to kill to save his own life. Such necessity is, in legal contemplation, of his creation, and he cannot justify under a necessity which his own fault and wrong have contributed to produce.' In Thomas v. State (Ala.) 69 So. 315, the court said: "While there is no positive proof of the fact, the evidence was sufficient to afford an inference that defendant was there on the implied invitation of the owner of the house, or by prearrangement with some of its lawful occupants, and therefore was a guest at the house. If the defendant was a guest of the owner or occupants of the house, there by prearrangement with them or on their invitation, while in the house in that capacity the law armed him with the right to defend himself against an unlawful assault from outsiders, he being free from fault, and to employ all necessary force to protect his own life or his person grievous harm. For this purpose and under these circumstances, he was armed with the same rights of self-defense as if he had been the owner of the house, as to all persons except its lawful occupant; in other words, to that extent this house was his castle for the purpose of defense, and if without his fault he was assaulted there by an intruder, the law imposed on him no duty to retreat therefrom, but he had the right to stand his ground and defend himself even to the taking of the life of his assailant. . . . This doctrine only applies to the house, and the yard is not within its protection. . . . The defendant testified that he then ran around the house two or three times with the deceased following him; that he then went in the house, and secured a gun, came back into the yard, and met the deceased at the corner of the house, when the deceased drew a pistol, and defendant shot him. Outside of the defendant's own testimony, there is no positive evidence that deceased was armed with a pistol, and there was evidence sufficient to afford an inference that he was not so armed. The defendant's own evidence shows that the deceased did not attempt to draw a pistol or shoot him until he (defendant) had gone into the house and secured the gun and returned to the yard with it, and some of the testimony in connection with the location and range of the wound had tendencies going to show that defendant was pursuing the deceased when he encountered the danger that he relies on as the necessity for his act. . . . If the defendant had retreated into the house, and there remained, and the deceased had pursued him into the house, his right, if a guest of the house, to there remain and defend himself, would have been clear; but, as we have shown, this doctrine did not relieve him from the duty to retreat after the defendant left the house."

Person Assaulted in His Place of Business.

No duty to retreat devolves on one who is assailed without any fault of his own, in his office or place of business. Cheney v. State, 172 Ala. 368, 55 So. 801; Chaney v. State, 178 Ala. 44, 59 So. 604. And see Suell v. Derri-cott, 161 Ala. 259, 18 Ann. Cas. 636, 49 So. 895, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 996. Thus in Cheney v. State, 172 Ala. 368, 55 So. 801, the court said: "The defendant was under no duty to retreat, and there was no evidence that he was at fault in bringing on the difficulty, other than his mere appearance in his own place of business, and his firing on the deceased, and he should not have been convicted, if the jury entertained a reasonable doubt whether he acted upon the well-grounded and reasonable belief that it was necessary to shoot to take the life of Snyder, to save himself from great bodily harm or from death, or that he shot before such impending necessity arose."

In Hill v. State (Ala.) 69 So. 941, a prosecution for homicide, it appeared that the killing occurred at an illicit distillery, set up and maintained by the defendant and the deceased. It was held that such a place of unlawful business would not be held to be a place of business from which those engaged therein were not required to retreat. The court said: "By the reason of the rule in each case, of defense of the castle or place of business, the right to stand and defend against unlawful invasion must be held to attach to a place that at the time is a dwelling house or house where the owner conducts a lawful trade or business. The fundamental principle of all the cases on this subject is the right of 'the castle,' and the rule is not extended to the protection or defense of a house where the then occupant has no legal right to be. Thus, such unlawful occupant has no higher, or more special, right of defense than that extended to him in a public thoroughfare or in his wood or field."

In Brake v. State, 8 Ala. App. 98, 63 So. 11, a prosecution for homicide, the evidence tended to prove that when the fatal shot was fired, the defendant was in the street in front of the livery stable in which he was employed. It was held that that was not a place from which the law excused him from retreating if he could do so in safety.

Person Assaulted Outside His Dwelling or Place of Business.

It has been held that where a person is assailed in his own grounds, without any fault of his own, he need not retreat, but may defend himself with such force as may be necessary. Rigell v. State, 8 Ala. App. 46, 62 So. 977; Langston v. State, 8 Ala. App. 129, 63 So. 38; People v. City, 11 Cal. App. 702, 106 Pac. 257; Mulkey v. State, 5 Okla. Crim. 75, 113 Pac. 532. In Rigell v. State, supra, the evidence for the defendant, tended to show that on the night of killing, he, a young married man, went home about 10 o'clock from the drug store, where he was employed as a clerk; that as he approached his home he discovered that the light in his room was dimly burning; that, before entering the house, he stopped in the yard a few moments, and while standing there he heard somebody on the inside of the house talking in a low tone, whereupon he walked nearer to the house and looked into the room through the window (the inside shade, which covered it, lacking a few inches of being pulled entirely down), when he discovered his wife and a man, whom he did not then recognize, on the bed together; that the defendant then ran up the steps to the front door, and through it saw a man going out of the back hall door, whereupon the defendant came back down the front steps and ran around the house to the back porch, and found the man standing on the back porch; that the defendant halloed twice, demanding to know who it was, to neither of which demands the man made any reply, but immediately on the second demand, the defendant saw him pull his pistol out of his pocket; and that then the defendant quickly pulled his own pistol, and commenced to shoot at the man, while he was still standing on the back porch, firing four shots at him (the only shots fired), after which the deceased ran. The court said: "The defendant was therefore engaged in no unlawful enterprise in going into his own back yard, though armed with a pistol, and hailing deceased and demanding to know who he was. If, then, the deceased, in anticipation of and to prevent detection and arrest, or through other motives, became the assailant by drawing his pistol, or making other hostile demonstrations of a character evincing an intent to commit a present deadly assault on defendant, or one calculated to do him great bodily harm, the latter had the right to act on the reasonable appearance of things, and to do so promptly. The law does not require a man, confronted then as defendant's evidence tends to show he was, to wait and see if his assailant, if such he was, is going to shoot, or to wait and see if he may not, in the excitement of the moment, accidentally, or otherwise drop his pistol. Nor did the law require the defendant to retreat. He was at his home—within the precincts of his own castle—and was in no sense under a duty to retreat from an assailant (if such he was) who was a trespasser there, and who, under the veil of night, when its lord and master was away, had, by a previous abuse of the privilege of the entree which kinship gave, been able, on this occasion, to foully invade that sacred domain and seduce, or strip of her virtue, its erstwhile queen. The deceased at the time of the tragedy, had not only no right to resist arrest, but no right to defend himself, by inflicting injury on defendant, even though he had been assailed by defendant with a deadly intent while acting under the sudden heat of passion engendered from discovering deceased in the act of sexual intercourse with his (defendant's) wife. In such case, though defendant were the aggressor, and there was no way to escape death at his hands, except by taking his life, still, if deceased had done so, he would have been guilty of murder, for he was the wrongdoer in the first instance, was not therefore free from fault in bringing on the difficulty, but, on the contrary, had furnished the very provocation which brought it on." In Mulkey v. State, 5 Okla. Crim. 75, 113 Pac. 532, the court held that the defendant was entitled to have the following requested instruction given "You are instructed that every person has the right to act in his own necessary self-defense, and where a person is in a place where he has a right to be, and is not the aggressor in bringing on the conflict, and is assaulted by another person in such a way as to place him in danger of death, or great bodily harm, the person thus assaulted is not bound to retreat, but, on the contrary, may stand his ground and repel the danger in which he is placed with such force as will repel the attack and protect his person from serious bodily harm."

However, one who provokes an assault on himself in his own house or yard or place of business cannot invoke the rule excusing a person assaulted on his own premises from retreating. Sanford v. State, 2 Ala. App. 81, 57 So. 134, wherein the court said: "A man's house is his castle for purposes of defense, but not for offensive or aggressive operations, and he can claim the right to stand his ground, and if necessary kill his adversary, without being under an obligation to retreat from his home only when free from fault in bringing on the difficulty and when acting under an impending necessity to protect himself or home."

COFFEY.

MCGAHEY ET AL.

Michigan Supreme Court—July 24, 1914.

181 Mich. 225; 148 N. W. 356.

Creditors' Suits — Jurisdiction — Waiver by Failure to Demur.

In a creditor's bill to enforce his claim, brought on the theory of defendant's violation of the Bulk Sales Act, defendant, by failing to demur to the bill of complainant, or to claim the right of demurrer in his answer on jurisdictional grounds, and by answering to the bill on the merits, and by taking proofs thereon, waives the question of jurisdiction, on the ground that the claim had not been reduced to judgment.

Bulk Sales Law — Remedy of Creditor in Equity.

Under Bulk Sales Act (Pub. Acts 1905, No. 223), providing that creditors upon knowledge that the requirements of the act have not been followed, may apply to have the purchaser become a receiver and account to creditors, the rule that a creditor must obtain a judgment at law before resorting to equity does not apply; and, apart from the statute, the rule is subject to exceptions, where a judgment cannot be had because the debtor is dead, has absconded from the state, and has no property therein.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under Bulk Sales Act (Pub. Acts 1905, No. 223), on a bill in behalf of complainant and all other creditors of the seller upon the theory that the statute made the debtor's sale absolutely void, and that his creditors could apply the property to their claims, by receivership, injunction, and an accounting, and not on the theory of a creditor's bill or a bill in aid of execution, the complainant will not be denied equitable relief, on the ground that he has an adequate remedy at law, though the equitable remedy is not exclusive.

[See note at end of this case.]

Validity of Bulk Sales Law.

The Bulk Sales Act (Pub. Acts 1905, No. 223), regulating the sale of merchandise in bulk, and making sales not in accordance therewith void as against the seller's creditors, is constitutional.

[See Ann. Cas, 1914C 414.]

Action by Creditor — Parties.

In a suit by the creditor of one who sold merchandise in Bulk, without a compliance with the Bulk Sales Act (Pub. Acts 1905, No. 223), regulating such sales, the seller is a necessary party.

Waiver of Rights by Creditor.

A creditor who knows nothing of the debtor's sale of his stock of goods in bulk, or that it had been made contrary to the Bulk Sales Act (Pub. Acts 1905, No. 223), by his conversation with the seller in the presence of the purchaser, cannot waive his rights under the act, since a "waiver" is an intentional relinquishment of a known right, or such conduct as warrants an inference of a relinquishment of such right.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kalamazoo county: KNAPPEN, Judge.

Action for appointment of a receiver, accounting, and injunction. William J. Coffey, plaintiff, and William A. McGahey, et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Baker appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion: AFFIRMED.

Jeane R. Cropsey and Don B. Sharpe for appellant.

Samuel W. Ozenford for appellee.

[226] MCAIVAY, C. J.—This is an appeal by the defendant Herman D. Baker from a decree entered in this cause [227] against him and his codefendants in the circuit court for the county of Kalamazoo, in chancery.

The facts are as follows: Defendant McGahey, who had for some time owned and conducted a certain saloon in the city of Kalamazoo, on July 22, 1908, sold and conveyed the entire stock in trade, fixtures, and personal property owned and used by him in and about said business to defendant Baker in bulk. In making this sale, these parties in no form or manner complied with the provisions of Act No. 223, Pub. Acts 1905 (2

How. Stat. [2d ed.] § 2612), known as the "bulk sales act." This was the only property owned by McGahey, and defendant Baker had been acquainted with him but a few days. On the date of said sale defendant Baker took immediate possession of all of said property and proceeded to continue the business. Defendant McGahey absconded for parts unknown, and his whereabouts have not since been known. He was brought into court by publication. Defendant Baker continued this business until August 14, 1908, when he sold and transferred to defendant Felix Schmidt for the sum of $2,500 all the stock in trade, fixtures, tools, and personal property of every kind owned and used by him in and about the said business, being the property purchased from McGahey. Neither of the parties to this sale conformed in any manner to the provisions and requirements of the said "bulk sales act." Defendant Schmidt upon his purchase immediately took possession, and was engaged in carrying on the business when this suit was instituted. Complainant had been employed by defendant McGahey some time previous to the date of the sale to Baker in and about these premises as a carpenter in charge of the carpenter work in requiring and remodeling the building occupied by defendant McGahey as a residence upstairs and as his business place on the ground floor, and so [228] worked for him up to and including the date of sale, at which time he was indebted to him in the sum of over $200.

Complainant filed his bill of complaint in this cause against these defendants for himself and in behalf of all the creditors of defendant McGahey, setting up at length the foregoing facts, and asking the aid of the court in equity in the premises, to decree the amount due him from McGahey, and that defendants Baker and Schmidt be declared receivers of all of the said stock of merchandise and fixtures, and the proceeds and avails thereof, for his benefit and that of the other creditors who might intervene, and that Baker and Schmidt come to a full accounting for the said property and the proceeds of the same, and that a receiver be appointed in their stead, and that pending the action an injunction be granted.

To this bill of complaint, defendants Baker and Schmidt filed their several answers under oath. The answer of defendant Baker, which is the only one necessary to be considered by this court, he alone having appealed, admits all but three of the charges of the bill of complaint, and the record shows those were admitted upon the hearing of the cause.

Defendant on this appeal contends that the court in equity has no jurisdiction of this cause, for the reasons that complainant is not a judgment creditor, that complainant has a complete and adequate remedy at law, and in any event that the record shows complainant has waived any right of action which he might have had against defendant Baker or the goods in question.

Defendant did not demur to the bill of complaint or claim the right of demurrer in his answer on jurisdictional grounds. It does appear that, when complainant was sworn as a witness and proceeded to prove the indebtedness of McGahey to him, an objection was made to the admission of any such evidence, [229] unless it appeared that the claim had been reduced to judgment. Such a question cannot be raised after an answer upon the taking of proofs at a hearing. This court has repeatedly held that such an objection comes too late if made for the first time at the hearing of the cause. Stockton v. Williams, Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 129; Wales v. Newbould, 9 Mich. 45, and authorities cited; F. H. Wolf Brick Co. v. Lonyo, 132 Mich. 162, 93 N. W. 251, 102 Am. St. Rep. 412; Negaunee Iron Co. v. Iron Cliffs Co. 134 Mich. 264 96 N. W. 468.

In each of the foregoing cases this court has held the question of jurisdiction should have been raised by demurrer, where the grounds of the objection appear upon the face of the bill; that, after defendants have answered, put the case at issue upon the merits, and taken proofs on that issue, they cannot raise the question of jurisdiction. The same rule has been recognized by the Federal courts. Hollins v. Brierfield L. Coal, etc. Co. 150 U. S. 371, 14 S. Ct. 127, 37 O. S. (L. ed.) 1113.

In all cases where the question has been raised before this court, it has held that the question of jurisdiction is waived, when no demurrer is imposed until after issue is joined, and proofs are taken.

Appellant contends that it appears that complainant is not a judgment creditor, and therefore has no standing in a court of equity. The admitted facts show that defendant McGahey disposed of all of his property, absconded from the jurisdiction of this State, and his whereabouts could not be ascertained; that process could not be had upon him in Michigan. It would have been impossible under the circumstances for complainant to obtain a judgment against the principal defendant McGahey. We find from the authorities it is not an inflexible rule that a judgment at law must be obtained by a creditor before resort to equity. There are exceptions to this rule in cases where a judgment cannot be obtained because [230] the debtor is dead, or has absconded from the State, and has no property in the State. This was recognized by this court in Earle v. Grove, 92 Mich. 285, 289, 52 N. W. 615, where the court said:

"The complainant claims that while the general rule in all the States, statute or no statute, is that there must be a judgment and a return of execution unsatisfied before a resort can be had to equity, still that there are, and always have been, exceptions to this general rule in special cases, as where a judgment cannot be obtained because the debtor is dead; or has absconded, or removed from the State, or is a nonresident. This claim is supported by the following among other cases [citing many authorities].

"The statute . . . cannot be said to point out the only conditions of equitable relief in cases of this kind. If it should be held to apply only to home judgments, as the New York statute, of which ours is a copy, has been interpreted in that State (Tarbell v. Griggs, 3 Paige (N. Y.) 207; 23 Am. Dec. 790), it would not, in our opinion, bar equitable relief in cases where a compliance with the statute was rendered impossible by the death, absconding, or removal from the State, or nonresidence of the debtor."

In the case cited, from which these excerpts are taken, the amended bill showed that a New York judgment had been obtained, yet the court recognized the exceptions to the general rule. Further, the remedy in the instant case is given by the statute, by which any and all creditors may, as soon as knowledge comes to them that the requirements of the statute have not been followed, proceed immediately, not to set aside the sale, but to impound the property or its proceeds. Upon application of any of the creditors, "any purchaser shall become a receiver and be held accountable," etc., is the reading of the statute, and for this reason the judgment creditor rule does not apply.

The contention that complainant has a complete [231] and adequate remedy at law is based upon the decisions of this court in construing the bulk sales act. The bill of complaint was filed in behalf of complainant and all other creditors of defendant McGahey. It sets up an equitable cause of action, and shows that this property is being sold and disposed of by defendants, and complainant will be left remediless, unless the court interferes. Its charges and averments of fact are not in dispute. There is no pretense on the part of appellant that any of the requirements of the bulk sales act were followed by either party to the sale. The defendant McGahey had absconded after the transfer of all his property to defendant Baker, who in turn sold the property to defendant Schmidt before the institution of this suit. The bill prays for an accounting, a receiver, and an injunction.

The bill of complaint is not filed upon the theory of a judgment creditor's bill, or a bill in aid of execution, but upon the theory that the statute made the transfer to defendant Baker absolutely void as to creditors; that creditors of McGahey are entitled to reach this property and apply it upon their claims; that for such purpose it is necessary to have a receiver, an injunction, and an accounting. It is contended by complainant that by reason of the circumstances of this case he has no adequate remedy at law.

The bulk sales act has been before this court for consideration and construction several times, and, from an examination of the decisions of these cases, it is clear that, while the court has held a remedy by garnishment was permissible, it has refused to hold that it was the exclusive remedy under the statute. In the decisions upon the questions raised under this statute, this court has been unanimous only in holding that the law is constitutional, and that in case of a sale void thereunder the seller is a necessary party. To deny jurisdiction to a court in equity would be contrary to a fair interpretation of this statute, [232] which, by its title and the language used in it, indicates that it was enacted for the purpose of preventing frauds by debtors upon creditors, and made certain transfers "void as against the creditors of the seller," if the requirements of the act were ignored, and, further, made the purchaser in such cases a "receiver" to be held accountable to the creditors of the seller upon application of any such creditors.

This is not a statement of the arguments made by counsel in previous cases in favor of exclusive jurisdiction in equity, but is in support of the proposition that it was the legislative intent not to deprive equity of jurisdiction. The statute creates a trust fund in the hands of the purchaser for the benefit of all creditors. The profession understands that the usual proceeding where an application is made to a court by a creditor against a receiver or trustee is by a bill or petition in equity, and such proceeding is not like one in garnishment where the reward inures only to the benefit of the swift creditor, but is a proceeding where every creditor is entitled to his just proportion of a trust fund. Cases are arising under this statute where an action at law is not an adequate remedy.

Bixler v. Fry, 157 Mich. 314, 122 N. W. 119, was a case quite similar to the instant case. In one of the opinions written by Mr. Justice Moore, it is said:

"The questions raised by this record have not been passed upon by this court, and, so far as we are advised, by any court. The effect of the demurrer to the bill is to admit the truth of its averments. . . . The case is unlike the two cases already cited, which were proceedings in behalf of a single creditor. The bill is filed, not only in behalf of the complainant, but in behalf of all the other creditors. It calls for an accounting and for a receivership. It is not necessary to quote the provisions of Act No. 223, Pub. Acts 1906, as they are so easily accessible, but we think a reading of them establishes the authority of a court [233] of equity to interfere in such a case as is stated in the bill of complaint."

In the instant case all allegations setting up a case warranting equitable relief are contained in the bill of complaint. It makes a stronger case for complainant than that stated in Bixler v. Fry, supra. These facts alleged are admitted, and from them it appears that complainant has no adequate remedy at law. He has brought himself within the rule which permits the maintenance of a bill by one who is not a judgment creditor, if under the circumstances of this case such a showing is necessary.

Appellant also contends that in any event the complainant is not entitled as a creditor to recover under this void sale for the reason that he waived all rights under the statute. The record shows that this claimed waiver occurred after the completion of the sale, and was entirely without consideration, during a brief conversation had by McGahey, in the presence of Baker, with complainant, who knew nothing about the sale or the circumstances surrounding it, or that it had been made contrary to the provisions of law. This contention requires but brief consideration. It is too well settled to require citation of authorities that there can be no waiver of rights without knowledge of the facts upon which it is based. A waiver has been aptly defined, as follows:

"It is an intentional relinquishment of a known right; or such conduct as warrants an inference of a relinquishment of such right."

The record shows no waiver on the part of complainant.

Our construction, therefore, is that by the provisions of this act jurisdiction is given to courts in equity to grant relief to creditors. This jurisdiction is not exclusive. Musselman Grocer Co. v. Kidd, etc. Co. 151 Mich. 478, 115 N. W. 409.

[234] The decree of the circuit court in favor of complainant and against defendant and appellant Herman D. Baker is as to him in all respects affirmed, with costs of both courts in favor of complainant and against such defendant and appellant.

A decree will be entered in this court accordingly.

Brooke, Kuhn, Stone, Moore, and Steere, JJ., concurred with McAlvay, C. J. Bird, J., concurred in the result.

OSTRANDER, J. (dissenting).—The opinion of Mr. Justice McAlvay covers considerable ground, and is prepared so as to rule several distinct points. He first rules that, because no demurrer was interposed, defendant (appellant) was precluded at the hearing below, and is precluded in this court, from raising the question of the jurisdiction of a court of equity in the premises. Secondly. He rules that the remedy in the instant case, by which I suppose he means the remedy sought by the bill, is given by the statute, meaning, of course, the sales in bulk act—

"By which any and all creditors may, as soon as knowledge comes to them that the requirements of the statute have not been followed, proceed immediately, not to set aside the sale, but to impound the property or its proceeds. . . . The judgment creditor rule does not apply."

Thirdly. He rules that the bill was not filed—

"Upon the theory of a judgment creditor's bill, or a bill in aid of execution, but upon the theory that the statute made the transfer to defendant Baker absolutely void as to creditors; that creditors of McGahey are entitled to reach this property and apply it upon their claims; that for such purpose it is necessary to have a receiver, an injunction, and an accounting."

Fourthly. He rules that the sale in bulk act gives [235] jurisdiction to equity to grant relief to creditors, but that the jurisdiction so given is not exclusive. All of these rulings are of such general importance as to justify a somewhat critical study of their soundness.

If the statute referred to does not give this complainant a remedy, if he is required to resort to general equity jurisdiction and equity rules to maintain his right to file the bill, he must be a judgment creditor. Nothing is better settled than that a simple contract creditor whose claim is not reduced to judgment, and who has no express lien upon his debtor's property, has no standing in a court of equity, to obtain seizure of the debtor's property and its application to his debt. We have, further, a statute which recognizes the general rule. (1 Comp. Laws, §§ 436, 437) in defining the jurisdiction of chancery courts. Certain facts must appear to sustain a judgment creditor's bill, and, not appearing, the court cannot proceed. Vanderpool v. Notley, 71 Mich. 422, 39 N. W. 574; Grenell v. Ferry, 110 Mich. 262, 68 N. W. 144. Jurisdiction in such cases is not acquired because a defendant fails to question it. None of the cases cited in the opinion sustains a contrary doctrine. In Hollins v. Coal, etc. Co. 150 U. S. 371, 14 S. Ct. 127, 37 U. S. (L. ed.) 1113, it appearing that such a suit had been dismissed upon the merits, it was held that it should have been dismissed for want of jurisdiction. Want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter may be urged at any time.

He is right in finding that the bill in this cause is not, and was not intended to be, a judgment creditor's bill. The solicitor for complainant leaves us in no doubt upon the subject. He says, in the brief:

"Section 3 [referring to the sales in bulk law] carves out a new remedy, not before known to the law."

And also:

"One cannot read this statute without at once concluding [236] that it was the intention of the legislature to give the general creditor one new, complete remedy by one action and not compel him to pursue his remedy through several courts."

In this connection it may be observed that the decree appealed from is nothing more or less than a money judgment against appellant Baker primarily and against defendant Schmidt secondarily. There is no decree against the goods and no provision in the decree for selling them to satisfy complainant's demand.

The second and the fourth rulings which I have referred to are the important ones. They agree only in part with complainant's theory.

The statute makes a sale of goods in bulk void as to creditors of the seller, unless accompanied by certain specified formalities. What, in such cases, is the remedy of the creditor of the seller? If the statute gives a remedy, it is clearly a remedy in equity. If it was the legislative intention that the merchandise transferred in violation of the statute, or the value thereof, should be a fund for payment of the debts of the seller, the remedy is in equity.

In Musselman Grocer Co. v. Kidd, etc. Co. 151 Mich. 478, 115 N. W. 409, it was the contention of appellants that: "The legislature meant that on the application of any creditor, and after hearing, the court would make an order declaring the purchaser to hold the goods for the benefit of all the creditors of the seller pro rata."

The contention was overruled; the justices sitting in that case holding that: "It would destroy the intent of the legislature in passing the act to require the intervention of a court of equity."

The action was garnishment, and a personal judgment [237] against the purchaser of the goods for the amount of the seller's debt to the plaintiff was affirmed.

In Bixler v. Fry, 157 Mich. 314, 122 N. W. 119, which was a suit in equity, the bill of complaint charged that one R. S. Drew was a retail merchant who became indebted to the complainant for merchandise and also became indebted to others; that Drew sold his stock of goods to defendant Fry, in bulk, without complying with the statute, whereby said Fry "became and is a receiver and liable to said creditors for all goods that have come into his possession by virtue of the said sale." It was charged that Drew was insolvent. In behalf of complainant and all other creditors of Drew, it was prayed that Fry appear and answer, that he be decreed to hold all of said goods, etc., as receiver and in trust for creditors of Drew, that he come to an accounting and turn over to the court sufficient of the goods to pay Drew's debts, the property to be disposed of and proceeds distributed under the order and direction of the court. No personal judgment against Fry was asked for; but the attempt was to follow the goods as a fund for payment of creditors. The bill was filed according to the theory that the statute, by its terms imported, if it did not create, an equitable remedy. The court below overruled a demurrer to the bill, and in an opinion used the language following:

"Section 3 of Act No. 223 of the Public Acts of 1905, Michigan, reads:

"Any purchaser, transferee, or assignee shall upon application of any of the creditors of the seller, transferor or assignor, become a receiver and be held accountable," etc.

"The purchaser, transferee, or assignee does not become a receiver and accountable until appointed as such, and he cannot be so appointed, except by a court of chancery. To delay the appointment until the [238] creditors become judgment creditors would render the statute practically of no benefit in many cases. I do not care to be responsible for such a construction, but rather prefer to give the construction that will secure the results evidently intended by the legislature. Whether Drew ought not to have been made a party, is a question I do not now pass upon; as later he may be added, if deemed necessary. This would seem true, unless made a party, no claim can be made out against Drew in this proceeding. Judgment would have to first be obtained in an action at law against him before the funds in the hands of the receiver could be applied to the liquidation of complainant's claim. The necessity of the case demands that the purchaser be placed in a position of responsibility at the earliest possible moment. Largely for this reason, I overrule the demurrer, granting the usual time to plead."

From the order overruling the demurrer, the defendant appealed. Two of the eight justices who heard the argument were of opinion that the bill was demurrable because Drew was not made a party defendant, and two favored an affirmance of the decree upon the ground that the statute "establishes the right of a court of equity to interfere in such a case." Four of the justices were of opinion that prior decisions of the court disposed of the contention that the statute itself provided for or indicated a proceeding in rem, or for the exclusive jurisdiction of courts of equity, and held that a court of equity would assume jurisdiction only when such jurisdiction was warranted by general rules.

Having held that to require the intervention of a court of equity in such cases would destroy the intention of the legislature, having held that the purchaser of the stock of goods is liable in garnishment, having held (Porter v. Goudzwaard, 162 Mich. 158, 127 N. W. 295), that a creditor of the seller of a stock of goods in bulk may attach the goods, it would seem to be settled that the statute we are considering does [239] not give a remedy. It would seem that the court had heretofore been of opinion that creditors of the seller have an adequate remedy at law. And the opinions referred to cannot be harmonized with the theory that the goods sold constitute a trust fund for creditors.

If the effect of these decisions is not that the purchaser of the goods is liable to the creditors of the seller to the extent of the value of the goods, and that such creditors have such, and only such, remedies as, independent of the particular statute, are afforded by law, then I have misunderstood them. If my Brother McAlvay's conclusions are sustained, we come to this proposition, viz.: Any creditor of a seller of a stock of goods in bulk may, at his election, pursue the buyer at law, or pursue the goods or their proceeds in equity, without having secured a judgment at law; equitable jurisdiction being grounded upon the statute itself.

How, in practice, can such a proposition be sustained? If the first creditor who acts files a bill in equity, are other creditors thereby deprived of the right to pursue the purchaser in actions at law? If, in a particular case, some creditor institutes garnishment proceedings or attachment and garnishment proceedings, and some creditor later files a bill in equity, will the equity court administer so much of the fund as shall remain after the plaintiff in the law action is satisfied, or will it dislodge the plaintiff in the law case and oblige all creditors to accept an equitable division of the property or of its proceeds? These are questions which at once suggest themselves.

The statute either leaves creditors to such remedies as existed when the law was passed or else it provided a new remedy. If it provided a new remedy, it did so in the words:

"Any purchaser . . . who shall not conform to the provisions of this act shall, upon application of [240] any of the creditors of the seller, . . . become a receiver and be held accountable to such creditors for all the goods, wares, merchandise, and fixtures that have come into his possession by virtue of such sale."

If it provided a new remedy, it is necessarily an exclusive remedy. The unlawful sale is void. The goods, as to his creditors, belong to the vendor. The vendee is a receiver "accountable to such creditors for all the goods . . . that have come into his possession by virtue of such sale."

In my opinion, it would have been logical if in the initial case presented this court had agreed with the contention of the appellant and had held that the legislative intention, in case the law was disobeyed, was to make the buyer a trustee for creditors of the seller, responsible to all creditors alike for the value of the goods. Such a holding and such a construction of the act would affirm the idea of a new and complete remedy under the statute and preclude the idea that the swift creditor may recoup himself, even to the extent of the entire value of the goods sold, in garnishment or other proceedings at law. But the court rejected this construction of the act and in so doing, I repeat, necessarily decided that no new remedy was given by the statute. Independent of statute, a simple contract creditor has no remedy in equity.

If the construction then placed upon the act was wrong, it can be remedied by overruling the decision and those which follow it. I do not favor such a course, believing the remedy at law to be fairly adequate.

One other proposition remains to be considered, and that is whether the bill can be sustained as a judgment creditor's bill, upon the ground that it was impossible by reason of the debtor's absence to obtain a judgment. It was filed upon no such theory, but according to a theory which I have stated. Moreover, [241] there is not here present as there was in Earle v. Grove, 92 Mich. 285, 2 N. W. 615, the fact that the demand could not be satisfied by an action at law. Plaintiff might have proceeded by attachment and garnishment.

The decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed, with costs of both courts to appellant.

NOTE.

Remedies of Creditor for Violation of Bulk Sales Law.

At Law.

In almost all of the American states bulk sales laws have been passed, the object of which is to prevent a trader from disposing of his merchandise and fixtures in bulk without complying with certain requirements such as notice to creditors, etc., and which declare that a sale made in violation of such provisions shall be void and fraudulent as against the creditors of the vendor. Under such a law it has been held that a creditor of a person who has sold goods in violation of its terms, cannot, without a judgment or a lien in his favor, maintain a direct action at law against the purchaser of the goods to recover the debt. Rogers' Milling Co. v. Goff, etc. Co. (Okla.) 148 Pac. 1029; Bewley v. Sims, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 145 S. W. 1076; Rothschild v. Trewella, 36 Wash. 679, 79 Pac. 480, 104 Am. St. Rep. 973, 68 L.R.A. 281. This rule does not, however, apply to a trustee in bankruptcy who may bring an action of replevin to recover a stock of goods sold by the bankrupt in violation of the provisions of a bulk sales law. Goodwin v. Tuttle, 70 Ore. 423, 141 Pac. 1120, wherein it was held that a person who took possession of property in violation of a bulk sales statute was not "a bona fide holder for value prior to the date of the adjudication" within the meaning of section 70 of the national bankruptcy law.

The creditor may proceed by suing out a writ of attachment and may attach the goods in the hands of the vendee. Carstarphen Warehouse Co. v. Fried, 124 Ga. 544, 52 S. E. 598; Right v. Stephen Putney Shoe Co. 137 Ga. 493, 73 S. E. 740; Galbraith v. Oklahoma State Bank, 36 Okla. 807, 130 Pac. 541; Rogers' Milling Co. v. Goff, etc. Co. (Okla.) 148 Pac. 1029. See also Daly v. Sumpter Drug Co. 127 Tenn. 412, Ann. Cas. 1914D 1101, 155 S. W. 167.

Likewise a creditor of the vendor has a remedy by garnishment to enforce his rights against a person who has bought the goods without complying with the requirements of a bulk sales law. Musselman Grocer Co. v. Kidd, etc. Co. 151 Mich. 478, 115 N. W. 409; Marquette County Sav. Bank v. Koivisto, 162 Mich. 554, 127 N. W. 680; Appel Mercantile Co. v. Barker, 92 Neb. 669, 138 N. W. 1133; Interstate Rubber Co. v. Kaufman, 98 Neb. 562, 153 N. W. 585; Rogers' Milling Co. v. Goff, etc. Co. (Okla.) 148 Pac. 1029; Owosso Carriage, etc. Co. v. McIntosh (Tex.) 179 S. W. 257, (reversing judgment in 146 S. W. 239); Kohn v. Fishbach, 36 Wash. 69, 78 Pac. 199, 104 Am. St. Rep. 941; Friedman v. Branner, 72 Wash. 338, 130 Pac. 360. See also Humphrey v. Coquillard Wagon Works, 37 Okla. 714, 132 Pac. 899, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 600. Compare McGreenery v. Murphy, 76 N. H. 338, 82 Atl. 720, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 374. As the theory on which the remedy by garnishment is grounded is that the purchaser of goods sold in violation of the provision of a bulk sales law is regarded as a trustee for the creditor, it has been held that the creditor may hold the garnishee for the fund coming into his hands in case he has disposed of the goods. Jaques, etc. Co. v. Carstarphen Warehouse Co. 131 Ga. 162 S. E. 82; Appel Mercantile Co. v. Barker, 92 Neb. 669, 138 S. W. 1133; Interstate Rubber Co. v. Kaufman, 98 Neb. 562, 153 N. W. 585; Owosso Carriage, etc. Co. v. McIntosh (Tex.) 179 S. W. 257 (reversing judgment in 146 S. W. 239); Ann. Cas. 1916C.—59.

Kohn v. Fishbach, 36 Wash. 69, 78 Pac. 199, 104 Am. St. Rep. 941; Friedman v. Branner, 72 Wash. 338, 130 Pac. 360. And it is immaterial that the goods have been sold by the garnishee before the service of the garnishment summons. Jaques, etc. Co. v. Carstarphen Warehouse Co. 131 Ga. 1, 62 S. E. 82. In Kohn v. Fishbach, supra, the court said: "It is true, the garnishee answered, and probably in accordance with the facts, that he did not at that time have any of the property of the defendant in his possession, and that he was not indebted to him. But, in contemplation of law, he had the property of the defendant in his hands, because, having purchased the property in fraud of law, without complying with the provisions of the law in relation to sales of property in bulk, he stood in the position of a trustee of the property, responsible to the cestui que trust or the creditors for the disposition of such property."

Where the purchase price for goods sold without complying with the provisions of a bulk sales law has been paid into court in an action brought to recover it, the fund so paid in will be regarded as a trust fund to be distributed pro rata among those creditors who have intervened in the suit. Fitz Henry v. Munter, 33 Wash. 629, 74 Pac. 1003.

So on the ground that no title to the goods has been passed by one who sells goods in violation of a bulk sales law it has been held that his creditors may levy execution on the goods on a judgment recovered against the vendor. Parham v. Potts Thompson Liquor Co. 127 Ga. 303, 56 S. E. 460; Mutz v. Sanderson, 94 Neb. 293, 143 N. W. 302; Marshon v. Toohey (Nev.) 148 Pac. 357. And a creditor may levy on the proceeds received by the vendee of the goods fraudulently sold where it appears that he has disposed of them. Marshon v. Toohey (Nev.) 148 Pac. 357. A creditor need not in such a case levy on other property of his debtor and have the execution returned unsatisfied before levying on the property fraudulently sold. Mutz v. Sanderson, 94 Neb. 293, 143 N. W. 302.

Where a bulk sales law provides that "no proceedings at law or equity shall be brought against the purchaser to invalidate any such voidable sale after the expiration of ninety days from the consummation thereof," it has been held that a levy on goods within ninety days of their sale under an execution issued on a judgment secured by a creditor against the vendor is a "proceeding at law or equity" within the meaning of the law. Dickinson v. Harbison, 78 N. J. L. 97, 72 Atl. 941; Wilson v. Edwards, 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 295. And that provision has been held to be satisfied where a creditor attaches within ninety days the goods which have been fraudulently sold by his debtor and there is no break in the continuity of the proceedings so begun by attachment, although the final sale of the merchandise under the writ does not take place till after the ninety days mentioned in the law have passed. Schumacher-Binzley Co. v. Riddle, 52 Pa. Super. Ct. 6, wherein the case of Schmucker v. Lawler, 38 Pa. Super. Ct. 578, was distinguished on the ground that an attachment execution under Act of June 16, 1836 (P. L. 755) was not an appropriate remedy where goods were sold in violation of a bulk sales law, as that process was intended to reach only certain classes of personal property not subject to the writ of feri facias.

It has been held that where a person has sold goods in violation of the provision of a bulk sales law which makes such a sale voidable as against his creditors, any one creditor may attack the sale immediately without obtaining the co-operation of his fellow creditors. Wilson v. Edwards, 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 295.

There is, however, a limitation on the extent of a creditor's right to follow property as sold in relation of a bulk sales law. Thus in Kasper v. Spokane Merchants' Assoc. 87 Wash. 447, 151 Pac. 800, it appeared that a stock of goods had been sold by one Cohn to a corporation known as the Colville Toggery without complying with a bulk sales law, and the vendee later made an assignment of the same property to a merchants' association for the benefit of its creditors. In a suit by Cohn's vendor for a part of the purchase price wherein he sought to charge the merchants' association as garnishee, alleging that the sale was void originally under the provisions of the bulk sales act, the court said: "But the statute does not confer upon the creditors of a vendor who transfers his goods, wares, or merchandise in bulk without a compliance with this statute the right to pursue the property into whosoever hands it may fall. The creditor having neither title to nor a lien upon the property, but only an inchoate right to have the property subjected to his debt, the rule of caveat emptor does not apply. We must, therefore show that the holder or converter of the property is the fraudulent vendee himself, or some person who took the property from the fraudulent vendee with knowledge of the fraudulent transfer. If this be not the rule, a creditor of a fraudulent vendor could permit such vendor to continue the business purchased, sell the goods to customers in the ordinary course of trade, and, after the property is exhausted pursue the purchasers as for a conversion of the goods; thus permitting the act to operate in restraint of trade, and as a fraud upon the innocent; things not intended, in our judgment, by the framers of the act or by the Legislature which enacted it into law. Tested by these principles, there can be no recovery in this proceeding against the appellant association. It affirmatively appears in the record that the association had no knowledge, at the time it took the assignment from the Colville Toggery either that there had not been a compliance with the Sales-in-Bulk Law in the sale from Cohn to that corporation, or that Kasper was a creditor of Cohn on account of her purchase of the goods from him. Conceding, therefore, that the association was in fact a purchaser of the stock of goods in virtue of the assignment, it was a purchaser from the fraudulent vendee of the goods for value and in good faith, not in itself a party to the fraudulent transfer, and hence not liable as for a conversion of the property."

The bulk sales law of Missouri (Laws 1913, pp. 163, 164, 165) provides in section 2 that "nothing in this act shall be so construed as to give any creditor, manufacturer, whole sale merchant or jobber any right to, or lien on any merchandise or article in any stock of goods, except the goods sold and delivered by such creditor, manufacturer, wholesale merchant or jobber." Another provision gives to creditors of a fraudulent vendor a right to proceed against their debtor under pre-existing statutes which give a right to set aside fraudulent conveyances by attachment and by seizure by writ of feri facias. In an action of the kind authorized by the latter provision the creditor was held not to be limited in his right of attachment to such merchandise or articles in stock as were sold by him to the fraudulent vendor as provided for in section 2 of the bulk sales law. Joplin Supply Co. v. Smith, 182 Mo. App. 212, 167 S. W. 649, wherein the court said: "We hold that where a sale is made such as is declared fraudulent and void by the Act of 1913, creditors of the vendor have open to them the right to attach which has existed since the enactment of sections 2294 and 2344, Revised Statutes 1909, to set aside fraudulent conveyances or to seize by feri facias, and also the remedy as provided in section 2 of the Act of 1913, and that unless the latter remedy is invoked, the creditors have the same rights and remedies as to fraudulent conveyances that they have always had when the law declared a conveyance fraudulent and void. In case, however, they do invoke the remedy as provided in section 2 of said act, then and not until then does the proviso, if ever, begin to operate. Keeping in mind the legislative intent of declaring such sales fraudulent and void, this construction gives a greater effect to that intent and arms the defrauded creditor with all the instruments of redress which he had heretofore as well as the one created by section 2 of the act of 1913. This construction places no hardship on the parties to the sale as the act plainly designates what must be done to make the sale or trade invulnerable so far as this act is concerned."

In Equity.

In the reported case it is held that a remedy by garnishment is not the only remedy under a bulk sales law and that where it appears that a vendor who has sold articles without complying with the terms of the statute has disposed of all his property, and has absconded to parts unknown, his creditors have no adequate remedy at law and can proceed in equity without first obtaining a judgment at law. Similarly, it has been held in a Nebraska case that where goods were sold without a compliance with a bulk sales law, by a person who died soon after the sale, a creditor might bring a bill in equity for the appointment of a receiver, and for the sale of the goods and a distribution of the proceeds pro rata among the creditors, without first reducing his claim to a judgment or presenting it to the probate court for allowance. Scheve v. Vanderkolk, 97 Neb. 204, 149 N. W. 401. So creditors have a remedy by a bill in equity to set aside as fraudulent a sale of merchandise made in violation of a bulk sales law where it appears that it is practically impossible for them to reduce their claims to judgment within the ninety days allowed by the law and that no attachment lies because a statute requires actual, and not merely constructive, fraud to be shown in such a case. Guaranty Title, etc. Co. v. Pearlman, 144 Fed. 550.

It has been held that where a bulk sales law makes a sale of goods absolutely void as to creditors for a violation of its provisions, the creditors of the vendor are entitled, by a bill in equity, to reach and apply the property to a payment of their claims, and for that purpose may have a receiver, an injunction and an accounting. Humiston v. Yore, 181 Mich. 629, 148 N. W. 266; To the same effect see the reported case. And a creditor may maintain an action in the nature of a creditor's bill to have a sale of goods in violation of the terms of a bulk sales law set aside and an accounting from the vendee for the value of the goods, on the ground that the purchaser from the debtor becomes a trustee of the property purchased to the extent of the creditor's claim, and it is immaterial that the buyer may have mingled the purchased goods with property of his own so as to destroy their identity or that he has converted them into cash. Wheeler, etc. Mercantile Co. v. Moon, 49 Mont. 307, 141 Pac. 665.

Where part of a stock of goods has been sold in violation of the provisions of a bulk sales law which declares that sales so made "shall be presumed to be fraudulent" as against creditors of the seller, it has been held that the latter may proceed directly in equity against the purchaser for the value of the goods without attaching them, where it appears that part of the goods have been sold and the remainder so intermingled with new goods that it is impossible to distinguish them. Daly v. Sumpter Drug Co. 127 Tenn. 412, Ann. Cas. 1914B 1101, 155 S. W. 167, Mahoney-Jones Co. v. Sams, 128 Tenn. 207, 159 S. W. 1094.

Where, however, the remedy at law by attachment against a fraudulent debtor is complete and available a creditor will be denied a remedy by injunction and the appointment of a temporary receiver. Carstarphen Warehouse Co. v. Fried, 124 Ga. 544, 52 S. E. 598.

In Muller v. Hubschman, 84 N. J. Eq. 30, 96 Atl. 189, a bill brought by a creditor to obtain a money decree against the purchaser and his vendee of goods which were sold in violation of a bulk sales law which law made the sale voidable as against creditors of the seller, was held not to be maintainable without a showing that the complainant was a creditor who had acquired by judgment and execution or otherwise a lien on the goods in question. The court said: "Its purpose, declared in its title, is the prevention of fraud. Because proof of fraud is sometimes so difficult, it goes to the extent of annulling an entire class of sales, innocent or fraudulent, as against the vendor's creditors, unless certain prescribed steps are taken whose object is to notify them of the contemplated sale. The act so far restricts the seller in the enjoyment of his property rights that some courts have held similar, though perhaps somewhat more drastic, legislation to be unconstitutional. . . . It yet remains true that, if a creditor must clothe himself with a judgment before he can take advantage of that provision of the statute of frauds (section 12) which declares void every conveyance of goods and chattels contrived in fraud with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, so must he where the right is given to attack a transaction that may be innocent and is only voidable because the statute makes it so."

It was held in Bixler v. Fry, 157 Mich. 314, 122 N. W. 119, 16 Detroit Leg. N. 411, by an equally divided court that a bill in equity would not lie in favor of a creditor of one who sold his goods without complying with the bulk sales law, thereby rendering the sale void as to his creditors, where it appeared that the creditor had an adequate remedy at law and had not reduced his claim to a judgment. And in Rubinsky v. Spiro, 60 Misc. 582, 113 N. Y. S. 852, it was held that a creditor at large had no standing in equity to set aside a sale of goods in violation of the terms of a bulk sales law until he had recovered a judgment against the debtor and had made a return of the execution as unsatisfied.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL

v.

ALLEN ET AL.

England—Court of Appeal—May 28, 1914.

[1914] 3 K. B. 642.

Restrictive Covenant — Enforcement against Subpurchaser — Covenantee Owning no Adjoining Land.

A restrictive covenant which does not run with the land will not be enforced in equity against a purchaser from the covenantor, though he bought with notice of the covenant, if the covenantee owns no land adjoining that to which the covenant relates.

[642] Appeal from the judgment of Avory J. at the trial without a jury of an action for breach of a covenant dated January 24, 1907.

In November, 1906, the defendant M. J. Allen, who was a builder, applied to the plaintiffs under s. 7 of the London [643] Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cccxiii), for their sanction to form and lay out on certain land a new street, called Galloway Road, running from south to north, and a new street at the northern end of Galloway Road running from east to west in continuation of a road called Dunraven Street. The plaintiffs, by their Building Act Committee, gave their sanction on condition that the applicant entered into a deed of covenant not to erect any building, structure, or other erection on two plots of land coloured green on the plan, the object being to afford facilities for the continuation of the proposed streets. Accordingly by an indenture dated January 24, 1907, and made between the plaintiffs and the defendant M. J. Allen (therein called the applicant), the latter entered into the following covenant: "The applicant doth hereby for himself, his heirs and assigns, and other the persons claiming under him, and so far as practicable to bind the land and hereditaments herein mentioned into whosoever hands the same may come, covenant and agree with the council that he and they will not erect or place, or cause or permit to be erected or placed, any building, structure, or other erection upon the land shewn by green colour on the said plan, without the previous consent in writing of the council so to do, and that on every conveyance, sale, charge, mortgage, lease, assignment, or other dealing with the land herein mentioned or any part thereof he will give notice of the aforesaid covenant in every conveyance, transfer, mortgage, charge, lease, assignment, or other document by which such dealing is effected." The portions coloured green were two, namely, plot 1, being a continuation to the westward of Dunraven Street, and plot 2, being a continuation to the northward of Galloway Road. M. J. Allen was erroneously described in the deed as the owner in fee simple of the land, whereas at that date he had only an option to purchase it.

With regard to plot 1, this plot was with certain other land conveyed to M. J. Allen in fee simple on July 3, 1908. On the same day he conveyed it together with other property to one Willcocks by way of mortgage as security for an advance. On [644] August 1, 1911, the mortgage debt due to Willcocks was paid off, and Willcocks, with the concurrence of M. J. Allen, conveyed the land to the defendant Emily Allen, the wife of M. J. Allen, in fee simple freed and discharged from the mortgage. Meanwhile, in July, 1911, Emily Allen commenced to build and completed three houses on the plot, and on October 9, 1911, she conveyed the plot with the houses thereon to the defendant Norris in fee simple by way of mortgage as security for an advance. On August 5, 1911, the present action was brought against the defendant M. J. Allen. Emily Allen was added as a defendant on October 31, 1911, and subsequently Norris was also added as a defendant.

With regard to plot 2 the defendant M. J. Allen erected a wall, one brick thick and six feet high, on it at the northern end of Galloway Road, and he contended that this wall was not a "building, structure, or other erection" within the meaning of the covenant, and that it was erected solely for the purpose of protecting persons using the road, as the land at this point had a sharp fall in the surface of the ground.

The plaintiffs claimed as against the Allen defendants (1.) a declaration that neither M. J. Allen nor Emily Allen was entitled to erect or place or cause to be erected or placed any building, structure, or other erection upon either of the plots; (2.) an order directing M. J. Allen or alternatively Emily Allen to pull down and remove the houses erected on plot 1; (3.) an order directing M. J. Allen to pull down and remove the wall erected on plot 2; (4.) an injunction restraining M. J. Allen or alternatively Emily Allen from erecting, etc., any building, etc., upon plot 1, and a similar injunction against M. J. Allen as to plot 2; (5.) damages. The plaintiffs claimed as against the defendant Norris (1.) a declaration that he was not entitled to retain upon plot 1 the three houses or any other building, structure, or other erection; (2.) an order directing him to pull down and remove or to concur with Allen defendants in pulling down and removing the houses.

The defendants Norris and Emily Allen pleaded (so far as material) (1.) that each of them was, as purchaser and mortgagee plot 1 respectively, a purchaser for value without notice, [645] and acquired the legal estate and title therein through Willcocks, who was himself a purchaser for value without notice of the deed of covenant; (2.) that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action against them. The contention upon this second plea was that, assuming that the defendants had notice of the covenant, inasmuch as the plaintiffs neither owned nor were interested in any adjoining or neighbouring land for the protection or benefit of which the covenant was imposed, the defendants, as derivative owners of plot 1, were not bound by the covenant.

It was admitted that the covenant did not run with the land at law.

With regard to plot 1, Avory J., upon the first plea, was not satisfied that Emily Allen had not notice of the restrictive covenant, and he came to the conclusion that Norris and Willcocks had constructive notice of the covenant. Upon the second plea he held that, having regard to the powers vested in the plaintiffs under ss. 7 and 9 of the London Building Act, 1894, the contention failed. He declined, however, in the circumstances, in the exercise of his discretion, to grant a mandatory injunction to pull down the houses, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs as against the defendants M. J. Allen and Emily Allen for 40s. nominal damages and the costs of the action, and he gave judgment for the defendant Norris and ordered him to pay his own costs, giving him leave to appeal on the question of costs.

With regard to plot 2 the learned judge held that the wall was a "structure" or "erection" within the meaning of the covenant, and made an order against M. J. Allen to pull down and remove the wall.

All the defendants appealed.

Upon the appeal of the defendants Norris and Emily Allen the point of law was argued first, as to whether, assuming that they had notice of the restrictive covenant, the covenant was enforceable against them.

[651] BUCKLEY, L. J.—This action is brought by the London County Council upon an indenture dated January 24, 1907, made between the defendant Morris Joseph Allen of the one part and the London County Council of the other part, claiming certain mandatory injunctions and damages for breach of a covenant contained in that indenture. Before the date of the execution of the deed the defendant M. J. Allen had applied to the London County Council for their permission under s. 7 of the London Building Act, 1894, to his laying out a certain new road, called Galloway Road, running from south [652] to north, and a further small portion of road at the northern end of Galloway Road running from east to west in continuation of a road called Dunraven Street. The London County Council gave their permission upon the terms, amongst other things, that this defendant should enter a certain deed of covenant, and that was the deed of January 24, 1907. The covenant in question was as follows: "The applicant" (that is to say, the defendant M. J. Allen) "doth hereby for himself, his heirs and assigns, and other the persons claiming under him, and so far as practicable to bind the land and hereditaments herein mentioned into whosoever hands the same may come, covenant and agree with the council that he and they will not erect or place, or cause or permit to be erected or placed, any building, structure, or other erection upon the land shewn by green colour on the said plan without the previous consent in writing of the council so to do, and that on every conveyance, sale, charge, mortgage, lease, assignment, or other dealing with the land herein mentioned or any part thereof he will give notice of the aforesaid covenant in every conveyance, transfer, mortgage, charge, lease, assignment, or other document by which such dealing is effected." The deed recited (but contrary to the fact) that the applicant was the owner in fee simple of the land in question. He was not. He had at the date of this deed of covenant merely an option of purchase, which might or might not result in his becoming owner of the land. The portions coloured green were two, namely, plot No. 1, being the continuation of Dunraven Street to the west of Galloway Road, and plot No. 2, being the continuation of Galloway Road to the north of Dunraven Street. It is necessary to deal with these two plots separately.

First as regards plot No. 1. On July 3, 1908, this was conveyed to the defendant M. J. Allen in fee. On the same day he mortgaged it with other land to one Willcocks to secure a sum of 3600*l.* On August 1, 1911, the mortgage was redeemed, and Willcocks with the concurrence of Allen conveyed the land discharged from the incumbrance to the defendant Emily Allen in fee. On October 9, 1911, Mrs. Allen charged the land together with the three messuages then recently erected thereon to the defendant Norris in fee by way of mortgage. In the interval, [653] namely, in July, 1911, Mrs. Allen built on plot No. 1 and completed by the end of that month three houses. The writ in this action was issued on August 5, 1911.

By virtue of ss. 7 and 9 of the London Building Act, 1894, the London County Council have certain powers of control over land which the owner proposes to form or lay out in streets. But they have no estate or interest in such land. The plaintiffs at the date of the deed of covenant had no estate or interest in any land adjoining or in any manner affected by the observance or non-observance of the covenant contained in the deed. Under these circumstances the defendants Mrs. Allen and Norris, who were not covenanting parties, contend upon this appeal that as matter of law, assuming that there has been a breach of the covenant contained in the deed of January 24, 1907, and assuming (although as matter of separate contention they deny it as a fact) that they had notice of that covenant, the plaintiffs cannot as against them maintain any action upon the covenant contained in the deed. The short proposition is that as matter of law a derivative owner of land, deriving title under a person who has entered into a restrictive covenant concerning the land, is not bound by the covenant even if he took with notice of its existence if the covenantee has no land adjoining or affected by the observance or non-observance of the covenant. I proceed to examine how the law upon this point stands upon the authorities.

The respondents do not contend that the covenant here in question runs with the land. It is the better opinion, and in Austerberry v. Oldham Corp. (1885) 29 Ch. D. 750, the Court of Appeals by way of opinion and not of decision held, that the burden of a covenant, not involving a grant, never runs with the land at law except as between landlord and tenant. Cotton L.J. at p. 776 said: "In order that the benefit may run with the land, the covenant must be one which relates to or touches and concerns the land of the covenantee." The relation of landlord and tenant did not in the present case subsist between the plaintiffs, the covenantees, and M. J. Allen, the covenantor. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs admit that this covenant did not run with the land at law. As between the covenantee and the owner [654] deriving title under the covenantor there is no privity of contract, and the law is that it is only where there is privity of estate between landlord and tenant that the burden of a covenant will run with the land. Ownership of land both by covenantor and covenantee must exist in order that Spencer's Case, 5 Coke 16a, 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 11th ed. 55, shall apply, and that the covenant shall run with the land. But it does not follow that the covenantee is without remedy where the covenant does not run with the land. Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, established that as between the grantor of a restrictive covenant affecting certain land and the owner of adjoining land the covenantee may in equity enforce the covenant against the derivative owner taking with notice. The reasoning of Lord Cottenham's judgment in Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, is that if an owner of land sells part of it reserving the rest, and takes from his purchaser a covenant that the purchaser shall use or abstain from using the land purchased in a particular way, that covenant (being one for the protection of the land reserved) is enforceable against a sub-purchaser with notice. The reason given is that, if that were not so, it would be impossible for an owner of land to sell part of it without incurring the risk of rendering what he retains worthless. If the vendor has retained no land which can be protected by the restrictive covenant, the basis of the reasoning of the judgment is swept away. In Haywood v. Brunswick Permanent Ben. Bldg. Soc. (1891) 8 Q. B. D. 403, the Court of Appeal declined to extend the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, to covenants other than restrictive covenants. They rejected the doctrine that, inasmuch as the defendants took the land with notice of the covenants, they were bound in equity to perform them. That therefore is not the principle upon which the equitable doctrine rests. In the present case we are asked to extend the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, so as to affirm that restrictive covenant can be enforced against a derivative owner taking with notice by a person who never has had or who does not retain any land to be protected by the restrictive covenant in question. In my opinion the doctrine does not extend to that case. The doctrine is that a covenant not running [655] with the land, but being a negative covenant entered into by an owner of land with an adjoining owner, binds the land in equity and is enforceable against a derivative owner taking with notice. The doctrine ceases to be applicable when the person seeking to enforce the covenant against the derivative owner has no land to be protected by the negative covenant. The fact of notice is in that case irrelevant.

The particular equity recognized in Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, has been said to be analogous to an equitable charge upon land subsisting in the owner of the adjoining land, or to a negative easement enjoyed, not in gross, but by the adjoining land over the land to which the covenant relates. It arises from the possession by the covenantee of land enjoying the benefit of the negative covenant coupled with notice of the existence of the covenant. In London etc. R. Co. v. Gomm, 20 Ch. D. 562, at p. 583, Sir George Jessel says: "The doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2

Phil. 774, rightly considered, appears to me to be either an extension in equity of the doctrine of Spencer's Case, 5 Coke 16a, 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 11th ed. p. 55, to another line of cases, or else an extension in equity of the doctrine of negative easements; such, for instance, as a right to the access of light, which prevents the owner of the servient tenement from building so as to obstruct the light. The covenant in Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, was affirmative in its terms, but was held by the Court to imply negative. Where there is a negative covenant expressed or implied, as, for instance, not to build so as to obstruct a view, or not to use a piece of land otherwise than as a garden, the Court interferes on one or other of the above grounds. This is an equitable doctrine, establishing an exception to the rules of common law which did not treat such a covenant as running with the land, and it does not matter whether it proceeds on analogy to a covenant running with the land or on analogy to an easement." At p. 587 Lindley J.L. says: "The first thing therefore the plaintiffs must shew is, upon what legal principle the defendant is bound by a contract into which he did not enter. . . . Upon what principle is it that he is bound in equity? It is said that he is bound in equity [656] because he bought the land knowing of the covenant into which his predecessor in title had entered. That proposition stated generally assumes that every purchaser of land with notice of covenants into which his vendor has entered with reference to the land is bound in equity by all those covenants. That is precisely the proposition which had to be considered in Haywood v. Brunswick Permanent Ben. Bldg. Soc. 8 Q. B. D. 403, and because it was sought there to extend the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, to a degree which was thought dangerous, considerable pains were taken by the Court to point out the limits of that doctrine."

In In re Nisbet, etc. Contract [1905] 1 Ch. 391; [1906] 1 Ch. 386, this view of the matter is I think accepted, and in Formby v. Barker [1903] 1 Ch. 539, and Millbourn v. Lyons [1914] 1 Ch. 34 (since affirmed by the Court of Appeal [1914] 2 Ch. 231), that review was, I think, definitely accepted by the Court of Appeal. In Formby v. Barker [1903] 2 Ch. 539, the question arose between the assign of the covenantee and the derivative owner deriving title under the covenantor. So much of the judgment as relates to derivative title in the plaintiff is not pertinent to the present case. The London County Council have never assigned. They are original not derivative owners of the benefit of the easement. But the case is directly in point as regards the right of a proper plaintiff to sue the owner deriving title under the cove-nantor. There are interlocutory observations made during the argument which are important; for instance, at p. 543, Romer L.J. referring to Spencer's Case, 5 Coke 16a, 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 11th ed. 55, and to Stokes v. Russell, 3 T. R. 678, says: "In equity you could only sue on such a covenant in respect of some land;" and Vaughan Williams, L.J.: "The plaintiff has no estate for the benefit of which the covenant was entered into." Vaughan Williams, L.J., in the course of his judgment, at p. 549, pointed out that the plaintiff's testator had conveyed his whole estate, and had no contiguous estate which would be benefited by the covenant, and at p. 550, after pointing out that the [657] vendor had sold all his land, he goes on to say: "It becomes necessary therefore to ascertain whether the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, applies to a case in which the vendor sells his whole estate. I have not been able to find any case in which, after the sale of the whole of an estate in land, the benefit of a restrictive covenant has been enforced by injunction against an assignee of the purchaser at the instance of a plaintiff having no land retained by the vendor, although there are cases in which restrictive covenants seem to have been enforced at the instance of plaintiffs, other than the vendor, for the benefit of whose land it appears from the terms of the covenant, or can it be inferred from surrounding circumstances, that the covenant was intended to operate. In all other cases the restrictive covenant would seem to be a mere personal covenant collateral to the conveyance. It is a covenant which cannot run with the land either at law or in equity, and therefore the burden of the covenant cannot be enforced against an assignee of the purchaser." He then goes on to negative the proposition that the doctrine is based upon obligations on the conscience of the purchaser taking with notice of the covenant, quoting Collins L.J. in Rogers v. Hosegood [1900] 2 Ch. 388, at p. 407: "The covenant must be one that is capable of running with the land before the question of the purchaser's conscience and the equity affecting it can come into discussion." There is a further passage, at p. 552, which I do not read at length. Romer L.J. gave judgment principally upon the question of the effect of the fact that the plaintiff was administratrix of the covenantee, but he says (at p. 554): "If restrictive covenants are entered into with a covenantee, not in respect of or concerning any ascertainable property belonging to him, or in which he is interested, then the covenant must be regarded, so far as he is concerned, as a personal covenant—that is, as one obtained by him for some personal purpose or object." Stirling L.J. agreed with the other members of the Court and dwelt upon the fact that the covenantee was not entitled to any land for the protection or benefit of which the restrictive covenants were or could be intended. Upon these judgments, and particularly upon the principal judgment as delivered by Vaughan Williams L.J., [658] it seems to me that the Court of Appeal affirmed the view taken by Sir George Jessel that the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, was either an extension of Spencer's Case, 5 Coke 16a, 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 11th ed. 55, or of the equitable doctrine of negative easements, regarding it as something arising from the relation of two estates, the one to the other. In Milbourn v. Lyons [1914] 1 Ch. 34, 2 Ch. 231, the decision rests upon a similar view. Inasmuch as at the date when the covenant was taken the covenantee had no land to which the benefit of the covenant could be attached, it was held that the benefit of the restrictive covenant could not enure against a derivative owner even where he took with notice. I have had the advantage of reading an advance copy of the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal. They all adopt this view.

On the other hand the decisions of the Court of Appeal in Catt v. Tourle, L. R. 4 Ch. 654, and of Fry J. in Luker v. Dennis, 7 Ch. D. 227, undoubtedly create a difficulty. In Catt v. Tourle, L. R. 4 Ch. 654, Selwyn L. J. referred to Wilson v. Hart (1866) L. R. 1 Ch. 463. But that is a case upon which the difficulty, as it seems to me, does not arise. The land there was part of a building estate, and it would seem that there were other lands of the covenantee in respect of which the benefit of the covenant might be enjoyed. I do not, it is true, find that that was the case in Catt v. Tourle, L. R. 4 Ch. 654. But on the other hand the Court do not seem to have considered and given judgment upon the exact point here raised, namely, whether the covenantee had any land in respect of which the benefit could be enjoyed. The question of fact, whether there was or not ownership of other land, is nowhere mentioned either affirmatively or negatively, and no decision was given upon the point now under consideration. The concluding words of Selwyn L.J.'s judgment are not consistent with later authorities. Upon the general abstract question, whether a person purchasing with such a covenant, as there mentioned, is to be bound by it, the answer must be in the negative. Notwithstanding what was said by Knight Bruce L.J. in De Mattos v. Gibson, 4 De G. & J. 276, at p. 282, it is not true as a general proposition [659] that a purchaser of property with notice of a restrictive covenant affecting the property is bound by the covenant. This may be illustrated by the cases relating to the sale of chattels, such as Taddy v. Sterious [1904] 1 Ch. 354, and McGruther

v. Pitcher [1904] 2 Ch. 306. The proposition is true only in certain cases, such as Spencer's Case, 5 Coke 16a, 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 11th ed. p. 55, and Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774. The passage already quoted from Lindley L.J. in London, etc. R. Co. v. Gomm, 20 Ch. D. 587, and the decision in Haywood v. Brunswick Permanent Ben. Bldg. Soc. 8 Q. B. D. 403, are enough to dispose of this point. In Luker v. Dennis, 7 Ch. D. 227, the covenant related as well to a public-house which was leased by the brewer to the covenanting publican, as also to another public-house which the publican held under a different landlord, and Fry J. held that the covenant was binding in equity upon an assignee of the second public-house who had notice of the covenant. The point here in question certainly arose, but the point which the learned judge expressly decided was another, namely, that Keppell v. Bailey (1834; 2 My. & K. 517, had been displaced by Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774. The decision in Luker v. Dennis, 7 Ch. D. 227, was in 1877, and since that date this doctrine has been so examined and developed by London, etc. R. Co. v. Gomm, 20 Ch. D. 587; Austerberry v. Oldham Corp. 29 Ch. D. 750, and quite recently by Formby v. Barker [1903] 2 Ch. 539, and Milbourn v. Lyons [1914] 1 Ch. 34 [1914] 2 Ch. 231; that it cannot I think be relied upon as now accurately stating the law. Further, as regards Catt v. Tourle, L. R. 4 Ch. 654, which was a decision of the Court of Appeal, we are of course bound by that decision, but again that was in 1869, and since that date the decisions to which I have referred seem to me to have recognized and established the principle to which we are bound to give effect, and, as I have already pointed out, the decision in Catt v. Tourle, L. R. 4 Ch. 654, does not deal with the exact point now in debate. As regards Clegg v. Hands, 44 Ch. D. 503, I do not feel any difficulty. The case was one as between lessor and lessee.

[660] Upon the authorities, therefore, as a whole I am of opinion that the doctrine in Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, does not extend to the case in which the covenantee has no land capable of enjoying, as against the land of the covenantor, the benefit of the restrictive covenant. The doctrine is either an extension in equity of the doctrine in Spencer's Case, 5 Coke 16a, 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 11th ed. p. 55 (in which ownership of land by both covenantor and covenantee is essential) or an extension in equity of the doctrine of negative easements, a doctrine applicable not to the case of easements in gross, but to an easement enjoyed by one land upon another land. Where the covenantee has no land, the derivative owner claiming under the covenantor is bound neither in contract nor by the equitable doctrine which attaches in the case where there is land capable of enjoying the restrictive covenant.

The appeal of Emily Allen and Norris upon the point of law in my opinion succeeds.

Under these circumstances it is not necessary to determine whether they had notice or not. Upon that question we have not heard the appellants. But if this case should go further, that point will be open to them in the House of Lords.

As regards the defendant M. J. Allen, he is not within the considerations above dealt with. He was the covenanting party. The erection of the three houses was a breach of covenant. The learned judge has refused any injunction but has given nominal damages for the technical breach. He has also given the plaintiffs, as against this defendant, the general costs of the action. The only matter which here requires observation is the question of costs. I will mention this presently.

Secondly as regards plot No. 2, the only defendant concerned in this matter is the defendant M. J. Allen. He contends first that the wall which he erected on this plot was not a building, erection, or other structure within the covenant. The object of the covenant was to secure that plot No. 2 should remain unobstructed so as to be available for the extension of Galloway Road to the north. The wall is an erection which creates such an obstruction. It is, within the literal words of the deed, an erection or structure, and it is within the object of the deed. [661] It is to my mind plain that its erection was a breach of the covenant. But further, this defendant says that there was at this place a sharp drop in the surface of the soil, and that a fence was necessary for the protection of the public; that the wall was only a 9-inch wall bonded into the walls on either side of the roadway to prevent it from falling, and was no more than a temporary fence. If this had been the case put forward at the trial there would have been no difficulty in the matter. This defendant might have offered an undertaking to remove this which he says is a mere temporary fence, if and when requested to do so. He did nothing of the sort. He maintained that it was no breach of the covenant, and that he was entitled to maintain it. In this, in my judgment, he was wrong. In the absence of such an undertaking or offer the order to pull down this wall was, I think, rightly made.

As regards the order for costs as against the defendant M. J. Allen, I have felt some doubt whether the costs ought not to have been divided as between the two plots. As regards plot No. 2 the defendant M. J. Allen was wrong, and would have to pay the plaintiffs' costs. As regards plot No. 1 the plaintiffs failed in obtaining the order to pull down for which they asked, and they recovered merely nominal damages. I have doubted whether in respect of this latter part of the action they ought to have costs against the defendant Allen, but I have arrived at the conclusion that the case is not one in which we ought to interfere. The learned judge in his discretion did not think proper to divide the costs as above suggested, and in giving the general costs as against the defendant M. J. Allen I think he was making an order which we ought not to review.

The result is that as against the defendants Emily Allen and Norris the action will be dismissed with costs, including their costs in this Court, and as regards M. J. Allen his appeal will be dismissed with costs.

KENNEDY, L.J.—I have had an opportunity of reading and considering the judgments in this case which have been prepared by Buckley L.J. and Scrutton J. I concur in the conclusions at which they have arrived. I only [662] desire to add that, as regards plot No. 1 and the demurrers raised by Mrs. Allen and Mr. Norris to the plaintiffs' claim in regard to that property, I concur because, as the judgments of my colleagues point out, the most recent decisions of this Court, and especially the decision in Formby v. Parker [1903] 2 Ch. 539, bind us, I think, so to hold, whatever might be my own opinion if I was not controlled by such recent decisions, but free, in accordance with judicial authority in earlier cases which Scrutton J. has cited in order of date, from Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, down to the year 1882, to treat a restrictive covenant in regard to the use of land as enforceable in equity at the suit of the covenantee, although he may retain no other land which can be affected by the covenant, against an assign of the covenantor who has acquired the land with notice of the restrictive covenant.

SCRUTTON, J.—In this case the London County Council, on January 24, 1907, entered into an indenture with one Morris Joseph Allen, a builder, describing himself as "the owner in fee simple of certain land," by which he "doth hereby for himself, his heirs and assigns, and other the persons claiming under him, and so far as practicable to bind the land and hereditaments herein mentioned into whosoever hands the same may come, covenant and agree with the council that he and they will not erect or place, or cause or permit to be erected or placed, any building, structure, or other erection upon the land shewn by green colour on the said plan, without the previous consent in writing of the council so to do, and that on every conveyance, sale, charge, mortgage, lease, assignment, or other dealing with the land herein mentioned or any part thereof he will give notice of the aforesaid covenant in every conveyance, transfer, mortgage, charge, lease, assignment, or other document by which such dealing is effected." The plots coloured green were two plots intended to be reserved for the making of roads. On plot No. 1, in July, 1911, three houses were built by Mrs. Allen; on plot No. 2 a wall was built by Allen. The London County Council thereupon issued a writ claiming a mandatory injunction to pull down the houses and wall respectively. Thereupon [663] it was alleged that as to plot No. 1 the legal estate was in one Norris as mortgagee, and the equity of redemption in Mrs. Allen, who had taken title from Mr. Allen and Willcocks, his mortgagee, who had no notice of the restrictive covenant; and it was contended (1.) by way of demurrer that as the London County Council were not neighbouring landowners, or grantors of the plot in question, a covenant by Allen in their favour was only a personal covenant, and could not affect the land when in the hands of assigns of Allen, whether they had notice of the covenant or not. It was said that to affect them the right must be in the nature of a negative easement; that an easement required both a dominant and a servient tenement; and that as the council had no land to which the benefit of the covenant could attach, there could be no dominant tenement, and therefore no negative easement binding on a servient tenement, but only an easement in gross, which did not bind assigns of the land. (2.) It was alleged that the defendants Mrs. Allen and Norris could prove they were purchasers for value of the legal estate without notice of the covenant, and therefore not bound by it. Avory J. found on the second contention as a fact that Mrs. Allen and Norris had not satisfied him they had not notice, actual or constructive, of the covenant. On the first contention he said: "It was contended before me that this restrictive covenant, being in the nature of a negative easement, the action would not lie except at the suit of a covenantee who was at the time of the covenant in possession of land which required protection, and that the plaintiffs were not at the time in possession of any such land. But having regard to the powers vested in the London County Council under ss. 7 and 9 of the London Building Act, 1894, and to the admission made in the argument before me that the conditions imposed in this case were not ultra vires, I think this contention fails." He apparently treated the duty and interest of the county council in the matter of new streets as sufficient to make the covenant bind the land in the hands of assigns from Allen. This Court determined to decide the first contention before hearing argument on the second, and we have now to decide on the first contention.

Counsel on each side agreed that the burden of this covenant [664] would not run with the land at law, so as to bind assigns, for the reason stated in the notes to Spencer's Case, 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 11th ed. 88, that "there appears to be no authority which has decided, apart from the equitable doctrine of notice" (by which is meant, as hereinafter explained, the doctrine identified with the case of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774), "that the burden of a covenant will run with land in any case except that of landlord and tenant." This opinion appears to be justified by the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Austerberry v. Oldham Corp. 29 Ch. D. 750, especially that of Lindley L.J. at p. 781 and of Fry L.J. at p. 784.

The question then is whether it is essential to the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, that the covenantee should have at the time of the creation of the covenant, and afterwards, land for the benefit of which the covenant is created, in order that the burden of the covenant may bind assigns of the land to which it relates. It is clear that the covenantee may sue the covenantor himself, though the former has parted with the land to which the covenant relates: Stokes v. Russell, 3 T. R. 678. To answer the question as to the assigns of the covenantor, and the land in their hands, requires the investigation of the historical growth of the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774. Though the covenantee in that case did hold adjacent land, there is no trace in the judgment of Lord Cottenham of the requirement that the covenantee should have and continue to hold land to be benefited by the covenant. I read Lord Cottenham's judgment as proceeding entirely on the question of notice of the covenant, and on the equitable ground that a man purchasing land with notice that there was a covenant not to use it in a particular way would not be allowed to violate the covenant he knew of when he bought the land. Lord Cottenham states the question, "Whether a party shall be permitted to use the land in a manner inconsistent with the contract entered into by his vendor and with notice of which he purchased," and answers it: "If there was a mere agreement and no covenant, this Court would enforce it against a party purchasing with notice of it; for if an equity is attached to the [665] property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased."

Up to 1881, when counsel in Haywood v. Brunswick Permanent Ben. Bldg. Soc. 8 Q. B. D. 403, stated (at p. 405) that Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, had been applied in fifteen cases, I cannot trace, nor could counsel before us discover, that Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, had been based on anything but notice of the covenant by the assignee. In the case cited, in which the Court of Appeal refused to extend the doctrine to an affirmative covenant to repair, Lindley L.J. said (at p. 410): "The result of these cases is that only such a covenant as can be complied with without expenditure of money will be enforced against the assignee on the ground of notice." Brett L.J. said (at p. 408): "That case" (Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774) "decided that an assignee taking land subject to a certain class of covenants is bound by such covenants if he has notice of them, and that the class of covenants comprehended within the rule is that covenants restricting the mode of using the land only will be enforced." Cotton L.J., after citing Lord Cottenham that "No one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased," said (at p. 409): "This lays down the real principle that an equity attaches to the owner of the land." Meanwhile in De Mattos v. Gibson, 4 De G. & J. 276, at p. 282, in 1858, Knight Bruce L.J. had put the principle as applying to all property thus: "Reason and justice seem to prescribe that, at least as a general rule, where a man, by gift or purchase, acquires property from another, with knowledge of a previous contract, lawfully and for valuable consideration made by him with a third person, to use and employ the property for a particular purpose in a specified manner, the acquirer shall not, to the material damage of the third person, in opposition to the contract and inconsistently with it, use and employ the property in a manner not allowable to the giver or seller," resting the matter on knowledge of the previous contract, that is notice. In Catt v. Tourle, L. R. 4 Ch. 654, in 1869, A., a brewer, had sold land to B. with a covenant that he should have the exclusive [666] right to supply all ale consumed in any public-house erected on the land. C., with knowledge of the covenant, bought part of the land from B., erected a public-house on it, but did not take his beer from A. The Court of Appeal, citing De Mattos v. Gibson, 4 De G. & J. 276, at p. 282, restrained C., treating the covenant as negative, and resting the judgment on the ground L. R. 4 Ch. at p. 657 that C. "clearly purchased with notice of the present covenant, and . . . cannot be heard to say that he is now entitled to disregard its provisions." It is to be noted that A. is not stated to have owned any land, and as he might brew beer anywhere, the covenant could not relate to any particular land of his.

In Luker v. Dennis, 7 Ch. D. 227, in 1877, A., a brewer, granted a lease to B. of public-house X., with a covenant that B. should take from him all beer consumed not only in X., but also in public-house Y., which B. held of a different landlord. C. took public-house

Y. from B. with notice of the covenant, and did not take his beer from A. It was argued before Fry J. that notice was not enough unless the covenantee had some interest in the land bound by the covenant, either as vendor or lessor. That learned judge refused to accede to this argument, and, citing De Mattos v. Gibson, 4 De G. & J. 276, at p. 282, and Catt v. Tourle, L. R. 4 Ch. 654, granted the injunction, giving, as he said (at p. 236), "effect to the equitable doctrine of notice." I think up to this point the doctrine had been rested on notice, and did not depend on the covenantee having land in favour of which the covenant was created.

The first departure from this position occurs in the judgment of Jessel M.R. in London, etc. R. Co. v. Gomm, 20 Ch. D. 562, at p. 583, in March, 1882. The contract to be enforced was one to reconvey land on notice, and clearly therefore an affirmative covenant, and, as such, within the doctrine laid down in Haywood's Case, 8 Q. B. D. 403, in December, 1881, excluding such contracts from the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774. The Court also held that the sale was ultra vires the railway company, and void for remoteness. [667] But Sir George Jessel, holding that the covenant did, but for its being ultra vires and void, create an interest in the land, discussed the nature of the right. He said: "The doctrine of that case," (Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774) "rightly considered, appears to me to be either an extension in equity of the doctrine of Spencer's Case, 5 Coke 16a, 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 11th ed. p. 55, 2 Y. 2, to another line of cases, or else an extension in equity of the doctrine of negative easements; such, for instance, as a right to the access of light, which prevents the owner of the servient tenement from building so as to obstruct the light. The covenant in Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, was affirmative in its terms, but was held by the Court to imply a negative. Where there is a negative covenant expressed or implied, as, for instance, not to build so as to obstruct a view, or not to use a piece of land otherwise than as a garden, the Court interferes on one or other of the above grounds. This is an equitable doctrine, establishing an exception to the rules of common law which did not treat such a covenant as running with the land, and it does not matter whether it proceeds on analogy to a covenant running with the land or on analogy to an easement. The purchaser took the estate subject to the equitable burden, with the qualification that if he acquired the legal estate for value without notice he was freed from the burden. That qualification, however, did not affect the nature of the burden; the notice was required merely to avoid the effect of the legal estate, and did not create the right, and if the purchaser took only an equitable estate he took subject to the burden, whether he had notice or not." It will be noticed that the equitable estate or burden was held to arise independent of notice; which I respectfully think was contrary to the previous authorities; and that in Sir George Jessel's view it did not matter whether it was by analogy to covenants running with the land, or on analogy to an easement. Both, however, had this in common, that some land belonging to the covenantee was required, either for him to let, that the covenant might run with the land, or as a dominant tenement for the easement, an easement in gross being merely a personal right. Whether the "analogy" or "extension" spoken of by Sir [668] George Jessel involved this condition as to land is not discussed. The other members of the Court did not discuss the foundation of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, though Lindley L.J. seems again to put it on notice. Catt v. Tourle, L. R. 4 Ch. 654,—a decision of the Court of Appeal—and Luker v. Dennis, 7 Ch. D. 227, were not cited to the Court.

In 1890, in Clegg v. Hands, 44 Ch. D. 503, the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, was applied by the Court of Appeal to a case somewhat similar to Catt v. Tourle, L. R. 4 Ch. 654, without any discussion of Sir George Jessel's explanation of the doctrine, the case, however, being one of landlord and tenant. In Rogers v. Hosegood [1900] 2 Ch. 388, in 1900, A., the mortgagor, and B., the mortgagee, of some land, conveyed plot X. to C., who entered into a restrictive covenant with the mortgagor only, who had not the legal estate in the land. This plot X. was purchased by D. with notice of the restrictive covenant. A. also conveyed some of his adjoining land, plot Y., to E., who had no notice of the restrictive covenant on plot X. D. then proceeded to erect buildings on plot X. said to contravene the restrictive covenant. E. then sued D. to enforce the covenant. Farwell J. (at p. 394) treated D. as obviously bound by the covenant. "He is obviously bound, by reason of notice, whether the covenant as regards him runs with the land or not." (This expression of the reason why he is bound does not harmonize with the later decisions, but does, I think, with all the earlier ones.) And he held that the benefit of the covenant passed to E. at law running with his land. There was an appeal. In the course of the argument of Mr. Haldane, Q.C., that the covenant ran with the land in equity, Rigby L.J. said: "I do not think any covenant runs with the land in equity. The equitable doctrine is that a person who takes with notice of a covenant is bound by it;" a remark again which seems to me to harmonize with the earlier authorities. The Court held that the benefit of the covenant did not run with the land at law, as the covenantee, the mortgagor, had no legal interest in the land, but did run with the land in equity, as there was a clear intention to benefit that land, and equity would regard [669] the mortgagor as the owner, and, citing Jessel M.R. in London, etc. R. Co. v. Gomm, 20 Ch. D. at p. 583, continued at p. 405: "These observations, which are just as applicable to the benefit reserved as to the burden imposed, shew that in equity, just as at law, the first point to be determined is whether the covenant or contract in its inception binds the land. If it does, it is then capable of passing with the land to subsequent assignees; if it does not, it is incapable of passing by mere assignment of the land. The benefit may be annexed to one plot and the burden to another, and when this has been once clearly done the benefit and the burden pass to the respective assignees, subject, in the case of the burden, to proof that the legal estate, if acquired, has been acquired with notice of the covenant." This makes land bound or benefited by the covenant essential to bind or benefit assigns. The judgment proceeds: "These authorities" (Renals v. Cowlishaw, 9 Ch. D. 125, at p. 130, and Child v. Douglas (1854) Kay 560, at p. 571), "establish the proposition that, when the benefit has been once clearly annexed to one piece of land, it passes by assignment of that land, and may be said to run with it, in contemplation as well of equity as of law, without proof of special bargain or representation on the assignment. In such a case it runs, not because the conscience of either party is affected, but because the purchaser has bought something which inhered in or was annexed to the land bought. This is the reason why, in dealing with the burden, the purchaser's conscience is not affected by notice of covenants which were part of the original bargain on the first sale, but were merely personal and collateral, while it is affected by notice of those which touch and concern the land. The covenant must be one that is capable of running with the land before the question of the purchaser's conscience and the equity affecting it can come into discussion." This again appears to me to treat land as essential, on both sides of the covenant, to affect assigns whether of the benefit or burden.

This view seems to me to be adopted also by the Court of Appeal in Formby v. Barker [1903] 2 Ch. 539. A., the owner of land, conveyed [670] all his land with a restrictive covenant against its being used in particular ways to B., who assigned it to C., who had notice of the covenant. A. died; C. began to use the land in a way forbidden by the covenant; the administratrix of A., who had no land, sued C. It was argued that the right to enforce such a covenant depended entirely on notice; members of the Court suggested in argument that the benefit of the covenant, if not pursued by the covenantee, must follow some land; and this was the argument put forward for the defendant, that without land the covenant was only one in gross. Romer L.J. asked (at p. 546), "Is there any case in which it has been held that such a covenant purporting to bind land for ever is valid except for the protection of an estate?" and counsel for the plaintiff did not refer him, as they might have done, to Catt v. Tourle, L. R. 4 Ch. 654, and Luker v. Dennis, 7 Ch. D. 227, in neither of which cases had the plaintiff an estate, but only a trade. In the judgments, Vaughan Williams L.J. points out that A. conveyed his whole estate and had no contiguous estate which would be benefited by the covenant in question. I refer to, but do not read, the Lord Justice's judgment on pp. 550-552, but it seems to me, adopting the language of Collins L.J. in Rogers v. Hosegood [1900] 2 Ch. 388, at p. 407, to negative the view that the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, depends on notice, and to make it depend, where there is no contractual privity, on a "relation of dominancy and servieney of lands" (p. 552), and to fail if the covenantee or his assign has no land to which the covenant relates. Romer L.J. thought that the assign of a covenantee could not sue unless the covenant related to or concerned some ascertainable property belonging to him or in which he was interested. Stirling L.J., while saying that different considerations would apply if the covenantee sued, a remark which leaves it doubtful whether he thought the covenantee could, though owning no land, have sued assigns of the land restricted, rested his judgment on the ground that damages, not injunction would be the appropriate remedy.

The doctrine was again considered, and I think further [671] developed, in In re Nisbet, etc. Contract [1905] 1 Ch. 391, in 1905. The owner of certain land had entered into restrictive covenants with the vendor, who owned an adjoining estate. A squatter, without notice of these covenants, acquired a title by adverse possession, and sold to A., who did not require a forty years' title, which would have disclosed the restrictive covenants. A. sold to B., who, having reason to believe there were restrictive covenants, declined to complete. B. took out a summons for a declaration that the title was not one which he ought to be compelled to accept. Farwell J. treated the nature of the right of action created under the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, as analogous to an equitable charge on real estate, not depending in any way on notice for its validity, but only defeated by a legal estate acquired for value and without notice. He held therefore that the squatter, though he had no notice and had the legal estate, was bound by the restrictive covenants, as apparently he only took the land subject to the equitable interest in it, and that as the purchaser from the squatter of the legal estate for value would, if he had required a forty years' title, have had notice of the covenants, he had constructive notice and was bound by the covenants. In the Court of Appeal [1906] 1 Ch. 386, the appellant argued that notice was part of the cause of action, the respondent that the doctrine rested on an interest in land, binding on the land itself, with a dominant and servient tenement. The Court of Appeal adopted the latter argument, and held that the restrictive covenant was an equitable interest in the land, whether the occupier of the land had notice of it or not, unless he had purchased the legal estate for value without notice. They do not expressly refer to the necessity of there being a dominant tenement to enforce the interest, but there was in fact such a dominant tenement in the case.

Lastly, in Millbourn v. Lyons [1914] 1 Ch. 34, where a person who had agreed to sell with a restrictive covenant died, and his personal representatives, having sold all their land, conveyed with a similar restrictive covenant, Neville J. enforced the title against a purchaser who knew of the restrictive covenant, and therefore [672] objected to complete, on the ground that there was no restriction against him, as the vendors, at the date of the covenant, had no land to which the benefit of the covenant could be attached, and the Court of Appeal affirmed his judgment on similar grounds. [1914] 2 Ch. 231.

I think the result of this long chain of authorities is that, whereas in my view, at the time of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, and for at least twenty years afterwards, the plaintiffs in this case would have succeeded against an assign on the ground that the assign had notice of the covenant, since Formby v. Barker [1903] 2 Ch. 539; In re Nisbet, etc. Contract [1905] 1 Ch. 391 [1906] 1 Ch. 386, and Millbourn v. Lyons [1914] 1 Ch. 34 [1914] 2 Ch. 231, three decisions of the Court of Appeal, the plaintiffs must fail on the ground that they have never had any land for the benefit of which this "equitable interest analogous to a negative easement" could be created, and therefore cannot sue a person who bought the land with knowledge that there was a restrictive covenant as to its use, which he proceeds to disregard, because he is not privy to the contract. I think the learned editors of Dart on Vendors and Purchasers, 7th ed. vol. ii. p. 769, are justified by the present state of the authorities in saying that "the question of notice to the purchaser has nothing whatever to do with the question whether the covenant binds him, except in so far as the absence of notice may enable him to raise the plea of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice." If the covenant does not run with the land in law, its benefit can only be asserted against an assign of the land burdened, if the covenant was made for the benefit of certain land, all or some of which remains in the possession of the covenantee or his assign, suing to enforce the covenant. It may be, if the matter is considered by a higher tribunal, that tribunal may see its way to revert to what I think was the earlier doctrine of notice, or at any rate to treat it as co-existing with the later refinement of "an equitable interest analogous to a negative easement" binding on persons who are ignorant of it. The remarks of Lord Selborne in Zetland v. Hislop, 7 App. Cas. 427, at pp. 446, 447, are not favourable [673] to the too rigid development or enforcement of the latter alternative; and the observations of Lord Macnaghten (p. 32), Lord Davey (p. 35), and Lord Lindley (p. 36) in Noakes v. Rice [1902] A. C. 24, seem to suggest that the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, may well be reconsidered and put on a proper footing. For I regard it as very regrettable that a public body should be prevented from enforcing a restriction on the use of property imposed for the public benefit against persons who bought the property knowing of the restriction, by the apparently immaterial circumstance that the public body does not own any land in the immediate neighbourhood. But, after a careful consideration of the authorities, I am forced to the view that the later decisions of this Court compel me so to hold.

In my opinion, therefore, the demurrer of Mr. Norris and of Mrs. Allen succeeds. The action against Mr. Norris must be dismissed with costs. I regret that I do not see my way to depriving Mrs. Allen of her costs, as, whatever may be her equitable rights, I am not at all favourably impressed with her conduct as a good citizen. I see no reason for interfering with the judgment against Mr. Allen in respect of plots No. 1 or No. 2, and his appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal of Norris and Emily Allen allowed; appeal of M. J. Allen dismissed.

NOTE.

Enforcement in Equity against Sub-purchaser of Restrictive Covenant Not Running with Land, Where Covenantee Has No Interest in Adjoining Land.

The reported case, while recognizing the rule that a restrictive covenant which does not run with the land may be enforced in equity against a person who purchases from the covenantor with notice, holds that the covenantee has no right to enforce the covenant under such circumstances if he has no interest in adjoining lands. To the same effect is Formby v. Barker [1903] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 539, discussed in the reported case. Similar rulings have been made in a few instances in the United States. Los Angeles University v. Swarth, 107 Fed. 798, 48 C. C. A. 647, 54 L.R.A. 262; Dana v. Wentworth, 111 Mass. 291. The decisions in those cases were placed, apparently, on the want of injury to the covenantor. See the note to Hartman v. Wells, Ann. Cas. 1914A 901, for a discussion of the question whether the right to enforce a building restriction is dependent on damage to the complainant by reason of the violation thereof. A like result was reached in Duncan v. Central Pass. R. Co. 6 Ky. L. Rep. 426, but the decision in that case was put on the ground that by selling his adjoining lands without restriction the covenantee had waived the covenant.

However, in the recent case of Van Sant v. Rost, 260 Ill. 401, 103 N. E. 194, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 186, the contrary rule was laid down. The court said: "Numerous decisions of American and English courts will be found sustaining the covenantee's right to insist upon the observance of the restrictions without making the right dependent upon his owning related land or the existence of a dominant and servient estate. In our opinion Hays v. St. Paul M. E. Church, supra [196 Ill. 633], clearly recognizes the right of a covenantee owning no neighboring land to maintain a bill to enforce observance of restrictive covenants. In that case John A. King conveyed a vacant lot at the corner of Harrison street and Ashland boulevard to the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Chicago. The deed contained a provision that it was made subject to the condition that no building should be erected on the lot further east or nearer Ashland avenue than the house immediately south of the lot conveyed. The deed was recorded, and the lot by mesne conveyances subsequently became the property of the St. Paul M. E. Church. When John A. King conveyed the lot Nellie King Hays owned the house and lot immediately south of it and John A. King owned no other property in the vicinity. The church planned to erect a building on its lot with walls nearer the street than the walls of the house of Nellie King Hays, and she filed a bill to enforce the observance of the restrictive covenants in the deed from John A. King. We quote at length from the opinion: 'It is not denied that the purchase from John A. King, and the acceptance of the conveyance subject to the provision contained in it, created a valid personal obligation to him. An owner has a right to sell and convey his property upon such terms and conditions as he may see proper, and if the terms are accepted by the grantee and are not objectionable in law they will be enforced at the suit of the one in whom the right is vested. (Frye v. Partridge, 82 Ill. 267.) If a subsequent owner has taken title with notice, either actual or constructive, of a binding agreement between his grantor and the original owner establishing a building restriction, he will be bound to abide by it and equity will enforce it. In this case there is no dispute that the defendant had notice of the building restriction from the recorded conveyance to the First Methodist Episcopal Church, and if it was imposed in favor of complainant's house and lot and for the benefit of the same, complainant would have a right to enforce it. The question is whether, by the agreement between King and his grantee, defendant's lot was burdened with the restriction for the benefit of the complainant's lot so that she can enforce the agreement. The restriction was imposed by John A. King and the agreement was with him. Complainant was a stranger to that transaction, and there was no covenant or agreement between her and the defendant or its grantor. Her right to enforce the agreement must depend upon her making it appear that it was entered into for the benefit of her lot. In making his conveyance John A. King had a legal right to impose the condition from any motive, and it is immaterial what the motive was, and he could impose it in favor of property which he did not own and which belonged to complainant, if he saw fit to do so. When he executed his deed he did not own any other property in the block or in that vicinity. He did not own the lot or house south of the premises which he conveyed and had no interest in either. He had once owned the premises and had conveyed them by warranty deed December 1, 1889, to the complainant, who is his daughter, and, as a matter of fact, the conveyance was a gift to her. There was no agreement outside of the deed, either between King and the complainant or between either of them and the grantee. To establish complainant's right she must show the intention of the restriction to have been to benefit her lot, and this intention must arise out of the language of the deed, construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances. The intention is to be ascertained as in other cases,—not by learning some secret or unexpressed intention in the mind of King, but from the language of the deed itself, considered in connection with the circumstances existing at the time it was executed. (Hutchinson v. Ulrich, 145 Ill. 336.) The defendant is bound by what it had notice of but not by secret intentions of King. If the deed, in the light of the circumstances, expresses an intention to give complainant's property the benefit of the restriction she can enforce it in behalf of that property, otherwise not. In construing the provision restrictions are not favored, although where the intent is clearly manifested the court will enforce them. When a fee is conveyed, limitations and restrictions upon the use of the property are not favored, and all doubts, as a general rule, are to be resolved against them. (Eckhart v. Irons, 128 Ill. 568; Hutchinson v. Ulrich, supra; Ewertsen v. Gertsenberg, 186 Ill. 344.) The defendant took the premises bound by the agreement, and can be restrained from violating it at the suit of anyone having the interest."

WESTERN TIE AND TIMBER COMPANY

v.

CAMPBELL ET AL.

Arkansas Supreme Court—July 6, 1914.

113 Ark. 570; 169 S. W. 253.

Mortgages — Priority Over Liens — Purchase-Money Mortgage.

A mortgage given at the time of the purchase of real estate to secure the purchase money, whether given to the vendor or to a third person, who, as a part of the same transaction, advances the purchase money, has preference over all judgments and liens against the mortgagor.

[See note at end of this case.]

Liens — Fine and Costs.

Kirby's Dig. § 2467, providing that the real and personal property of one charged with a criminal offense shall be bound from the time of his arrest or the finding of an indictment against him, whichever shall first happen, for the payment of all fines and costs which may be adjudged to pay, creates a lien upon such property, not only in the hands of accused, but in the hands of any other person possessing or holding it, after the arrest or indictment found, until accused is discharged or fines and costs adjudged against him are paid, which lien also attaches to the accused's after-acquired property.

Recording Acts — Unrecorded Mortgage — Valid between Parties.

Under Kirby's Dig. § 5396, providing that every mortgage of real or personal property shall be a lien thereon from the time it is filed in the recorder's office for record, an unrecorded mortgage is valid between the parties and as against persons holding the property under a voluntary conveyance.

Failure to Record — Subjection to Subsequent Liens.

Under Kirby's Dig. § 2467, binding the property of an accused from the time of his arrest or the finding of an indictment against him to the payment of fines and costs adjudged against him, and section 5396 providing that every mortgage shall be a lien on the mortgaged property from the time it is filed in the recorder's office for record, the state after indictment had a valid lien for fines and costs prior to a mortgage of property of accused, executed after the indictment, but not recorded until several months after execution.

Appeal from Jackson Chancery Court:
HUMPHRIES, Chancellor.

Action by Western Tie and Timber Company, plaintiff, against L. L. Campbell et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

A. J. Stack and Frank H. Sullivan for appellant.

Stuckey & Stuckey and Lon L. Campbell for appellees.

[571] McCULLOCH, C. J.—This controversy involves the title to a tract of land in Jackson County, Arkansas, both [572] parties to the suit claiming title from a common source, appellant claiming under a mortgage executed by one Thomas, and appellees claiming under a sale upon execution issued against the property of Thomas.

The question in the case relates to the priority of the respective liens.

On February 11, 1904, the grand jury of Jackson County returned an indictment against Thomas for misdemeanor, and he was arrested on a bench warrant in July of the same year.

After the return of the indictment against Thomas, some time during the month of February, 1904, the precise date not being shown, he negotiated the purchase of the tract of land in controversy from one Mustin, who was then the owner. The purchase price was to be $350, and Thomas borrowed $250 to complete the purchase, having only $100 of his own to pay on the land, and he executed the mortgage upon which appellant rests its claim of title to secure the amount so borrowed, which was used in paying the purchase price. The mortgage was dated February 26, 1904, and the deed from Mustin to Thomas bears date February 29, 1904, but the proof shows that the two transactions were simultaneous.

The mortgage was not recorded, however, until November 4, 1904.

On January 30, 1905, Thomas entered a plea of guilty, a fine of $50 was assessed against him, and judgment was rendered in favor of the State for the recovery of said fine and the costs of prosecution. In October, 1905, execution was issued on the judgment, the land was sold, and appellees became the purchasers.

Subsequently appellant purchased the notes secured by the mortgage executed by Thomas, and foreclosed the mortgage and became the purchaser at the sale.

It is quite well settled by the authorities that a mortgage, given at the time of the purchase of real estate to secure the payment of purchase money, whether given to the vendor or to a third person, who, as a part of the same transaction, advances the purchase money, has preference [573] over all judgments and other liens against the mortgagor.

"A purchase-money mortgage may," says Mr. Jones, "be made to a third person who advances the purchase-money at the time the purchaser receives his conveyance, and such mortgage is entitled to the same preference over a prior judgment as it would have had if it had been executed to the vendor himself." 1 Jones on Mortgages (6 ed.) § 472.

Professor Pomeroy has this to say on the subject:

"Even in the absence of any statute, and upon the general principles of equity, a purchase-money mortgage given at the same time as the deed, or as a part of the same transaction, has precedence over any prior general lien, such as that part of a prior judgment against the mortgagor. The same equitable rule applies in like manner to a mortgage given by the grantee to a third person, as security for money loaned for the purpose of being used, and which is actually used, in paying the purchase price." 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (3 ed.) § 725.

The following cases, among many others, fully sustain the text: Kaiser v. Lembeck, 55 Ia. 244, 7 N. W. 519; Clark v. Butler, 32 N. J. Eq. 664; Moring v. Dickerson, 85 N. E. 466; Rogers v. Tucker, 94 Mo. 346, 7 S. W. 414; Roane v. Baker, 120 Ill. 308, 11 N. E. 246; Courson v. Walker, 94 Ga. 175, 21 S. E. 287.

"The reason given," says the North Carolina court in stating the principle in the above cited case, "is that the execution of the deed and of the mortgage being simultaneous acts, the title to the land does not for a single moment rest in the purchaser, but merely passes through his hands, and without stopping, vests in the mortgagee, and during such instantaneous passage no lien of any character can attach to the title."

The facts presented in this record bring the case within that rule as to the mortgage under which appellant claims title, but the real turning point in the case is whether or not not appellant's lien under the mortgage [574] was superior to the State's lien for the fine and costs assessed against Thomas.

The statute provides that "the property, both real and personal, of any person charged with a criminal offense, shall be bound from the time of his arrest, or the finding of an indictment against him, whichever shall first happen, for the payment of all fines and costs which he may be adjudged to pay." Kirby's Digest, § 2467.

This court, in an early case, speaking of that statute, said:

"This provision of law, we have no doubt, creates a lien in favor of the State, on all of the property of a person charged with a criminal offense, wheresoever it may be within the limits of the State, which attaches upon and binds it, not only in the hands of the accused, but also in the hands of any other person who shall, in any manner, possess or hold it, from the time of the arrest or indictment found, as mentioned in the statute, until the accused is discharged from the prosecution, or such fines and costs as shall be adjudged against him are paid." Lawson v. Johnson, 5 Ark. 168.

It is insisted by learned counsel for appellant that the lien which arises under the statute from the time of the finding of the indictment or the arrest, whichever first occurs, does not attach to after-acquired property.

But we think counsel are clearly mistaken in their interpretation of the statute. The binding force of the statute begins at the time of the arrest or finding of the indictment, but it gathers within its sweep all property owned by the accused from that time until the judgment subsequently rendered for fine and costs be paid.

Similar language is used in the statute creating liens in favor of judgment-creditors, the language being that a judgment shall be a lien "from the date of its rendition," and this court held in Real Estate Bank v. Watson, 13 Ark. 74-82, that the lien attached to any property acquired subsequent to the rendition of the judgment.

[575] The main question is whether the State's lien attached as against the unrecorded mortgage.

It will be noted that under the authorities cited above a purchase money mortgage must be simultaneous with the execution of the deed of conveyance in order to take precedence over prior liens, for if there is any intervening space of time during which the title rests in the purchaser the prior liens attach to it in preference to the mortgage. Cohn v. Hoffman, 50 Ark. 108, 6 S. W. 511.

The registration statutes of this State provide that "every mortgage, whether for real or personal property, shall be a lien on the mortgaged property from the time the same is filed in the recorder's office for record, and not before." Kirby's Digest, § 5396.

This court has held that, notwithstanding the provision of the statute with reference to Ann. Cas. 1916C.—60.

registration of mortgages, an unrecorded mortgage is valid between the parties and as against persons holding the property under voluntary conveyance. Main v. Alexander, 9 Ark. 112, 47 Am. Dec. 732; Leonhard v. Flood, 68 Ark. 162-168, 56 S. W. 781.

This is obviously so, because the registration statute is not intended to apply between the parties to a mortgage or to a grantee under a voluntary conveyance.

But is it valid as against the State's claim? We think not. If the statute, by express language, made the mortgage good except as against third parties, it might well be argued that the State was not deemed to be a party within its meaning. But the language is quite different. It declares, unconditionally, that the mortgage "shall be a lien on the mortgaged property from the time the same is filed in the recorder's office for record, and not before."

When the two statutes involved in this case are read together, the one which declares that the property of an accused person shall be bound for the fine and costs from the time of his indictment or arrest, and the one which declares when a mortgage lien shall take effect—the conclusion is unavoidable that the Legislature meant to give the State a lien against an unrecorded mortgage.

[576] It does not follow that the State would have a lien as against equities of third parties not within the registration statutes; but where the statute has, as in this case, unconditionally provided that there shall be no lien until the mortgage is recorded, it would be straining the language of the lawmakers to say that an unrecorded mortgage should be valid as against the State's statutory lien.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the State's lien was superior and that appellees acquired a superior title under their purchase at the execution sale. The decree of the chancery court is, therefore, affirmed.

I. Introductory.

The question with which this note is concerned arises where a vendee of real property executes to the vendor a mortgage on the property to secure the payment of all or a part of the purchase money, and the lien of the mortgage conflicts with another claim on the same property. The purpose of the note is to review the cases determining the priority as between the purchase-money mortgage and the other claims. Those cases in which the priority is determined by other factors without regard to the purchase-money character of the mortgage are considered as not being pertinent to the present inquiry.

II. Deed.

It is generally held that the lien of a purchase-money mortgage is not defeated by the previous execution of a deed to the property by the mortgagor to a third person at a time when he had no legal title. McRae v. Newman, 58 Ala. 529; Warren Mortgage Co. v. Winters, reported in full, post, this volume at p. 956; Chew v. Barnet, 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 389. In the case first cited the court said: "The mortgage became operative only when the conveyance of the land, for the price of which it provided, was delivered. Until that time the mortgagor neither owned the land he mortgaged, nor owed the debt secured thereby; wherefore, it did not matter whether he had previously executed a deed of the land . . . or not. This could not have precedence of the mortgage; because, the mortgagor never was able to convey the land, free from that incumbrance. The title remained in Newman [the original vendor] until his deed was delivered, and by the mortgage, eo instanti, returned to him, so as to preclude the interposition of any title or right in any other person." And in Chew v. Barnet, 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 389, the court said: "What is the nature of the estate which Mr. Chew acquired by the conveyance from Judge Wilson? When that conveyance was executed, the legal title was in Jeremiah Parker, by patents from the commonwealth; and Judge Wilson having nothing but an equitable title under the articles could convey nothing more; his deed, therefore, passed to Mr. Chew only an equitable title. But it is said, the subsequent conveyance from Jeremiah Parker to Judge Wilson inured to the benefit of Mr. Chew. It did so; but only in equity, and to entitle him to call for conveyance from Judge Wilson; and not as vesting the title in him, of itself, as contended, by estoppel. The facts presented constitute the ordinary case of a conveyance before the grantor has acquired the title; in which the conveyance operates as an agreement to convey, which, when the title has been subsequently acquired, may be enforced in chancery. But Judge Wilson's act could not prejudice the original vendors, who had a title under the articles, to call on him for a mortgage to secure the purchase-money."

In Moshier v. Knox College, 32 Ill. 155, wherein it appeared that a purchase-money mortgage was executed but not recorded at the time of the execution of a deed by the mortgagor to a third person, the court said: "The appellees [mortgagees] ought to retain this decree, because it is shown the indebtedness was for the purchase money of the premises, and appellant [grantee] has not shown he was a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, paying his money at the time on the faith of the title so purchased. It was incumbent on the appellant to show not only that he had a conveyance for this land, legal in form, but that he actually paid for the land. It is not sufficient that he may have secured the payment of the purchase money. He must have paid it in fact before he had any notice of appellee's prior equitable title. That is an essential element in the equity, which must exist in order to support appellant's claim, which he attempts to uphold. If he has not paid the purchase money, no wrong is done him taking from him a legal title, which has cost him nothing."

It seems that a purchase-money mortgage, if recorded before the mortgagor receives title to the premises, is inferior to a deed subsequently executed by the heir of the mortgagor to a purchaser without notice, the reason being that the purchaser is required to search the title of the mortgagor only back to the deed to the mortgagor. Donovan v. Twist, 105 App. Div. 171, 93 N. Y. S. 990.

III. Deceit.

1. GENERAL RULE.

It is established by the great weight of authority that the lien of a purchase-money mortgage is prior to the rights of the widow of the mortgagor, although she does not join in the execution of the mortgage. While in some of the cases supporting this rule it appears that the wife did join in the execution of the mortgage, nevertheless those cases are in accord with the reason of the rule.

2. REASONS AND APPLICATIONS OF RULE.

In Young v. Tarbell, 37 Me. 509, the court said: "It is well settled by the entire weight of authority, as well as upon the clearest principles of equity, when a conveyance is made to one, who at the time mortgages back the premises to the grantor to secure the purchase money, that the widow of such mortgagor is not, as against the mortgagee, entitled to dower save in the equity of redemption. The deed and mortgage back being at the same time, though separate instruments, are to be regarded as part of one and the same transaction, in the same manner as the deed of defeasance forms with the deed to be defeated but one contract, though engrossed on several sheets. . . . The husband is not deemed sufficiently or beneficially seized by an instantaneous passage of the fee in and out of him to entitle the wife to dower as against the mortgagee."

It seems that the statutes enacting the foregoing rule are merely declaratory of the common law. Thus, in Nottingham v. Calvert, 1 Ind. 527, the court said: "In the case before us, the conveyance to Carmean, and his mortgage for part of the price, were executed on the same day. It is a case, we think, where the seizin of the purchaser was not sufficient to entitle his widow to dower against the mortgage. *The following is the language of Chancellor Kent on this subject:

'A transitory seizin for an instant, when the same act that gives the estate to the husband conveys it out of him, as in the case of a connusee of a fine, is not sufficient to give the wife dower. The land must vest in the husband beneficially for his own use; and then, if it be so vested but for a moment, provided the husband be not the mere conduit for passing it, the right of dower attaches. Nor is the seizin sufficient when the husband takes a conveyance in fee, and at the same time mortgages the land back to the grantor, or to a third person, to secure the purchase-money in whole or in part. Dower cannot be claimed as against rights under that mortgage. The husband is not deemed sufficiently or beneficially seized, by such an instantaneous passage of the fee in and out of him, to entitle his wife to dower as against the mortgagee; and this conclusion is agreeable to the manifest justice of the case."

In Overturf v. Martin, 170 Ind. 308, 84 N. E. 531, wherein the rule was enforced in favor of a purchaser of the mortgaged premises, the court said: "It was conclusively shown that said Martin paid nothing upon the 55-acre tract, but executed a mortgage to the vendor, William Gordon, to secure the whole of the purchase money. Appellant bought the land with this mortgage upon it, and paid the mortgage as the consideration for the conveyance of the land by Martin to him. The trial court found these facts, but adjudged that appellee [the widow] was entitled to one-third of this piece of land, without regard to the vendor's lien and incumbrance, which were upon the title held by her husband. In this respect the conclusions of law were erroneous. Appellant caused the mortgage to be satisfied upon the record, but appellee is in no position to insist that he should not be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, and the mortgage be treated as alive and in full force as against her claim. Appellant bought the land, apparently at a fair price, and paid the full consideration agreed upon, in the belief that he had acquired a good title, and it would be manifestly inequitable to permit appellee, under the circumstances, to take a full one-third of the land, in which her husband had no valuable interest. If Martin had died while holding the title to this tract, with the purchase-money mortgage upon it, appellee's interest therein as his widow would have been subject to the lien of the mortgage. . . . We perceive no ground, either legal or equitable, for enlarging appellee's rights in the land because of the fact that her husband conveyed it to another in his lifetime. It is our conclusion that this mortgage should be regarded and treated as still alive and enforced in this action for the benefit of appellant."

That the rule rests on reasons further than those expressed in the doctrine of instantaneous seizin was pointed out in Boorum v. Tucker, 51 N. J. Eq. 135, 26 Atl. 456, as follows: "The equity of the holder of the purchase-money obligation, as against the grantee and debtor, rises higher than the mere cotemporaneous execution of a mortgage to secure it. It does not rest alone upon the notion of instantaneous seizin, which preserves the right of the mortgagee as against previous judgment creditors of the mortgagor. . . . The true view, in my judgment, is, that a purchase-money mortgage is, in its essential nature, in equity, precisely the same thing, so far as the wife's dower is concerned, as a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money. The effect of such a mortgage is a mere practical embodiment of the vendor's lien in legal shape, so that he may give notice of it to all the world, and be able to enforce it at law as well as in equity. The so-called vendor's lien is nothing more or less than the right to come into a court of equity, and ask it to appropriate the property to the payment of the debt; and that is precisely the right which is assured to him in writing by the formal execution and delivery of the mortgage. It is a formal and explicit statement in writing that the purchase money, to the extent named, is unpaid, and that the creditor is entitled to have the land sold to pay it. Thus far in equity. At law, it is also a conveyance of the land to the vendor in pledge. So that if we compare the case of a mortgagee of a purchase-money mortgage upon land coming into a court of equity and asking for foreclosure against the mortgagor and his wife, and that of a vendee of land without mortgage coming into the same court to enforce his so-called vendor's lien against the vendee and his wife, we shall find it difficult to distinguish between the cases—at least I do. In short, it seems to me that the execution of a mortgage to secure purchase money is, in equity, a mere continuance of the lien, and it is that circumstance, and that alone, that gives it efficiency in this court to bar dower, or rather, gives it precedence over dower."

However, in order to defeat the widow's dower, it must be shown that the making of the deed and the mortgage constituted but one transaction. Grant v. Dodge, 43 Me. 489; Rawlings v. Lowndes, 34 Md. 639. In the case last cited the court said: "In order to exclude the dower right in such cases, the deed and mortgage should constitute and form part of one and the same transaction, for if the deed is delivered, no agreement made subsequent thereto between the vendor and purchaser, can affect in any manner the inchoate right of dower, which attached upon the seizin of the husband. It may be laid down as a general rule therefore, that the deed and mortgage should be executed and delivered simultaneously, or if executed on different days, should be delivered at the same time, as in Mayburry v. Brien, 15 Pet. 21 [10 U. S. (L. ed.) 646], where the court say, that although the deed was executed prior to the mortgage, 'the proof is clear that both instruments were delivered, and consequently, took effect at the same time.' In this case however, the deed was executed and delivered more than two weeks before the acknowledgment and delivery of the mortgage, for although the latter bears date with the deed, yet the acknowledgment on the 14th of November following, destroys the presumption that it was delivered on the day of its date.

The only evidence is to be found on the face of the instruments themselves, and although it does appear that the tract of land sold and conveyed, was mortgaged to secure the purchase money, and that the mortgage bears date with the deed, it is equally clear that it was not acknowledged and delivered until more than two weeks subsequent to the delivery of the deed. It also appears that the parties lived in the same county, and that the two witnesses before whom the mortgage purports to have been signed on the 28th of October, are the two justices of the peace before whom the same instrument was acknowledged on the 14th of November following, and yet there is no reason assigned or explanation offered why it was not acknowledged at the time of its attestation. Upon such proof as this, we do not feel justified in finding when the deed was executed and delivered there was an agreement that a mortgage should be executed and acknowledged and delivered at the same time. To support such an agreement, the effect of which the appellee contends, is to exclude the widow's dower, a right existing by the common law upon the seisin of the husband, and which courts in all time have favored and protected, the proof ought to be clear and conclusive. We are of opinion, therefore, that the husband of the appellant acquired a beneficial seisin in the tract of land in question under the deed of October the 28th, which, upon his death, entitled her to dower, and that her claim thereto is in no manner affected by the mortgage acknowledged on the 14th of November following, nor by the sale and conveyance of the land by the insolvent trustee."

In Georgia, according to the old rule, based on the statutes as to mortgage and dower, the widow's right to dower was superior to the right of a purchase-money mortgagee. Slaughter v. Culpepper, 44 Ga. 319. But the widow was obliged to discharge the incumbrance of a purchase-money mortgage existing prior to the seisin of her husband. Rust v. Billingslea, 44 Ga. 306. The rule was changed in 1875 by a statute providing that when a vendor sells land and makes a deed thereto, and at the same time takes a mortgage for the purchase money, the widow of the vendee shall not be entitled to dower in the land as against the vendor, until the purchase money is paid. Wilson v. Peeples, 61 Ga. 218.

IV. Homestead.

A purchase-money mortgage is superior to a claim of a homestead in the mortgaged property. Moses v. Home Bldg. etc. Assoc. 100 Ala. 465, 14 So. 412; Dillon v. Byrne, 5 Cal. 455; Lassen v. Vance, 8 Cal. 271, 68 Am. Dec. 322; Montgomery v. Tutt, 11 Cal. 190; Skinner v. Beatty, 16 Cal. 157; Van Sandt v. Alvis, 109 Cal. 165, 41 Pac. 1014, 50 Am. St. Rep. 25; Barnes v. Gay, 7 Ia. 26; Pratt v. Topeka Bank, 12 Kan. 570; Andrews v. Alcorn, 13 Kan. 351; Shelden v. Motter, (Kan.) 53 Pac. 89; Cohen v. Ripy, 33 S. W. 625, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1078; Amphlett v. Hibbard, 29 Mich. 298; Jones v. Tainter, 15 Minn. 512; Peterson v. Fisher, 85 Neb. 745, 124 N. W. 145, 133 Am. St. Rep. 688; Hopper v. Parkinson, 5 Nev. 233; Starkey v. Wainwright, 9 Ohio Dec. 436; Calhoun v. Calhoun, 2 S. C. 283; Jones v. Parker, 51 Wis. 218, 6 N. W. 124; Cornish v. Frees, 74 Wis. 490, 43 N. W. 507. See also Carr v. Caldwell, 10 Cal. 380, 70 Am. Dec. 740; Austin v. Underwood, 37 Ill. 438, 87 Am. Dec. 254; Williston v. Schmidt, 28 La. Ann. 416; Bunting v. Jones, 78 N. C. 242.

"The mortgage upon which the suit was brought being given as security for the purchase money of the premises, no homestead could be carved out of the property so as to impair the rights of the previous mortgagee." Montgomery v. Tutt, 11 Cal. 190.

V. Judgment.

The well established rule is that a purchase-money mortgage has preference over a pre-existing judgment against the mortgagor.

Canada.—Ruttan v. Levinsconte, 16 U. C. Q. B. 495.

Thus in Scott v. Warren, 21 Ga. 408, the court said: "Chancellor Kent says, 'In one instance a mortgage will have preference over a prior docketed judgment, and that is the case of a sale and conveyance of land and a mortgage taken at the same time, to secure the payment of the purchase money. The deed and the mortgage are considered parts of the same contract and constituting one act; and justice and policy equally require that no prior judgment against the mortgagee should intervene and attach upon the land during the transitory seisin, to the prejudice of the mortgagee.' . . . Where a deed is given by the vendor of an estate, who takes back a mortgage to secure the purchase money, at the same time he executes a deed, the deed and mortgage are to be considered as parts of the same contract, as taking effect at the same instant, and as constituting but one act; in the same manner as a deed of defeasance forms with the principal deed to which it refers but one contract, although it be by a distinct and separate instrument."

. . . If the land abided but for a single moment in Wade, it would be subject to his judgment debts. It does not depend upon the length of duration; the question is—was it in Wade and out of him, quasi uno statu, and by one and the same contract? For if so, he never was substantially seized of the land so as to subject it unconditionally to the judgment lien."

In Banning v. Edes, 6 Minn. 402, the court applied the rule as follows: "By the mortgage a condition was annexed to the grant, and whatever passed by the grant, passed subject to the condition. There was no moment of time when Baker owned or held the premises free from the condition, nor when he could voluntarily have conveyed them, except subject to the mortgage. Can a judgment creditor, then, by virtue of his judgment, obtain a greater interest in the premises than the debtor himself had? I think it is well settled, that the lien of the judgment will, in all cases, be limited to the actual interest which the judgment debtor has in the estate. 1 Atk. on Conv. 512; 1 Paige 128; 4 Paige 9. The rule is based on principles of justice and public policy, as well as common sense, and can work no hardship to the judgment creditor. So far as the contract between Pairo and Baker is concerned, there can be no question but that it was the intent to give Pairo the first lien on the premises; nor can it be claimed that he would have parted with the premises on any other condition. The judgment creditor having parted with nothing on the strength of this conveyance to Baker, it would be highly inequitable to permit the judgment to be satisfied out of what, in fact, was Pairo's property."

In Kansas and New York it has been provided by statute that a purchase-money mortgage shall have preference over a prior judgment against the purchaser, and such statutes have been regarded by the courts as declaratory of the common law. Plumb v. Bay, 18 Kan. 415; Stow v. Tift, 15 Johns. 459, 8 Am. Dec. 260.

Consonant with the general rule heretofore stated, it has been held that a purchase-money mortgage, executed before but not recorded until after the rendition of a judgment against the mortgagor, is superior to the judgment. Britton's Appeal, 45 Pa. St. 172 (wherein it appeared that the judgment creditors had actual knowledge of the mortgage); Coleman v. Reynolds, 181 Pa. St. 317, 37 Atl. 543; Cowardin v. Anderson, 78 Va. 88; Charlottesville Hardware Co. v. Perkins, (Va.) 86 S. E. 809. See also Moomaw v. Jordan (Va.) 87 S. E. 569. In Charlottesville Hardware Co. v. Perkins, supra, the court said: "Coming now to consider the judgment of the Charlottesville Hardware Company, it seems equally clear that as to this claim also the Walker deed of trust [for purchase money] must be given precedence, for the reason that until Walker's debt is paid there is no interest in J. R. Elam upon which the judgment can attach as a lien. It is argued that this view denies to the judgment creditor the benefit of the registry statutes, but, as will hereinafter more fully appear, the question at issue is controlled by considerations which are not in conflict with, but overreach and are entirely independent of, the provisions of the recording acts. The deed of conveyance dated August 22, 1912, from Walker to J. R. Elam, and the deed of trust of the same date from Elam to Walker, were plainly intended by the parties to operate simultaneously, and they were expressly declared to be 'parts of the same transaction.' It affirmatively appears that the deed of trust was executed, acknowledged, and delivered, though not recorded for more than a year. In the absence of proof to the contrary (and there is no proof or contention to the contrary), the presumption is that the two instruments were executed simultaneously. Summers v. Darne, infra, 31 Grat. 791. The legal result is that there was, as against Walker's debt, no beneficial, but merely an instantaneous or transitory, seisin in Elam, and not such an interest as could become subject to the lien of either prior or subsequent judgments. The conclusion which results in awarding the fund in this case to Walker is just and reasonable, and is amply sustained by authority. In Summers v. Darne, 31 Grat. 791, at page 801, Judge Staples says: "The creditor is in no just sense treated as a purchaser. He has no equity whatever beyond what justly belongs to the debtor, When, therefore, land is conveyed, and the purchaser at the same time gives back a mortgage or other incumbrance to secure the purchase money, he does not thereby acquire any such seisin or interest as will entitle his wife to dower, or his creditor to subject the land to his debts discharged of the mortgage. In such cases the deed and mortgage are regarded as parts of the same contract, and constitute but a single transaction, investing the purchaser with the seisin for a transitory instant only."

. . . . Until Walker's debt is paid J. R. Elam's title is not such as to be subject to the lien of either prior or subsequent judgment creditors, and the question of recordation is wholly immaterial."

In Arkansas, as is held in the reported case, the state's lien under a judgment for fine and costs is superior to the lien of an unrecorded purchase-money mortgage.

It has been held that a defendant whose property is bound by a judgment cannot defeat the lien of the judgment by conveying the property to a co-defendant and taking back a purchase-money mortgage. Simmons v. Vandergrift, 1 N. J. Eq. 55.

VI. Mechanic's Lien.

The question of priority as between a purchase-money mortgage and a mechanic's lien is fully treated in the note to H. F. Cady Lumber Co. v. Miles, Ann. Cas. 1916B 632.

VII. Mortgage.

1. MORTGAGE PREVIOUSLY EXECUTED.

It is generally held that a purchase-money mortgage has priority over another mortgage previously executed. Farmers' Loan, etc. Co. v. Denver, etc. R. Co. 126 Fed. 46, 60 C. C. A. 588; Gould v. Adams, 108 Cal. 365, 41 Pac. 408; Elder v. Derby, 98 Ill. 228; Morris v. Pate, 31 Mo. 315; Wendler v. Lambeth, 163 Mo. 428, 63 S. W. 684; Daly v. New York, etc. R. Co. 55 N. J. Eq. 595, 38 Atl. 202; Ames v. Trenton Brewing Co., 57 N. J. Eq. 347, 45 Atl. 1092; Hinton v. Hicks, 156 N. C. 24, 71 S. E. 1086; Jarvis v. Hannan, 40 Ohio St. 334; Hand v. Savannah, etc. R. Co. 12 S. C. 314; Nevitt v. McMurray, 14 Ont. App. 126. See also Kaiser v. Lembeck, 55 Ia. 244, 7 N. W. 519; Demeter v. Wilcox, 115 Mo. 634, 22 S. W. 613, 37 Am. St. Rep. 422; Chamberlain v. Meeder, 16 N. H. 381. Especially does this rule apply where the purchase-money mortgagee has no notice of the other mortgage. Tolman v. Smith, 85 Cal. 280, 24 Pac. 743; Ely v. Pingry, 56 Kan. 17, 42 Pac. 330; Protection Building, etc. Ass'n v. Knowles, 54 N. J. Eq. 519, 34 Atl. 1083, affirmed 55 N. J. Eq. 822, 41 Atl. 1116; Dusenbury v. Hulbert, 59 N. Y. 541. The same rule has been applied, however, even where it appeared that the purchase-money mortgagee knew of the previous mortgage. Jacoby v. Crowe, 36 Minn. 93, 30 N. W. 441; Moring v. Dickerson, 85 N. C. 466.

In Tolman v. Smith, 85 Cal. 280, 24 Pac. 743, the court said: "The Darby mortgage was given to secure part of the consideration of the deed from him to Eunice W. Smith, and was part of the same transaction by which Eunice W. Smith and her husband acquired the property. Darby (the owner) had no notice that his grantee had undertaken to mortgage the property before he had conveyed it. . . . And it seems clear that the instantaneous seisin which Eunice W. Smith and her husband may have had by reason of any momentary interval between the deed and the mortgage did not give priority to the mortgage made when they had no title."

Consonant with the foregoing line of decisions it has been held that a purchase-money mortgage is superior to a special agreement, concerning the premises, previously entered into by the mortgagor. Bolles v. Carli, 12 Minn. 113. In that case, it appeared that the plaintiff had entered into an agreement with the defendant that the latter should purchase the land for the use of the plaintiff and take the title as collateral security. The court said: "Whatever, therefore, may have been the agreement between the plaintiff and Carli, and whatever rights the former may have as against the latter, Taylor [the vendor] was not bound, although fully advised of the agreement, under these circumstances, by the agreement, and was at liberty, irrespective of the plaintiff's assent, to convey the premises in any manner he desired; it was therefore competent for him to convey in fee to Carli, upon the terms he did, taking a mortgage for the unpaid purchase money; and upon default he might foreclose the mortgage and sell the premises. The mortgage being given for this purchase money, and executed at the same time, must take priority of the agreement of Carli, or any encumbrance by him, since the title must enure to him before the encumbrance can exist, and in the case of a mortgage for the purchase money delivered at the same time with the deed, the title and the encumbrance become simultaneously operative."

Priority has been accorded to a purchase-money mortgage executed before and recorded after the execution and recording of a mortgage for a pre-existing debt. Phelps v. Fockler, 61 Ia. 340, 14 N. W. 729, 16 N. W. 210.

Second mortgage bonds given in part payment of the purchase price of a corporation's property have been held to be superior to first mortgage bonds, where it appeared that the first mortgage bonds had gained their superiority through fraud. Hooper v. Central Trust Co. 81 Md. 559, 32 Atl. 505, 29 L.R.A. 262.

Where a mortgagee sells the premises under foreclosure and receives from the purchaser a mortgage to secure payment of the price fixed at the foreclosure sale, the mortgage is superior to another mortgage on the premises executed by the original owner before the foreclosure but after the execution of the mortgage under which the foreclosure is made. Threefoot v. Hillman, 130 Ala. 244, 30 So. 513, 89 Am. St. Rep. 39.

But the heir of a mortgagor cannot by conveying the premises and taking back a purchase-money mortgage, enlarge his interest in the premises; and in such a case the purchase-money mortgage remains subject to the other mortgage. Card v. Bird, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 426.

2. MORTGAGE EXECUTED CONTEMPORANEOUSLY.

A purchase-money mortgage has priority over another mortgage where the two are delivered and recorded contemporaneously. Clark v. Brown, 3 Allen (Mass.) 509; Boies v. Benham, 127 N. Y. 620, 23 N. E. 657, 14 L.R.A. 55; City Nat. Bank's Appeal, 91 Pa. St. 163. Compare Koevenig v. Schmitz, 71 Ia. 175, 32 N. W. 320 (wherein it was held that the two mortgages should share equally). "Until Clark made his deed to Tuttle, the latter certainly had no interest in the land, which he could make the subject of a conveyance to another; and as the deed and mortgage from him to Clark was delivered at the same time that Clark's deed was delivered to him, he acquired seisin but for an instant; taking an absolute estate in fee, and instantaneously rendering back a conditional estate in fee; and so it was by the same act that he acquired and parted with his title. The mortgage to Wyatt was therefore necessarily a thing subsequent, because it was made after the deed from Clark; and, the mortgage back to Clark being identical with the deed in the time of taking effect, the mortgage to Wyatt was necessarily after that mortgage. As soon as Tuttle had a right to make any conveyance at all to another, the right of Clark under the mortgage to him had already become vested, and therefore all other conveyances must of necessity be posterior to it. The mortgage to Wyatt could therefore convey only the interest which the mortgagor then had in the premises; and that was simply a right of redemption, namely, the right of redeeming the estate from the pre-existing mortgage to Clark. It can make no difference that the deeds were all entered of record at the same moment. The law arranges acts performed, or things done, in one day, and relative to the same subject matter, so as to render them conformable to the intention of the parties." Clark v. Brown, 3 Allen (Mass.) 509. "The understanding of the parties as found, that the deed and mortgages were to be, and accordingly were, made and recorded at the same time, did not necessarily, and as a matter of law, place the lien of the two mortgages on an equality, as would have been the case if neither of the mortgagees had been the vendor and grantor of the premises. Upon the facts so found he did not necessarily waive any rights which the relation of the vendor and grantor gave him." Boies v. Benham, 127 N. Y. 620, 23 N. E. 657, 14 L.R.A. 55.

Likewise it has been held that a purchase-money mortgage has priority over another mortgage executed contemporaneously and recorded before the purchase-money mortgage. Brower v. Whiting, 121 Ind. 83, 22 N. E. 975 (other mortgage given for antecedent debt); Rogers v. Tucker, 94 Mo. 346, 7 S. W. 414; Truesdale v. Brennan, 153 Mo. 600, 55 S. W. 147; Jeanes v. Hizer, 186 Pa. St. 523, 40 Atl. 785; McMillan v. Munro, 25 Ont. App. 288 (in the last four cases it appeared that the other mortgage secured money used for cash payment). Compare Higgins v. Dennis, 104 Ia. 605, 74 N. W. 9.

Where two purchase-money mortgages on the same property were recorded simultaneously, it was held that they were concurrent liens, although one became due before the other. Collerd v. Huson, 34 N. J. Eq. 33. But where a purchaser gives a purchase-money mortgage and then sells the premises, taking a purchase-money mortgage, although both mortgages are made and recorded on the same day, the one given to the first vendor has priority. Dungan v. American Life Ins. etc. Co. 52 Pa. St. 252. And the same principle applies where the final vendee executes both mortgages. City Nat. Bank's Appeal, 91 Pa. St. 163, wherein the court said: "Thus, substantially and in effect, the mortgage to Hall was for the purchase-money due him on the legal title, and the mortgage to Nichols was for the value of his equitable interest in the land. The mortgage to Hall having thus been recorded on the day of its execution and delivery, and on the day of the delivery of the deed, is clearly entitled to a preference over the other mortgage."

3. MORTGAGE SECURING MONEY FOR CASH PAYMENT.

A purchase-money mortgage to a vendor without notice has priority over another mortgage which was executed and recorded before the mortgagor obtained title and which was given to secure the money for the mortgagor's cash payment to the vendor. Schoch v. Birdsall, 48 Minn. 441, 51 N. W. 382; Turk v. Funk, 68 Mo. 18, 30 Am. Rep. 771; Boyd v. Mundorf, 30 N. J. Eq. 545. Compare Koevenig v. Schmitz, 71 Ia. 175, 32 N. W. 320. In Schoch v. Birdsall, supra, the court said: "The mortgage to the defendant had not attached before the conveyance by plaintiff to Bothman; neither did the lien thereof intervene between the conveyance to her and her purchase-money mortgage back to plaintiff. The seizure being instantaneous, the lien of plaintiff's mortgage took precedence of any lien, general or specific, created by her. On the other hand, the prior record of the defendant's mortgage did not avail as notice to the plaintiff, because, under the circumstances, the plaintiff was not bound to search for conveyances made by his grantee while the latter was a stranger to the title, and before the execution of his deed, and the defendant whose mortgage was recorded before plaintiff's conveyance was not a subsequent bona fide mortgagee, within the meaning of the recording act." And in Boyd v. Mundorf, 30 N. J. Eq. 545, the court said: "Where, as in this case, the vendor of real estate records his mortgage at the same instant that the deed from him is recorded, he surely can have no occasion to examine the records for encumbrances created by his vendee on the property, prior to the recording of his conveyance."

Likewise the lien of a purchase-money mortgage is superior to that of another mortgage, which is executed on the same day and recorded before the purchase-money mortgage, and which is given to secure money used for a cash payment on the premises. Rogers v. Tucker, 94 Mo. 346, 7 S. W. 414; Truesdale v. Brennan, 153 Mo. 600, 55 S. W. 147; Brasted v. Sutton, 29 N. J. Eq. 513; Jeanes v. Hizer, 186 Pa. St. 523, 40 Atl. 785; McMillan v. Munro, 25 Ont. App. 288. Contra Higgins v. Dennis, 104 Ia. 605, 74 N. W. 9.

A purchase-money mortgage has been held to have priority over a junior mortgage given to one who with notice that the purchase price was not fully paid loaned the money for the cash payment, although the junior mortgage was first recorded. Ellis v. Horrmann, 90 N. Y. 466.

4. LOSS OF PRIORITY.

Where the vendor waives his right to a purchase-money mortgage at the time of the sale, but such a mortgage is subsequently executed, it is inferior to an intervening mortgage on the premises to secure an ordinary debt in favor of one who has no notice that the purchase money has not been paid. Houston v. Houston, 67 Ind. 276; Davis v. Lutkiewicz, 72 Ia. 254, 33 N. W. 670. See also Koon v. Tramel, 71 Ia. 132, 32 N. W. 243. Thus, in Houston v. Houston, supra, the court said: "The vendor of real estate may, if he choose, exact a mortgage from the purchaser to secure the unpaid purchase-money, at the time of the sale. That is the vendor's right, but surely he may waive such right; and if he does waive it, and allows another creditor of the purchaser, without notice of the non-payment of the purchase-money, to secure a mortgage on the real estate sold, such mortgage will be entitled to preference over a mortgage thereafter acquired by such vendor to secure his unpaid purchase-money." In Davis v. Lutkiewicz, 72 Ia. 254, 33 N. W. 670, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's purchase-money mortgage had described the wrong premises and that the mistake was not corrected until after another mortgage had been recorded, the court said: "Upon the face of the record, then, Davis & Sons' mortgage was the prior lien, provided they took their mortgage in good faith, for a valuable consideration, and without actual notice that the plaintiff's mortgage was intended to be on the same land. If this was the relation of Davis & Son to the subject-matter, the subsequent correction of the mortgage had no more effect upon their mortgage liens than if no mortgage whatever had been taken until the correction was made. The fact that the mortgage was for purchase-money can make no difference in the rights of the parties. When a vendor of real estate makes a conveyance and delays taking his mortgage for the purchase-money until a mortgage is made to another party without notice, the vendor's mortgage will be postponed to the other."

Where creditors are induced to rely on the absolute deed to the mortgagor without notice of a purchase-money mortgage, the mortgage has been held to be inferior to another mortgage given to the creditors. Young v. Wood, 11 B. Mon. (Ky.) 123; Heffron v. Flanigan, 37 Mich. 274; Trigg v. Vermillion, 113 Mo. 230, 20 S. W. 1047; Protection Building, etc. Ass'n v. Knowles, 54 N. J. Eq. 519, 34 Atl. 1083, affirmed 55 N. J. Eq. 822, 41 Atl. 1116; Ramsey v. Jones, 41 Ohio St. 685.

See also Spring v. Short, 90 N. Y. 538. Thus, in Young v. Wood, supra, a purchase-money mortgage which was not recorded until after the recording of another mortgage given for a valid consideration was held to have lost its priority. And in Heffron v. Flanigan, supra, wherein it appeared that a purchase-money mortgage was executed and recorded before the delivery of the deed, and that another mortgage was executed immediately thereafter, the court, in allowing priority to the second mortgage, said: "The delivery of the deed in his [the second mortgagee's] presence to the grantee not only vested the title in her at the time, but it was a clear and direct notice to him that up to the time of such delivery she had no such interest or title in the premises therein described as would enable her to encumber the same to his prejudice. This case differs in no essential from that of an ordinary conveyance of land with a mortgage back at the same time to secure a part or the whole of the purchase price or for other purposes. The grantor and mortgagee in such a case would not suppose, nor would he have any right to suppose, that his grantee had before acquiring the title encumbered it, and if he took back a mortgage at the same time and had both conveyances promptly placed upon record together, he would be doing all that the law required him to do for the protection of his rights and he would not be affected by any previous conveyances which his grantee, the mortgagor, might have placed upon record, when he had no title to the premises."

In Trigg v. Vermillion, 113 Mo. 230, 20 S. W. 1047, the facts were stated in the opinion as follows: "A third party to the case, Mr. Crow, entered into an agreement with Mr. Beckett to buy this land; and, as part of the purchase, was to execute a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage to Mr. Beckett to secure the greater portion of the purchase price, viz. $3,300. Before this arrangement was carried out, Mr. Crow negotiated with the Walton & Tucker Company for a loan of three thousand dollars upon the same land, which he represented he was about to buy of Mr. Beckett. The company (after some delay for the purpose of having the title examined) agreed to make the loan upon Crow's acquiring a clear title. Beckett executed a deed of full warranty to Crow at the office of the company and delivered it to Crow. This having been placed of record, the mortgage by Crow, in favor of a trustee for the company, to secure the three thousand dollars was then given and filed for record at 12:30 P. M. and that the sum was accordingly advanced to Crow by the company. Later in the day (at 1:45 P. M.), the mortgage of Crow to Beckett (to secure the unpaid part of the purchase money) was recorded." The court said: "Our registry laws declare that no instrument in writing affecting title to real estate shall be valid 'except between the parties thereto, and such as have actual notice thereof, until the same shall be deposited with the recorder for record.' Revised Statutes, 1889, sec. 2420. It follows that, where a loan is made upon the credit of an ostensibly clear record title, and an instrument securing the loan is duly recorded, that security cannot be impaired by the later record of a mortgage to the vendor to secure the purchase price of the title, where the lender had no notice of the facts creating a vendor's lien at the time of making the loan. The case at bar is distinguishable from Turk v. Funk, 68 Mo. (1878) 18, in this, that there the loan was made, not upon a clear record title in the borrower, but upon a lesser equitable estate vested in him, whereas here the entire title had passed to Crow, and upon that title the Walton & Tucker company advanced the funds which their mortgage was intended to secure. In Rogers v. Tucker, 94 Mo. (1887) 346 (another precedent relied upon by defendants), it appeared that all parties to the transaction were informed of the actual state of the title; and, hence, it was naturally held that a vendor's lien embodied in his mortgage was prior in right to another lien given to a third person to secure a loan of part of advances toward the purchase money. But in the case before us the important element of notice to the lender of the vendor's rights in the premises, which dominated that judgment, is wanting. Had the lending company here been informed (or was it chargeable in equity with notice, in the circumstances) of the real facts, touching the non-payment of the purchase money, the equities of the parties would be wholly different. But equity follows the law, and cannot properly ignore the positive statute above quoted touching the effect to be given to the registry of deeds. It cannot rightly promote a vendor's lien to a priority forbidden by the law as it is written."

Where it appeared that a purchase-money mortgagee allowed another mortgage to be recorded first and acquiesced for several years in the demand of such other mortgagee that his should be a first mortgage, it was held that the purchase-money mortgage was inferior to the other. Mutual Loan, etc. Ass'n v. Elwell, 38 N. J. Eq. 18. Of course, the priority of a purchase-money mortgage may be waived by agreement. Skeel v. Christenson, 17 Wash. 649, 50 Pac. 466.

But it has been held that prior registration did not give priority to a mortgage executed subsequently to the execution of a purchase-money mortgage, where the junior mortgagee had actual knowledge of the existence of the purchase-money mortgage. Kirk v. Harvey, 18 British Columbia 645.

In Kansas, it has been held that "the fact that a mortgage is given for purchase-money does not place it outside the provisions of the registry act, or give it a priority to which it would not be entitled under said act," and therefore that a recorded mortgage in the hands of a purchaser without notice has priority over a prior unrecorded purchase-money mortgage. Jackson v. Reid, 30 Kan. 10, 1 Pac. 308.

In North Carolina, a purchase-money mortgage loses its priority if not registered before an intervening mortgage is executed and registered, although the one taking the intervening mortgage has actual notice of the previous purchase-money mortgage. Quinnerly v. Quinnerly, 114 N. C. 145, 19 S. E. 99, wherein the court said: "The plaintiff further contends that his mortgage, being for the unpaid purchase-money, is entitled to priority over the Nelson mortgage, though registered after it, and that Nelson and Williams had notice that the purchase money had not been paid. As to this, it will be sufficient to quote from Blevins v. Barker, 75 N. C. 436 (on page 438): 'Under the act of 1829 (now section 1254 of the Code) no notice to the purchaser (here the defendant), however full and formal, will supply the place of registration. . . . All secret trusts, latent liens and hidden encumbrances are, and were intended to be, cut up by the roots, by force of our registration laws. And since the decision of this court in Womble v. Battle, 38 N. C. 182, the law as here announced has been considered as well settled in North Carolina.'"

In Washington, it has been said in a recent case: "Under our recording acts the question of priority between one holding a purchase-money mortgage and another cannot be raised, unless the mortgages concur in time or the priorities are controlled by some contract or equities arising between the several mortgagees." Wakefield v. Fish, 62 Wash. 504, 114 Pac. 180. See also Brace v. Superior Land Co. 65 Wash. 681, 118 Pac. 910.

VIII. Tax.

The lien of a purchase-money mortgage is inferior to that of an assessment against the property made after the execution of the mortgage. Clifton v. Cincinnati, 5 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 687, wherein the court said: "The only question is, whether the court erred in finding the purchase-money mortgage of Rees F. Price, as signed to Mrs. Harrison, was subject to the lien for assessment [levied two years after the making of the mortgage] That brings up the question as to the nature of an assessment. The municipal authorities may levy an assessment for the improvement of a street. It is called a tax or assessment. The municipal code, statute 554, provides that under certain circumstances, where the tax or assessment against property is not paid, it is the right of the municipal authorities to place it upon the grand duplicate, and when that is done the same section provides it shall be collected as other taxes are collected. An assessment, therefore, is in the nature of a tax. By a tax is ordinarily understood, a revenue raised by levy at a uniform rate upon the property of every citizen, for the purpose of keeping the governmental machine in motion. It is general in its operation—while an assessment is local—levied to defray the expense of a local improvement—an improvement, however, while it confers an individual benefit, is, at the same time, of public benefit. The citizen derives benefit from the tax; in the protection he receives through the public authorities in the peaceable possession and enjoyment of his property, and in the protection of his person against violence and wrong. Both have their origin in the constitution, in that provision conferring the taxing power. The general assembly here derives its right to confer this power upon a corporation. Subject to the power of taxation and assessment for public purposes, every citizen holds his property. Such being the organic law of the state, the citizen cannot by contract, cannot by mortgage, or otherwise, dispose of or encumber his property, so as to defeat this paramount right of taxation. The absolute owner holding his property in this manner, his mortgagee certainly cannot occupy a more favorable position. Hence the court below very properly found that the mortgage lien was subordinate to the assessment lien."

The lien of a purchase-money mortgage is superior to that of a tax against a corporation which purchases the premises from the mortgagor. Sweeney v. Arrowsmith, 43 Pa. Super. Ct. 268, wherein the court said: "It is obvious at a glance that if the distribution to the commonwealth is to stand, it is out of the mortgagee's pocket that payment will be made of what is owing by another party with whom she in the conveyance of the land and in the acceptance of the mortgage had no dealings whatever. She has sold her property to an individual for a stipulated amount. For that amount, less the cash paid down, she has accepted a pledge of the property itself. Her vendee, or rather the grantee of her vendee, transfers it to a corporation. The corporation fails to pay the state tax due by it. Upon default on the mortgage the mortgagee proceeds to collect under it the balance of the purchase money due her by her contract with her vendee. The state, by virtue of a lien filed against the corporation's property, requires the mortgagee to pay the debt of the corporation and to accept just that much less in payment of her land than the price for which it was conveyed. The proposition involved seems repugnant to a clear dictate of natural justice; and wherever such is the case, as intimated by Mr. Justice Woodward in Evans v. See, 23 Pa. St. 88, at p. 91, it is necessary to look closely whether the result is one which the law requires a court to sanction. There is no perfect analogy between the case here presented and one in which a mortgagee finds himself postponed to liens entered against the property for municipal taxes assessed upon the owner. Doubtless such taxes are a personal claim against the latter: May's Estate, 218 Pa. St. 64. But by various statutes the property is made liable for them ahead of mortgages antedating them. It is well understood that these taxes are assessed with reference to the property and its value. Anyone who takes a mortgage upon it is apprised in advance that his security is subject to diminution to the extent that taxes assessed with respect to it may remain unpaid by the owner, whoever he may be. On the other hand, that state tax upon corporate capital stock is not a tax assessed specifically upon or with reference to the realty owned by the corporation. It affects the realty (at least as against other lien creditors) only by virtue of the certification and filing of the lien: Wm. Wilson & Son Silversmith Co.'s Estate, 150 Pa. St. 285; Gladden v. Chapman, 188 Pa. St. 586. It cannot be reasonably supposed, therefore, that one selling land to an individual and taking a mortgage upon it from him for part of the price should foresee or actually contemplate the eventuality of its passing at some future time into the hands of a corporation—a failure of that corporation to pay its state tax upon capital stock—and the impairment, possibly the wiping out, of the security for the unpaid purchase money by the enforcement of a lien filed therefore by the commonwealth and taking precedence of the mortgage. . . . What was the Pendora Park Company's 'property' in this real estate? Simply what is termed the equity of redemption. That, with the possession subject to the rights of the mortgagees, was all it ever acquired. The rest belonged to the plaintiff before she conveyed to defendant, and for the purposes of security never passed out of her, but was retained to her by the purchase-money mortgage executed simultaneously with her conveyance to defendant."

In Indiana, the rule has been established by statute that taxes assessed against a mortgagor during the life of a purchase-money mortgage constitute a lien superior to that of the purchase-money mortgage. Bodertha v. Spencer, 40 Ind. 353; Peckham

v. Millikan, 99 Ind. 352. In Peckham v. Millikan, supra, the court applied the rule as follows: "He [the original vendor] maintains that as these taxes were assessed against Hirzel during the time this land was encumbered by appellant's mortgage, they only bound the equity of redemption, and inasmuch as this has been extinguished by the foreclosure of the mortgage and the sale of the property, no interest of Hirzel remains upon which they can attach, and hence they do not now constitute a lien upon the land. This precise proposition was decided adversely to the appellant in the cases of Bodertha v. Spencer, 40 Ind. 353, and Isaacs v. Decker, 41 Ind. 410. In each of these cases it was held that taxes thus assessed continue a lien upon the land after a foreclosure and sale upon a prior mortgage, as against the mortgagee who becomes the purchaser."

WARREN MORTGAGE COMPANY

v.

WINTERS ET AL.

Kansas Supreme Court—March 6, 1915.

94 Kan. 615; 146 Pac. 1012.

Liens — Loan of Purchase Money.

A lien upon land is acquired by one who lends money for its purchase, under a promise that he is to receive a mortgage, and in the meantime is given the undelivered deed to hold as security for the performance of that agreement.

Priority — As between Purchase-Money Mortgage and Deed.

A mortgage given at the time of the purchase of the mortgaged land by the mortgagor, to obtain the money used by him to pay the price, and thereby procure the deed, has priority over a deed made by the mortgagor at a time when he had no title, to a grantee who knew of the negotiations for the mortgage and had agreed to take the property subject to it, although the only reference to the mortgage in the deed is in an exception to the warranty of title.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Sumner county: SWARTS, Judge.

Action to enforce lien against tract of land. Warren Mortgage Company, plaintiff, and Thomas F. Winters et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Roy Leben et al., defendants, appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

R. L. Holmes, Charles G. Yankey and W. E. Holmes for appellants.

R. M. Hamer, H. E. Ganse, Henry Lampl and M. M. Suddock for appellees.

[616] MASON, J.—The Warren Mortgage Company brought an action to enforce a lien against a tract of land, the validity of which was denied by Roy Leben and S. B. Leben. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and the Lebens appeal. The principal question presented is whether the findings (only one of which is challenged as having no support whatever in the evidence) justify the judgment rendered. The matters shown by the findings will be spoken of as the established facts. In the following statement the December dates are in 1911 and the others in 1912.

On December 1 the land involved was owned by B. F. M. Klump and Lee Ward, who about that time gave B. M. LeGrande an option to purchase it, expiring March 1. A few days later LeGrande applied to the mortgage company for a loan of $3000 on the land, representing that Thomas F. Winters, his adopted son, was buying it. On December 25 the company's agent advised LeGrande that it would lend $2800 on the property. On the same day Winters made a formal application for the loan, which the company accepted January 4, subject to the approval of the title.

On December 21 LeGrande entered into a written contract with S. B. Leben to exchange the land and $500 for a stock of goods, which recited that the deed was to be received subject to a mortgage for $3000 to run seven years at seven per cent interest. Leben knew that the mortgage referred to had not been made, but that it had been applied for and that the negotiations were pending. The contract concluded: "This bill of sale or a copy is to be put up with the deed to be held in Escrow with J. Gardner until the abstract is brought up to date, and until a sufficient time is given to show the goods are all clear of debt." On the same day the stock of goods was delivered to LeGrande, who had learned that it was clear of debt. LeGrande and S. [617] B. Leben agreed that the deed should be made to the latter's brother, Roy Leben. A deed from Winters to Roy Leben, (intended to cover the land, but by a defective description omitting eleven acres of it) with a check for the $500, was placed in the hands of Gardner, it being the intention of all the parties that they were not to be delivered until the mortgage should be recorded and noted on the abstract of title. The warranty clause was followed by the words "except a mortgage for three thousand dollars." Roy Leben knew all about the transaction. The title to the land was still in Klump and Ward. The purpose of the loan was to pay the balance of the purchase price to them. They executed a deed to Winters, which was placed in a bank to be delivered on the payment of the price.

On February 12 Gardner and the Lebens, in violation of the agreement, delivered the deed to Roy Leben, and it was recorded on that day, all without the knowledge or consent of LeGrande, Winters or the mortgage company.

The mortgage company intended to place the loan with the Merchants Loan & Trust Company, for which it acted as agent, and the papers were made out in that name. As they were later assigned to the plaintiff, further reference to the Merchants company will be omitted. On February 16 Winters executed a mortgage for \$2800, due in seven years, bearing $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest, and a commission (or interest) mortgage for \$294, due in seven years, bearing interest at ten per cent after maturity. The mortgages were recorded May 10.

On March 4 the mortgage company paid the amount of the loan ($2795—a deduction of $5 being made for abstract and recording fees) to the banker who held the deed to Winters, and it was applied on the purchase price to Klump and Ward. This left a balance of $200, which was furnished by S. N. Brees, who had been acting as the agent of LeGrande, on his promise [618] that a second mortgage should be executed to secure its repayment, and the banker continued to hold the deed as security for this agreement. On April 29 Brees orally assigned his claim to the company, for $200, and it received the deed to hold as security for the execution of the second mortgage. On the same day Roy Leben orally promised to give the company a mortgage on the property for $3000, due in seven years, bearing seven per cent interest, and the company agreed upon the execution of such mortgage to deliver the deed to Winters. On April 22 Roy Leben had agreed with the company that he would make a deed back to Winters for the tract described in the deed to him, and that Winters should then execute the $3000 mortgage and reconvey to him the entire tract, including the part inadvertently omitted in the first deed. This arrangement failed because Winters at the time refused to make a new deed.

The interests of the two Lebens are substantially the same, as are those of LeGrande and Winters, and for the purpose of an abbreviated statement the acts of S. B. Leben may be regarded as those of Roy Leben, and the acts of LeGrande as those of Winters. The situation then presented is substantially this: Winters had an option on the land. He contracted for its sale to Leben subject to a mortgage for $3000, for which he was negotiating. He received his payment and placed a deed to Leben with Gardner to hold until the mortgage should be of record and shown upon the abstract. Gardner delivered the deed before this condition was fulfilled. Winters obtained $2800, which he applied to the payment of the purchase price, by giving a mortgage for the money lent him for that purpose. This left $200 to be paid before he could obtain his deed. He procured this by a promise to make a second mortgage for the amount, and the undelivered deed was held as security for the performance of the agreement.

[619] As against Winters the mortgage company has a legal mortgage for $2800, and a claim for $200 which is secured by the deed which it still holds, and which has not been delivered to the grantee. This is not the case of an attempt to create a mortgage by the deposit of the title deeds—conveyances which have become effective by delivery. It is the retention of an undelivered deed as security for the purchase price by one who stands in the attitude of the unpaid vendor. Leben has no interest which can conflict with that of the mortgagee. The deed to him conveyed nothing, because it was not legally delivered, and because at the time of its manual delivery, Winters had no title to convey. The execution and delivery of a warranty deed by Winters before he himself had a title would have bound him personally, and by equitable estoppel as well as by the statute any title which he afterwards obtained would have inured to the benefit of the grantee. But by this principle, Leben could only get from Winters what Winters himself obtained, and Winters never did for a single instant have title to the property save in subjection to the mortgage. The mortgage was essentially—in view of the relations of all the parties—one for purchase money. One who executes a purchase-money mortgage is not regarded as obtaining the title and then placing an incumbrance on it. He is deemed to take the title charged with the incumbrance, which has priority ever over pre-existing claims. And a mortgage given to a third person to obtain the money used in buying the property is entitled to the same preference.

"The priority of the purchase-money mortgage to other liens created before the execution of the mortgage rests upon the doctrine that the deed from the vendor and the mortgage by the vendee are parts of one single and entire transaction. Because the seizure of the vendee is thus instantaneous, the title to the land does not for a single moment rest in him, but [620] merely passes through him and vests in the mortgagee without stopping beneficially in the purchaser, and during such instantaneous passage the prior lien cannot attach to the title." (23 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 470.)

"A mortgage given for the unpaid balance of purchase-money on a sale of land, simultaneously with a deed of the same and as a part of the same transaction, takes precedence of prior judgments and all other existing and subsequent claims and liens of every kind against the mortgagor, to the extent of the land sold." (27 Cyc. 1180.)

"As a general rule, a mortgage given to secure purchase money is none the less a purchase-money mortgage because executed to one who lends the purchase money rather than to the vendor of the property." (23 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 466.)

"Where a purchaser of land, at the same time he receives a conveyance, executes a mortgage to a third person, who advances the purchase-money for him, such mortgage is entitled to the same preference over other liens existing against the mortgagor as it would have had if it had been made to the vendor himself." (27 Cyc. 1182.)

The finding which is attacked as without support in the evidence is to the effect that the deed was delivered to Leben before LeGrande had time to have the abstracts brought down to date. The court also found that the parties contemplated that the mortgage should be shown on the abstract, and in this view the finding as to insufficient time was well founded.

Complaint is made of the rejection of evidence offered by the Lebens, chiefly relating to their information regarding the land. The rejected evidence has been examined and is not regarded as affecting the vital questions by which the controversy is to be determined. The court found that LeGrande had not been guilty of any fraud or misrepresentation in the deal with the Lebens.

The appellants also contend that they should have been allowed a jury trial on the ground that the essential [621] matter in controversy is the title to the real estate. It is conceded that Park v. Busenbark, 59 Kan. 65, 51 Pac. 907, is against the contention, but we are asked to review that decision. We think the present case falls in the class of those in which a jury trial is not a matter of right.

The judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.

In the reported case the court treats a mortgage given to secure money used in purchasing the property mortgaged as a purchase-money mortgage, and holds that the mortgage has priority over a deed to the same property executed by the mortgagor before he received the title from his vendor. The question of the priority as between a purchase-money mortgage and other claims is discussed at length in the note to Western Tie, etc. Co. v. Campbell, reported ante, this volume, at page 943.

BUILDING COMMISSION OF CITY OF DETROIT

v.

KUNIN ET AL.

Michigan Supreme Court—July 24, 1914.

181 Mich. 604; 148 N. W. 207.

Municipal Corporations — Injunction against Violation of Ordinance.

A building ordinance which authorizes the department of buildings to stop the construction or removal of any building constructed in violation of the ordinance, and, if the order be not obeyed, to apply to any court to restrain any person from disobeying the order, empowers the department of buildings to sue to enjoin a threatened violation of the ordinance by the erection of a building.

[See note at end of this case.]

Burden of Showing Invalidity of Ordinance.

One asserting the invalidity of a municipal ordinance has the duty of establishing the invalidity, and the court must, if it can consistently do so, give to the ordinance such a reasonable construction as will sustain it, but it may not invade legislative power.

[See Ann. Cas. 1916B 502.]

Reasonableness of Building Ordinance.

A provision in a building ordinance of a city that in the rear of every tenement subsequently erected there shall be a yard across the entire width of the lot open from the ground to the sky, unobstructed except by fire escapes, or uninclosed outside stairs and porches, and the depth of the lot measured in the clear from the porches to the rear line of the lot shall not be less than 15 feet in any part, is reasonable, and the court cannot adjudge it invalid under its power to adjudge ordinances invalid when clearly unreasonable or oppressive.

[See, as to building lines, 19 Ann. Cas. 188.]

Construction of Building Ordinance.

A provision in a building ordinance that in the rear of every tenement subsequently erected there shall be a yard not less than 15 feet in depth, measured in the clear from the porches to the rear line and the provision that no tenement shall cover more than 80 per cent. of a lot bounded by two or more intersecting streets must be construed together and in harmony with each other, and a proposed tenement may not violate either provision.

Estoppel to Enforce Ordinance.

The granting by the building department of a city of a building permit under a misconception of the building ordinance not requiring a permit does not thereby estop the department from suing in equity to enjoin the construction of the building in violation of the ordinance.

[See 137 Am. St. Rep. 367.]

Same.

Where one constructing a building disregarded provisions of the building ordinance, and had early notice thereof, but continued the construction, he could not rely on an equitable estoppel to prevent the building department of the city, consenting by mistake of law to the erection of the building, from maintaining a suit to enjoin the construction because violative of the ordinance.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wayne county: MURPHY, Judge.

Action for injunction. Building Commission of City of Detroit, plaintiff, and Samuel Kunin et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

McHugh, Gallagher, O'Neil & McGinn for appellants.

Richard I. Lawson and James H. Lee for appellee.

[605] KUNN, J.—The bill of complaint in this cause prays [606] for an injunction restraining the defendants from continuing the construction of a building in the city of Detroit alleged to be in violation of an ordinance of said city known as the building code. The defendants demurred to the bill of complaint, and, upon their demurrer being overruled, filed an answer and cross-bill denying complainant's right to injunctive relief. Upon hearing, the cross-bill was dismissed and the defendants enjoined, as prayed for in complainant's bill of complaint. From this decree the defendants have appealed, and counsel, in their brief, state that the questions involved are as follows:

(1) May a municipality enjoin a threatened violation of an ordinance?

(2) Is section 7, art. 31 of the building code valid?

(3) After issuing the permit and allowing defendants to expend from $10,000 to $12,000 upon the building, is the city estopped from complaining of the violation of the ordinance?

In support of the contention that equity will not enjoin a threatened violation of a municipal ordinance, the cases of St. Johns v. McFarlan, 33 Mich. 72, 20 Am. Rep. 671, and Micks v. Mason, 145 Mich. 212, 214, 215, 108 N. W. 707, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 653, 9 Ann. Cas. 291, are relied upon. In the latter case this court said:

"The question here is whether a municipality in pursuance to delegated authority to fix fire limits and to direct the manner of constructing buildings within such district with respect to protection against fire, may, by ordinance, provide that a building not so constructed shall be deemed a nuisance and authorize its abatement as such. Such right was not negated by St. Johns v. McFarlan, supra, and has never been denied by this court. The question has often arisen in other jurisdictions, and, so far as our examination enlightens us, the authority to abate new buildings constructed in violation of existing ordinances has been affirmed whenever the question has arisen. Not in all cases has the right to abate been [607] rested on the ground that a building not constructed in compliance with the ordinance is a nuisance per se, but in some it has been deemed sufficient to say that the building so erected was erected in defiance of law; but, whatever the reasoning adopted, the right has been affirmed. See Hine v. New Haven, 40 Conn. 478; Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575, 50 Am. Rep. 830; Mt. Vernon First Nat. Bank v. Sarlls, 129 Ind. 201, 28 N. E. 434, 13 L.R.A. 481, 28 Am. St. Rep. 185; Com. v. McDonald, 16 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 390; Arundel v. McCulloch, 10 Mass. 70; Klingler v. Bickel, 117 Pa. St. 326, 11 Atl. 555 (distinguishing Fields v. Stokley, 99 Pa. St. 306, 44 Am. Rep. 109, cited by the circuit judge); Ford v. Thralkill, 84 Ga. 169, 10 S. E. 600; McKibbin v. Ft. Smith, 35 Ark. 352; Eichenlaub v. St. Joseph, 113 Mo. 395, 21 S. W. 8, 18 L.R.A. 590; Freund on Police Power, § 528."

The ordinance in question provides, in addition to its penal provisions, that:

"The department of buildings shall have the power after notice and hearing to stop the construction, repair, alteration or removal of any building, fence, billboard, sign or other structure, when being constructed in violation of this ordinance, and to order in writing any and all persons in any way engaged, to stop and desist from such construction, and such construction shall not be resumed until the terms of this ordinance shall have been complied with.

"If such order is not obeyed, the department of buildings may apply to any court of competent jurisdiction to restrain any person from such disobedience, notwithstanding such disobedience may be punishable by fine or imprisonment as hereinafter provided."

It is true that the ordinance does not in terms declare a building erected in violation of its provisions a nuisance, but, by virtue of this provision for its enforcement, it does so in effect, and therefore, in our opinion, brings the situation within the spirit of decisions above cited.

[608] The other two questions involved in this appeal are clearly treated in the opinion of the learned trial judge in deciding the cause below, and, as we agree with his conclusions, will adopt his opinion as our own:

"Pursuant to a local act passed at the legislative session of 1907, authorizing the city of Detroit to regulate the construction of buildings, and to establish a department of buildings, the common council of that city duly adopted an ordinance known as the building code of the city of Detroit, which was in force at the time in issue herein.

"By the terms of the code, any building intended to be occupied, wholly or in part, as a residence for three or more families living independently of each other, and having cooking done on the premises, is called a 'tenement.' Apparently through omission no building permit is required to be issued by the department of buildings for the construction of a tenement, although permits must be obtained before the construction of any other kind of building may be begun.

"Upon July 21, 1913, however, the department of buildings issued a building permit for a tenement to the defendant Swirsky, as architect, and to the defendant Kunin, as owner of a lot situated on the northeast corner of Third and Merrick avenues, in the city of Detroit, this lot, having a frontage as platted of 45 feet on Third avenue, and a depth of 125 feet on Merrick avenue. The accompanying plans filed with the department of buildings showed that a brick veneered building of nine housekeeping apartments for families was intended to be built, entrance into three of which was to be had from Third avenue, and entrance to the others was to be had from Merrick avenue. One of the three apartments facing Third avenue was in the basement; the others, for the first and second floors of the building, had their entrance from the first floor. Work upon the construction of the building was begun soon after the permit was obtained. As planned, this tenement is in compliance with section 4 of article 31 of the code. By that section no tenement is permitted to cover more than 80 per cent. of a lot bounded by two or more intersecting streets.

[609] "It is contended in this case, however, that, as constructed, the building violates so much of section 7 of article 31 of the code as provides that: 'In the rear of every tenement hereafter erected, there shall be a yard, extending across the entire width of the lot, at every point open from the ground to the sky unobstructed except by fire escapes or uninclosed outside stairs and porches. The depth of said yard, measured in the clear from the porches to the rear line of the lot shall not be less than 15 feet in any part.'

"The defendant Philip H. Garelick is the contractor for the work of erecting the building; he also appears to have some interest in the land.

"Upon November 24, 1913, the department of buildings revoked the permit issued for the construction of the building, upon the ground that its erection would be contrary to that part of section 7 of article 31 just quoted. This action of the department was taken, pursuant to a writ of mandamus issued out of this court in the case of Stella W. Stewart, Relator, v. Department of Buildings, Respondent, being File No. 58,063. These defendants were not parties to that proceeding, and are therefore not bound by it. It was instituted by Mrs. Stewart as the owner of property immediately contiguous on the north of the premises herein involved. The writ which was granted provided that, as the building in question was being erected in violation of section 7 of article 31, cited above, the department of buildings should, after due notice to the defendants Kunin and Swirsky, enter an order stopping the construction of the building and preventing resumption of the work thereon until the building code had been complied with in the respect mentioned. This writ of mandamus issued November 20, 1913.

"After due revocation of the permit by the department of buildings, work was resumed by the defendants Kunin and Swirsky upon the building, and was continued, intermittently, if not consecutively, until as late a day as December 30, 1913. Some of this last-mentioned work, however, if not all of it, was prosecuted by them in order that thereby the issues raised herein might properly be made the basis of a suitable action.

[610] "This bill was filed by the department of buildings—described, in the bill, as the building commission of the city of Detroit—on January 10, 1914, and seeks permanently to enjoin the defendants from the further erection of the building until compliance has been had with the provisions of the building code.

"Demurrer was interposed by the defendants, and, coming on to be heard by Judge Van Zile in this court, was overruled by him, and the cause was set down for immediate hearing as soon as answer should be filed. The defendants have now answered, and also seek affirmative relief. They ask that the department of buildings be enjoined from in any manner interfering with the completion of the building.

"During the progress of the hearing a view of the premises was had. It was then learned by the complainant for the first time that there had been, without authority, a departure from the plan filed with it and pursuant to which its permit was originally granted. The plan providing for the entrances to the first and second floor apartments upon Third avenue has been abandoned, and these apartments have been constructed so that entrance to them would be from Merrick avenue. Thus the only apartment left facing Third avenue was the one in the basement upon that street. This has resulted practically in making the frontage of the tenement wholly upon Merrick avenue.

"As bearing upon the general attitude of the defendants, it is likewise significant to note that the view of the premises also disclosed their failure to comply with an alteration exacted by the department by which the rear porches were to be reduced in size. These porches have been constructed as originally planned, and not in conformity with the reduction in size ordered.

"The defendants take the position that the requirement of section 7 of article 31, above cited, is so unreasonable that it must be held invalid. They furthermore invoke the defense of estoppel. In this respect it is contended that the complainant is guilty of laches in the premises, in permitting the work to be undertaken under its permit and to be prosecuted until a time when the defendants, in good faith, had [611] expended a very large sum of money upon their undertaking.

"Approaching the question of the claimed invalidity of section 7, one is confronted with the presumption of the validity of this enactment. The duty of establishing invalidity rests upon the defendants. The court is required, if it can consistently do so, to give to the provision such a reasonable construction, as will sustain it. It has no right to invade the legislative province. Its power is confined to those cases in which a municipal ordinance is clearly and manifestly made to appear to be unreasonable or oppressive in its operation.

"I am unable to reach the conclusion contended for in this respect by the defendants. Upon analysis of this section it may appear that some other or different provision might equally serve the demands of wholesome housing in a populous community such as the city of Detroit. That, however, is a matter for the legislative, and not the judicial, discretion. Such provisions as these are intended not solely for the welfare of the occupants of the premises being constructed; they are beneficial as well for those who live in buildings immediately adjacent and for the community as a whole. Just what specific considerations operated upon the common council in reaching the conclusion enacted by the ordinance does not appear; nor is there any testimony which, in my view, shows the application of section 7 to the lot in question to be unreasonable. This much must be taken for granted: The common council acted with knowledge of the prevailing width and depth of lots in this community. Even should some unreasonable result appear in an isolated case as the consequence of the council's action, this could not be made to justify invalidating the enactment. In my judgment, therefore, neither in its general terms nor in its specific application is the ordinance shown to be unreasonable.

"The discovery upon the inspection of the premises that the plan of the building had been changed without authority so as to give it, as was said above, practically its whole frontage on Merrick avenue presents a situation not contemplated by the pleadings.

[612] "Under the plan as originally presented and approved by the department, the contemplated building was approved as coming within the provisions of section 4, and the position was taken that section 7, being in conflict therewith, was not applicable.

"In my view, however, these two sections must be read together, or construed as in harmony with each other, and not hostile to each other. This building, with these two sections so construed, must, in my judgment, as it now stands, be regarded as fronting upon Merrick avenue, and not on Third avenue, as the department viewed the matter when issuing the permit. This is the situation which has been created by the voluntary and unwarranted act of the defendant. It may be noted in passing that, even if the building were regarded as fronting on Third avenue and its rear as abutting the alley to the east, the provision of section 7 is violated.

"With section 7 held to be enforceable, is it shown that the defendants are entitled to any equitable relief under their claim that the complainant is estopped from maintaining its bill? No permit was required as a prerequisite to the commencement of this building. The issuance of one was a mere gratuity. The department acted under the misconstruction of the code in making the interpretation that section 7 had no application to the situation. Here, then, was a permit issued without sanction of the ordinance and under a misconstruction of it. The department files this bill under the authority given to it by section 7 of article 2, in which it is given power to 'apply to any court of competent jurisdiction to restrain any person from such disobedience [as is here involved] notwithstanding such disobedience may be punishable by fine or imprisonment.'

"The violation of article 7 of section 31 was brought to the attention of the complainant some time before September 25, 1913. It was brought to the attention of these defendants, surely, upon October 10, 1913, if not before. Upon this last-named date they received a written notice from the complainant, advising them that further continuance of the work must be done at their own peril.

"What, then, is the situation of the defendants? They procured a permit which had no legal status, [613] since no such authorization is warranted by the ordinance. The defendants must be held to have had notice of this. All persons dealing with municipalities and their agents act with constructive, if not actual, knowledge of the limitations upon the delegated powers of cities and their instrumentalities. The defendants took nothing with their permit. It was an extralegal instrument. Of itself, it was without efficacy.

"The complainant concededly did allow the defendants to proceed with the building until the formal order of revocation was made. Does this operate to estop it herein? In discussing this question, the conduct of the defendants must be considered.

"By the terms of section 2 of article 31 they were required to comply with the terms of the building code. By section 8 of article 3 it is made unlawful to alter or modify the plans approved by the department. Any alteration may be made only after written application therefor is presented in writing, and written approval obtained. Section 9, art. 3. The defendants have wilfully disregarded these important provisions. Furthermore, they had notice, as has already been stated, as early as October 10, 1913, and probably earlier, that this building, as approved, was in contravention of the ordinance.

"Keeping these facts in mind, what is to be said of the claim of estoppel? It is the position of the complainant that estoppel cannot be interposed to deprive the city of the beneficial enforcement of the ordinance. It is contended that a ministerial board, such as the complainant, cannot by such conduct as is here shown foreclose compliance with the ordinance. In my view, it is not necessary to pass upon that contention, for it is beside the facts of this case.

"The facts which call for the application of a principle are these: There was consent by the complainant to the erection of an unlawful building. There was notice while work was in progress to the defendants that their plan was unlawful, and some continuation of the work by them after such notice. They themselves disregarded the obligation of the ordinance by building, without consent, a structure different from the one for which they obtained approval. [614] They failed to comply with the valid order of the board with respect to the rear porches.

"In my judgment, they are not in a position to invoke the doctrine of equitable estoppel, even though, under other circumstances, where entire good faith upon the part of those making it is shown, it be available as against a municipality in an analogous situation.

"A decree may be taken dismissing the cross-bill and granting the relief sought in the bill."

The decree is affirmed, with costs to the complainant.

NOTE.

Right of Municipality to Enjoin Violation of Municipal Ordinance.

Generally.

While a violation of a municipal ordinance will ordinarily be enjoined at the suit of a private person sustaining a special injury (see the note to Bangs v. Dworak, 13 Ann. Cas. 202), a court of equity will not, at the suit of the municipality itself, restrain the threatened violation of an ordinance unless the violation of the ordinance constitutes a nuisance: De Queen v. Fenton, 98 Ark. 521, 136 S. W. 945; Rochester v. Walters, 27 Ind. App. 194, 60 N. E. 1101; St. Johns v. McFarlan, 33 Mich. 72, 20 Am. Rep. 671; Higgins v. Lacroix, 119 Minn. 145, 137 N. W. 128, 20 Am. St. Rep. 123, 8 L.R.A. 808. And see Mt. Vernon First Nat. Bank v. Sarila, 129 Ind. 201, 28 N. E. 434, 28 Am. St. Rep. 185, 13 L.R.A. 481, 37 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 445; Monticello v. Bates, 163 Ky. 38, 173 S. W. 159.

In Kansas City Gunning Advertising Co. v. Kansas City, 240 Mo. 659, 679, 144 S. W. 1099, 1104, the court said: "The object of the cross-bills of defendants is to secure the enforcement of the ordinance by a mandatory injunction. The ordinance is a quasi-criminal enactment. Its sanction is a fine against the owner and the prevention of his injurious use of his property by causing its removal so as to conform to the ordinance in the event he should continue, after the passage of the ordinance and beyond the time limit for compliance therewith, to use his property to the public detriment as defined in said ordinance. The jurisdiction of equity to prevent irreparable injury to property is not divested by the fact that the act to be enjoined may also be a violation of the criminal law; neither does a court of equity lack power to enjoin the continuance of a public nuisance. Its action in these instances is incidental and grows out of its inherent jurisdiction to protect property rights from destruction and to conserve the morals of the people. . . . But a court of chancery is not a medium for the enforcement of the criminal law, hence it scans closely transactions having that aspect before entertaining jurisdiction. It may be that an exigency could arise which would warrant a suit in equity to enjoin the plaintiff and other persons from violating the terms of the ordinance under review, but we do not think that it now exists. The ordinance passed by Kansas City in the proper exercise of its governmental power contains within itself the efficient means of enforcement against this plaintiff and all other persons affected thereby. It points out in terms (sections 9 and 10) the proper methods by which and the time within which obedience to its commands may be compelled, thus affording to the city a full, complete and unembarrassed remedy by legal procedure, and leaving no present basis for its counter-suit in equity. . . .

It follows that there is no impediment in the way of a full enforcement of all the provisions of said ordinance (except section 4) in the manner therein specified and defined, and plaintiff had the full measure of relief to which it was entitled by the injunction awarded against the enforcement of section 4; and that its bill should have been dismissed as to all other purposes and objects; and that the cross-bill filed by defendants should not have been sustained, for the reason that the city has a full, complete and unembarrassed remedy at law in the manner pointed out in its ordinance to enforce all the provisions thereof, except section 4, at once against plaintiff and other owners of bill boards, bulletin boards and advertising structures." In Butler v. Logan, 19 Pa. Dist. 952, it was said: "There remains, however, the question whether a court of equity has authority to intervene in order to the protection of an exclusive right granted by a municipal ordinance. That courts of equity may, in a proper case, exercise their authority to prevent or abate a nuisance is beyond question. But we are not now dealing with a public nuisance. It is not alleged, nor does the proof show, that the defendants were collecting garbage in a manner which created a public nuisance. Their equipment was of the kind required by the ordinance under consideration, and there was no complaint that their work was carried on in a negligent manner. In fact, their vocation was fostered to some extent by a lack of diligence on the part of Wallace, the licensed agent of the borough, in looking after the collection of garbage. But this fact in no way affects the question now before the court. The defendants were not doing that which constituted a public nuisance per se or which had been made such by statute. They were simply violating a borough ordinance, without which their acts would not have been an offense. . . . In so far, therefore, as the mere question of the infraction of the ordinance is concerned, a court of equity is without authority to redress the public wrong growing out of the violation. The ordinance itself provides a penalty for its violation, and this remedy must be invoked for the desired redress, so far as the public right growing out of the provisions of the ordinance is concerned.

We conclude, first, that, in so far as the borough of Butler seeks to restrain by injunction violations of its ordinance by the defendants, a court of equity is without authority to intervene. If the penalty provided for in the ordinance is not such as to prevent its violation, the municipal authorities can so increase it as to make it prohibitive of the offense. This, as we take it, may be done in any case where prevention of an offense is justifiable." In Janesville v. Carpenter, 77 Wis. 288, 46 N. W. 128, 20 Am. St. Rep. 123, 8 L.R.A. 808, wherein it was charged that the erection of a building on piles driven in the bed of a river was a violation of a city ordinance, it was held that that fact would not give a cause of action for an injunction. In Mt. Vernon v. Seeley, 74 App. Div. 50, 77 N. Y. S. 250, which was an action to enjoin the posting of advertising bills within a city until an ordinance requiring the obtaining of a permit had been complied with, it was held that as there was no allegation in the complaint or any facts from which the conclusion could be derived that the act sought to be restrained was a nuisance, an injunction would be denied. In Borough of Forty Fort v. Forty Fort Water Co. 9 Kulp (Pa.) 241, the court said: "Conceding that the borough council has authority, under the general powers contained in its charter, to enact the ordinance in question, its violation by way only of a continuance after it went into effect of acts previously begun, and without knowledge of the pendency of such legislation, or by way of neglecting to ask a second time for a permit for which council had exacted a clearly unwarranted concession, is not shown to constitute any irreparable injury or to entitle the borough to specific relief, as by the provisions of the ordinance itself the prescribed remedy for a violation is a fine, and, as has been shown, an action is already pending to recover a fine for failing to file a map." In De Queen v. Fenton, 98 Ark. 521, 136 S. W. 945, which was a suit brought by the city of De Queen to enjoin the defendants from permitting stock and cattle owned by them from running at large within the limits of said city, it was alleged in the complaint that two ordinances had been passed by the proper authorities of the city prohibiting the running at large of cattle and other stock within its corporate limits, one of the ordinances declaring it to be unlawful for the owner of stock or cattle to allow the same to run at large in the city, and penalizing the owner and impounding the stock or cattle, and the other ordinance declaring the running at large of stock or cattle within the city to be a nuisance, and imposing a fine on the owner. The complaint further alleged that the defendants resided outside of the city and knowingly permitted their stock and cattle to run at large within the limits thereof in violation of the ordinances, thereby creating a public nuisance. It was alleged that the ordinances were difficult of enforcement, and that under the statutes of the state the defendant's cattle could not be impounded because the defendants resided outside of the city, and for these reasons it was alleged that the city had no adequate remedy to protect its citizens against the depredations of the cattle and stock, and on this ground it based its right to obtain an injunction against the defendants. The court said: "The violation of such ordinances is an infraction of the criminal law, and the police courts of cities and towns are the proper forums in which to pursue a criminal prosecution for the violation thereof. A chancery court has no criminal jurisdiction, and will not exercise its powers solely to enforce criminal laws. A complete and adequate remedy for the violation of the criminal statutes of the state and of municipal ordinances is afforded by the courts of law, and those courts have full power to pass upon the scope and validity of such laws and ordinances. It has been held by this court that the chancery court has no jurisdiction to restrain acts solely because they are criminal. . . . From the allegations of the complaint it appears that there are two ordinances of the city of De Queen prohibiting the acts complained of. Criminal prosecution can therefore be instituted against the defendants for these acts, which, it is alleged, are violations of these ordinances. If these ordinances have in fact and in law been violated by the defendants, there can be no legal difficulty in enforcing them."

In a few instances municipal ordinances have been enforced by injunction under a charter or statute expressly so providing. Stillwell v. Buffalo Riding Academy, 21 Abb. N. Cas. 472, 4 N. Y. S. 414; Ogden v. Welden, 61 Hun 621 mem. 15 N. Y. S. 790. And see Young v. Scheu, 56 Hun 307, 9 N. Y. S. 349. And see the reported case. In Rochester v.

Gutherlett, 2 N. Y. 309, Ann. Cas. 1915C 483, 105 N. E. 548, L.R.A.1915D 209, the court said: "The right to maintain an action to restrain violation of penal and other ordinances is expressly given to the plaintiff, as we have seen by its charter. Such right of action is concurrent with the legal action to recover for a violation of the ordinance. It is based upon the inadequacy as a remedy of successive actions following a series of violations. The equitable action is designed not only to prevent a multiplicity of legal actions, but to prevent a continuous injury to public health that might exist unabated while wilful violations of the ordinance were continued." So, in New York City, under its charter, it has been held that an action for an injunction will lie at the suit of the department of buildings for the enforcement of the sections of its building Code with respect to the erection of sky signs. New York v. M. Wineburgh Advertising Co. 122 App. Div. 748, 107 N. Y. S. 478; Kobbe Co. v. New York, 122 App. Div. 755, 107 N. Y. S. 489. And see Matter of New York, 122 App. Div. 741, 107 N. Y. S. 484.

If the violation of an ordinance constitutes a public nuisance it will be enjoined. Pine City v. Munch, 42 Minn. 342, 44 N. W. 197, 6 L.R.A. 763. And see the reported case. See also, as to ordinances establishing fire limits, the following subdivision of this note. In Pine City v. Munch, supra, the court said: "We can see no valid reason why, in proper cases falling within some recognized head of equity jurisdiction, a municipal corporation, as the representative of the state pro hac vice, may not, at its election, resort to a court of equity to aid in enforcing its public duties to preserve the health of its inhabitants. As there is, in analogous cases, a judicial remedy in favor of the citizen, it would seem, on principle, that the corporate authorities should be allowed to resort to the courts to aid them when the citizen is in the wrong. Limited strictly to such cases, we do not see that this right at all impinges upon the rule that a private person cannot maintain an action to abate a public nuisance not causing injury special in kind to himself. Neither would this be the exercise by the corporation of a control over nuisances not granted by its charter, but merely resorting to the courts for a more effectual judicial remedy to aid in enforcing its granted powers. There are many cases, of which this would seem to be one, where the remedy by injunction would be much more efficacious than by enforcing the penalties of an ordinance; and where the nuisance is one affecting only or principally the inhabitants of the municipality, and its abatement is among the powers granted or duties imposed upon it, there would seem to be no good reason why the action to abate might not be brought in the name of the municipality, as well as in the name of the state itself by the attorney general."

Ordinance Prohibiting Erection of Wooden Building within Fire Limits.

It has been held that a municipality cannot maintain a suit to restrain the threatened violation of a penal ordinance, which prescribes limits within which a wooden building may not be erected: Rochester v. Walters, 27 Ind. App. 194, 60 N. E. 1101; St. Johns v. McFarlan, 33 Mich. 72, 20 Am. Rep. 671; Manchester v. Smyth, 64 N. H. 380, 10 Atl. 700, 18 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 474; Brockport v. Johnston, 13 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 468; New Rochelle v. Lang, 75 Hun 608, 27 N. Y. S. 600; Reynolds v. Harris, 11 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 509; 27 Cinn. L. Bul. 229; Williamsport v. McFadden, 15 W. N. C. (Pa.) 269; Honesdale v. Weaver, 2 Pa. Dist. 344; Ellwood City v. Mani, 16 Pa. Co. Ct. 474; Waupun v. Moore, 34 Wis. 450, 17 Am. Rep. 446. And see Mt. Vernon First Nat. Bank v. Sarils, 129 Ind. 201, 28 N. E. 494, 28 Am. St. Rep. 185, 13 L.R.A. 481, 37 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 445; Monticello v. Bates, 163 Ky. 38, 173 S. W. 159.

In Rochester v. Walters, supra, the court said: "The only ground upon which an injunction was asked was because the erection of the building would be a violation of the ordinance. It is perhaps true that a municipality might restrain the erection or maintenance of anything within the corporate limits that was in and of itself a nuisance, or if the erection of the building would work special and irreparable injury to the municipality or to its property. But in the case at bar the erection of the prohibited building within the fire limits was not a nuisance per se, and the injunction was asked simply because the contemplated act was a violation of the ordinance. A city ordinance has to the people within its reach all the force and effect of a legislative enactment. The ordinance in question provides a penalty for its violation, and neither the municipality nor a private citizen can ask a court of equity simply to enforce the ordinance by injunction. The reasoning that would permit such a proceeding would authorize a court of equity to restrain by injunction the violation of a criminal statute." In Waupun v. Moore, 34 Wis. 450, 17 Am. Rep. 446, it was said: "The jurisdiction of courts of equity, in proper cases, to restrain the erection or maintenance of nuisances, public or private, is undoubted. But the defendant was not about to erect a nuisance. If it is unlawful for him to erect the building in question, it is made so by the ordinance alone. Without the ordinance, no one can successfully dispute his right to do so. The question is, therefore, Will a court of equity enjoin an act which would otherwise be lawful, but which is made unlawful by a village ordinance or by-law? We find the principle stated in several very respectable authorities, that equity will not lend its aid to enforce by injunction the by-laws or ordinances of a municipal corporation, restraining an act unless the act is shown to be a nuisance per se. . . . None of the cases to which we have been referred by the counsel for the plaintiffs holds that an injunction can properly issue under such circumstances, and we have been unable to find a case holding that doctrine. To hold that an injunction can properly issue in this case, would be to overturn all of the authorities on the subject, and to interpolate into the law a new rule or principle of equity jurisprudence. This we have no right or authority to do. We may not make the law, but only declare it as we find it. We must hold, therefore, that, under the averments of the complaint, no injunction can properly be issued to restrain the defendant from proceeding with the erection of his building, and that the village authorities can only resort to their legal remedies in that behalf. The provision in the ordinance directing the board to proceed by injunction in such cases, cannot operate to extend the jurisdiction of a court of equity." In Manchester v. Smyth, 64 N. H. 380, 10 Atl. 700, 18 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 474, the court said: "The plaintiff seeks the extraordinary remedy of a perpetual injunction against the defendant's proposed erection and enlargement of his building, claimed to be in violation of a penal ordinance of the city made to prevent the spread of fire. The equity powers of the court are not often, if ever, invoked or used to restrain or suppress the commission of crimes and misdemeanors, either as a substitute for the remedy by prosecution for the penalty affixed to the offense, or to obviate the necessity of repeated prosecutions. The equity jurisdiction of the court undoubtedly includes, in proper cases, the restraining by injunction of the erection and maintenance of nuisances, public and private. To warrant the application of this restraining power, the danger of irreparable mischief or injury must be imminent and clearly made to appear. . . . The act sought to be restrained must be one which, if performed or executed, will inevitably bring on the danger threatened by it. It must be a nuisance in fact, and not one created solely by statutory enactment or municipal ordinance. . . . In this case, the defendant's proposed raising and enlargement of his building, if carried to completion, would neither be a nuisance in fact, nor the occasion of irreparable mischief or injury. The ground of complaint is, that the danger from fire will be increased, but the case finds that the proposed change will neither increase nor diminish that danger. But for the ordinance prohibiting and restricting the change it would be lawful, and the defendant's right to carry out the undertaking would be unquestioned." In Williamsport v. McFadden, 15 W. N. C. (Pa.) 269, it was said: "The statute which confers the power on the city to establish by ordinance fire limits, provides that it may fix penalties for the violation of such ordinance. Here is a clear remedy fixed by law. It does not appear that the penalties now fixed are inadequate for the purpose. If the penalties now fixed by the ordinance are inadequate to secure its enforcement, the power to make them sufficient is vested in the city plaintiff. Until the city has exercised all its powers in endeavoring to enforce its ordinances, surely it has no right to complain. If the court has jurisdiction to aid by injunction in enforcing this ordinance, the same relief may be sought in enforcing the ordinances relating to the keeping open of barber shops on Sunday; the sale of quack medicines on the streets; the sale of unwholesome food in the markets, and indeed everything else which the city has the power to regulate."

In Skanateles v. Hennessey, 62 Misc. 347, 116 N. Y. S. 788, it was held that where the trustees of a village, though empowered by statute "to prevent the construction or rebuilding of wooden buildings, or the use of any building within the fire limits of materials liable to take fire," had failed to establish any fire limits, they could not enjoin the erection in the village of a wooden building.

In Reynolds v. Harris, 11 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 509, 27 Cinc. L. Bul. 229, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff had obtained a permit to build after the passage of an ordinance establishing a fire limit but prior to its publication, it was held that the erection of the building would not be restrained. The court said: "Now the question is whether the city can obtain an injunction after the plaintiff had gone on and expended $1,500 in order to get his building up, spent that amount of money to get his building almost completed. Can he be enjoined from completing it? In other words, can this court now, by its injunctive process, interfere with his right of property, the right to enjoy the property he lawfully erected? The claim that this court could do so, springs, as far as I am advised, from sec. 10 of this statute: 'All buildings hereafter erected within the fire limits of said city shall be enclosed with walls constructed of brick, stone or other hard incombustible substances, and the foundations shall rest upon solid ground, concrete, or other solid and sufficient structure.' That is the kind of building required. Here is the remedy; sec. 7: 'That any person, firm or corporation, either as owner, contractor or architect, or any agent, trustee, director, officer or employee of any person, firm or corporation, who violates or authorizes a violation of any provision of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be subject to a fine not exceeding the sum of one thousand dollars, or an imprisonment not exceeding three months, or both in the discretion of the court or judge imposing the same.' Now, Mr. Reynolds, the plaintiff had done nothing down to the twenty-eighth in violation of this act or any other act. The city has no right to interfere with what has been legally done. If this statute provides otherwise it is unconstitutional. Private property cannot be violated under the terms of the constitution. The legislature has no more power than I have to deprive a person of his property without due process of law. It is inhibited from doing so both by the federal and state constitutions. The doctrine is settled, that a person may construct a wooden building, and no injunction will lie for doing so, although such erection is prohibited by ordinance, unless the erection is shown to be a nuisance per se. The remedy the courts say must be found in the penalty imposed in the statute.

Equity never lends its aid to enforce a forfeiture. I think this court has no right to interfere with what has been lawfully done by the plaintiff. It cannot interfere with his building. There is but one other question that suggests itself. The plaintiff having proceeded thus far by authority of law to construct the building, and nearly completed it, and made this large expenditure of money, it seems to me that a court of equity ought not to restrain him from completing it. There is nothing in this law against a man completing a building that is lawfully nearly completed. The provision is, 'All buildings hereafter erected within fire limits.' 'Hereafter' relates to the time after the twenty-eighth of February when the ordinance became operative. This building was not erected after the ordinance took effect, and therefore does not fall within the operations of this statute, which were set in operation by the ordinance. It is true that in the next to the last section of the statute it is said that a court of equity may, on the application of the inspector, in a suit brought in the name of the city, issue an injunction to enforce the provisions of the statute, but in the case at bar the building was not erected or altered in violation of the provisions of this act, because it was erected before the ordinance of February 15th went into effect. The conclusion reached is that the city is not entitled to an injunction, and its application for that relief is denied."

In Monticello v. Bates, 163 Ky. 38, 173 S. W. 159, the court said: "While it is the general rule that when there is an ordinance prohibiting the erection of buildings made of wood or other inflammable material within the limits of a designated fire district, which also provides a remedy for its violation by prosecution and the infliction of a penalty, a court of equity will not grant an injunction restraining the erection of such building; but this rule from its very nature is based upon the idea that the penalty provided therein furnishes a full, complete and adequate remedy, and for that reason, and that reason only, the chancellor will not resort to the writ of injunction. But in this case is any adequate or complete remedy provided? The ordinance prescribing the limits of the fire district provides no penalty by fine or imprisonment for its violation. But it is argued that the ordinance prohibiting the erection of buildings within the city without first procuring a permit, does provide a penalty for its violation, and that if the appellee erected within the city and within the fire district such a building as was not contemplated by the permit issued to him, he was guilty of erecting the same without a permit, and could therefore be punished under the ordinance of 1904. Assuming this position to be correct, and that appellee might be punished by the police court for the violation of that ordinance, the question still remains, is that an adequate and complete remedy? That ordinance only provides for the infliction of a fine of not exceeding one hundred dollars, and if he was punished under it, even to the full extent, he, having been guilty of but one offense, could only be punished once. Ordinances creating fire districts in municipalities are upheld as being within the general police power; they are designed to prevent the erection of inflammable buildings in congested districts so as to lessen the danger from fire and conflagration to the adjoining and nearby property? To subject the appellee in this case to a petty fine for his violation of this ordinance would in no sense relieve the other residents and property owners within the fire district from the menace to their property which this building furnishes; that menace would still remain, and therefore necessarily it follows that the remedy against him would be inadequate and incomplete. It is conceded that the police court has no power to grant an injunction; and it is apparent that it would have had no power to direct or enforce the removal of this house from the fire district, as the house, after its erection, became a part of the real estate, and therefore it could have furnished no adequate remedy either by the exercise of its penal or civil processes."

But where the violation of an ordinance establishing fire limits constitutes a nuisance, an injunction will be granted. New Orleans

Homicide — What Constitutes "Lying in Wait."

Under Code 1907, § 7084, providing that every homicide perpetrated by lying in wait is "murder in the first degree," an instruction in a prosecution for murder, that if the defendants lay in wait for the deceased, and killed him with a gun while lying in wait, they were guilty of murder in the first degree, is proper; "lying in wait" meaning being in ambush for the purpose of murdering another.

[See note at end of this case.]

Instructions — Refusal of Instruction Given in Substance.

Where a requested instruction that the jury might disregard testimony of a witness if they found from the evidence that he had made contradictory statements as to material facts in the case is refused, but others substantially embodying it are given, any error in the refusal is not prejudicial.

Conduct of Judge — Rebuke to Witnesses.

Where the judge, following a question to a witness, stated that it looked like a man who had been justice of the peace ought to have sense enough to answer the questions asked, the statement being a reprimand addressed solely to the witness and not to the jury, and having no bearing upon his credibility, is within the court's proper function.

Witnesses — Impeachment — Stenographic Report of Previous Testimony.

In a prosecution for murder, where, after cross-examination of the defendants, the prosecution offered in evidence, for purposes of impeachment, a stenographic report of their previous inconsistent testimony before the coroner's jury, it being shown by the stenographer that he had taken down only part of the testimony, but that what he had taken down was correctly reproduced, and where the defendants objected to the admission of the report because it did not contain all the testimony, those parts of the report which tended to contradict defendants' testimony at the trial are admissible.

Same.

In a prosecution for murder, where defendants objected generally to the admission in evidence, to impeach their testimony on cross-examination, of a stenographer's transcript of portions of their testimony before the coroner's jury, and parts, at least, of such transcript were admissible, the whole is admissible, since the duty to separate by specific objection the inadmissible from the admissible parts rests upon the defendants alone, not upon the court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cullman county: ALSTON, Judge.

Criminal action. Clyde Patterson et al., convicted of murder and appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

F. E. St. John and Callahan & Harris for appellant.

R. O. Brickell and T. H. Seay for appellee.

[17] McCLELLAN, J.—The appellants were adjudged guilty of the murder of Robert Miller, and are sentenced to imprisonment during their lives. Robert Miller and Rube Carter were shot to death, from a roadside, while traveling in a wagon. A clear case of assassination was made by the proof. The issue was whether appellants, father and son, were among the guilty agents. There was evidence which, if credited, supported the jury's finding. Able counsel appeared in their defense below and appear on this appeal, presenting in full brief the grounds upon which insinuations for reversible errors are rested. In the order of their discussion by appellant's counsel in brief, we will treat in the opinion the asserted errors.

(1) At the instance of the prosecution the court gave the following special instruction to the jury: "I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that if you believe from the evidence in this case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants were lying in wait for the deceased, Robert Miller, and killed him by shooting him with a gun while lying in wait, then they would be guilty of murder in the first degree."

This instruction was in accord with the pertinent language and legal effect of the statute (Code, § 7084), as well as with Mitchell v. State, 60 Ala. 28, 29.

According to Bourvier, "lying in wait" means "being in ambush for the purpose of murdering another." Such is the significance of the phrase, as employed in the quoted instruction.

(2) Appellants complain of the refusal of the court to give the jury this charge: "The court charges the jury that if the witness Mac Miller willfully and intentionally [18] swore falsely that he did not have the conversation with Dr. Baird, as testified to by Dr. Baird, then they may discard all the testimony of Mac Miller."

The substance of the just quoted request for instruction was sufficiently contained in the following charges given at the defendant's instance: "The court charges the jury that if they find from the evidence that Mac Miller has made contradictory statements as to material facts in this case or any of such facts, the jury may look to these contradictory statements in order to determine what credence they will give to the testimony of Mac Miller."

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the witness Mac Miller swore willfully falsely in one particular, the jury are authorized to disregard the evidence of said Mac Miller,

"If the witness Mac Miller has been impeached, then the jury may disregard the entire testimony of said Mac Miller, unless it be corroborated by other testimony not so impeached."

So, even assuming (for occasion only) that there was error in refusing the quoted request for instruction, it was without prejudice to the appellants.

(3, 4) On the cross-examination of defendants' witness W. H. Waldrop, following a simple question propounded to him, the bill recites this matter: "Thereupon the presiding judge stated to the witness in the presence of the jury, and while the witness was on the stand, that it looks like a man who had been a justice of the peace ought to have sense enough or intelligence enough to answer the questions asked."

The evident purpose was to reprimand the witness for a failure to answer the "questions asked," and to promote the orderly, prompt taking of the testimony on [19] the trial. The statement of court had no bearing or effect upon the credibility of the witness or upon the credence to be accorded or that might be accorded the testimony the witness had given or would thereafter give. The statement was addressed to the witness; not to the jury, and was within the court's function to control, within proper limits, the examination of witnesses. There was no error in the utterance of the quoted remarks to the witness. None of the cases cited on brief are authority for a contrary conclusion. After the defendants (appellants) had been cross-examined by the prosecution, during which examination each was asked questions touching his testimony before the coroner's jury, the prosecution offered in evidence the stenographic report made of their testimony on that occasion. It was shown by the testimony of the stenographer who made the report that he did not take down parts of what defendants stated before the coroner's jury, being directed by the state's representative to omit certain matters which he described. The stenographic report was shown to be a correct reproduction of what it purported to reproduce. The bill recites: "The defendants objected to the introduction of said testimony on the ground that all of said testimony was not taken down by the stenographer who took down said testimony before the coroner's jury."

This was the only objection made to the admission in evidence of the stenographic report. All others were thereby waived.

(5) It is manifest that at least parts of the stenographic report were relevant and admissible under the familiar rule for impeaching a witness by showing statements, previously made, contradictory of testimony he has given on the hearing or investigation in progress. [20] Those parts of the stenographic report which tended to contradict the testimony given by the defendants on the trial were admissible. The objection was addressed to the whole of the report offered. If any part of it was admissible, then the objection was due to be overruled. Hill v. State, 146 Ala. 51, 41 So. 621; Longmire v. State, 130 Ala. 66, 30 So. 413. There was no duty on the court to separate the admissible parts of the report from the inadmissible. It was the obligation of the objector to point out in his objection the parts that were inadmissible. In support of the contention for error in this particular, appellants' counsel cite the following decisions delivered here: Tharp v. State, 15 Ala. 755, 756; Horton v. State, 53 Ala. 488, 495; Magee v. Doe, 22 Ala. 699; Gildersleeve v. Caraway, 10 Ala. 260; 44 Am. Dec. 485. All of these decisions relate to previously given testimony of a witness who had since died. In such cases it is essential that the entire testimony of the deceased witness shall be proffered as evidence. The purpose there is the substitution of the attainable—the reproduction—for that which is made unattainable by the death of the witness. The rule there applicable has no application to circumstances here under review. No error appearing, the judgment must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE

What Constitutes "Lying in Wait" within Statute Relating to Homicide.

General Rule.

The general rule is that to constitute lying in wait to commit murder the perpetrator must be in ambush, or concealed for the purpose of taking his victim unawares.

Alabama.—See the reported case. Compare Williams v. State, 130 Ala. 107, 30 So. 484.

California.—See People v. Miles, 55 Cal. 207.

Iowa.—State v. Dooley, 89 Ia. 584, 57 N. W. 414; State v. Tyler, 122 Ia. 125, 97 N. W. 983. See also State v. Cross, 68 Ia. 180, 26 N. W. 62.

Kentucky.—See Turner v. Com. 89 Ky. 78, 1 S. W. 475.

Missouri.—State v. Kilgore, 70 Mo. 546.

North Carolina.—State v. Rose, 129 N. C. 575, 40 S. E. 83. Compare State v. Walker, 86 S. E. 1055.

Oregon.—See State v. Olds, 19 Ore. 397, 24 Pac. 394.

Tennessee.—Barnards v. State, 88 Tenn. 183, 12 S. W. 431.

Texas.—See Monmouth v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. 407, 114 S. W. 114.

Virginia.—See Burgess v. Com. 2 Va. Cas. 488.

West Virginia.—State v. Abbott, 8 W. Va. 741.

It is not enough to constitute homicide by "lying in wait" that the crime is committed from concealment. The concealment must be for the purpose of the homicide. People v. Miles, 55 Cal. 207, wherein the court said that "concealed" is not synonymous with "lying in wait" and added: "If the defendant concealed himself for the purpose of shooting the deceased unawares, then he was lying in wait."

It is not, however, necessary that the concealment should be with a deliberate and premeditated design to take life. Malice and premeditation are inferred in law from lying in wait. Riley v. State, 9 Humph. (Tenn.) 646; State v. Abbott, 8 W. Va. 741. However, in Burgess v. Com. 2 Va. Cas. 488, the court said: "We take the expression 'lying in wait,' not merely to mean his concealing himself in the path of his intended victim, for the purpose of killing him, but the deliberately, and premeditatedly seeking an occasion to effect the deadly purpose." Compare Com. v. Jones, 1 Leigh (Va.) 598.

A recumbent position is not essential to "lying in wait." State v. Tyler, 122 Ia. 125, 97 N. W. 983, wherein the court said that lying in wait does not necessarily refer to the attitude of the body, but rather to its location, and the purpose of taking the person attacked unawares, and continued: "It is the mental poise of the wild beast in quest of prey, and necessarily implies malice, premeditation, deliberation, and the wilful intent. If the accused, armed with a club, was hiding in the darkness with the purpose of assaulting Fairer when unaware of danger, he was, though standing, technically 'lying in wait.'" See also Monmouth v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. 407, 114 S. W. 114, wherein it appeared that the homicide was committed by a person standing behind a stump about six feet high and the court said: "The facts show a cold deliberate assassination by lying in wait."

Concealment is of course essential. State v. Cross, 68 Ia. 180, 26 N. W. 62; State v. Abbott, 8 W. Va. 741. "Three things must concur to wit, waiting, watching, and secrecy." Riley v. State, 9 Humph. (Tenn.) 646. "Lying in wait" means hiding in ambush or concealment." State v. Tyler, 122 Ia. 125, 97 N. W. 983. "Lying in wait," according to Bouvier, is 'being in ambush for the purpose of murdering another.' It implies a hiding or secreting of one's self. It could hardly be claimed that a person walking on a public street in broad daylight in a populous town was lying in wait. I do not think, however, that the statute requires proof that the slayer in such case was secreted; but it requires proof of some fact, aside from the killing, showing that it was done in pursuance of a previous design." State v. Olds, 19 Ore. 397, 24 Pac. 394. In some cases, however, the term has been given a somewhat wider scope as including various instances of homicide under cover of darkness. See State v. Walker (N. C.) 86 S. E. 1055 and other cases set out infra in the subdivision Application of Rule.

Application of Rule.

In Barnards v. State, 88 Tenn. 183, 12 S. W. 431, the court reviewing the facts said: "Sutton owned and operated a licensed distillery on the north side of Clinch River, in Hancock county, and resided three and a half miles away, on the same side of the river. It was his known custom to spend Sunday at home with his family, going to his distillery Monday morning and returning to his home Saturday evening. Late in the afternoon of Saturday, January 12, 1889, while on his way home by his usual route, and when one mile and a half from his distillery, near a small ravine and in a narrow valley between two hills, he was shot from his horse and instantly killed. . . . Were the defendants lying in wait? Was the first shot fired from behind the log, as contended for the state, or from the mossy bank across the road, thirty to forty feet from end of log, as contended by the defendants? This is a vital question, and about it there is much dispute. . . . There were four fresh signs of men behind the log, and what seemed to be a rest under it, is positively and circumstantially sworn by several reputable witnesses, and disputed by none. These signs and this supposed rest are accounted for, in this record, solely and alone upon the theory that four of the de-defendants were behind the log and made them.

We believe they were watching for Sutton's approach, besetting his pathway for the purpose of taking his life." In State v. Abbott, 8 W. Va. 741, in reversing the verdict of the jury and granting a new trial to the defendant the court stated the evidence as follows: "That Grass (the deceased) was killed by the defendant by shooting at the time alleged in the indictment, the evidence as certified seems to establish, but whether the evidence tends to prove that the killing was murder by lying in wait is another question. The only evidence in the cause bearing upon the question as to whether the killing was murder by lying in wait is . . . that on the morning Grass was shot, the defendant and one Anderson Jarrett were out on the 'Highland Field,' on the left hand side of the road going up Paint Creek, with their guns, looking for Southern soldiers who they had heard were coming in; while there they saw Grass and his three sons riding towards Grass' house; that defendant told said Anderson Jarrett to shoot Grass, which Jarrett declined to do; that the defendant then stepped behind a hickory tree and shot Grass, who had then gotten a short distance by the defendant and said Jarrett; that Grass being shot, jumped from the wagon and said he was killed, and got on one of the horses and rode off; that the defendant and Jarrett were about seventy-five yards from said Grass when the shot was fired, that it was two or three minutes from the time defendant and said Anderson Jarrett first saw Grass coming, to the time the shot was fired." Quoting Bouvier that "lying in wait is 'being in ambush for the purpose of murdering another'" the court said further: "The evidence which I have stated did not prove, or sufficiently tend to prove, that the killing amounted to murder by 'lying in wait.' It does not appear, nor does the evidence tend to prove, that the defendant was 'lying in wait' for the deceased, Grass, for any purpose whatever, on the occasion of the shooting." —

In some cases the scope of the term "lying in wait" has been applied to facts other than a concealment in ambush. Thus in Williams v. State, 130 Ala. 107, 30 So. 484, it appeared that "the defendant and his wife conspired together to kill Nicholson, that the wife's part in this conspiracy was to lure him to their house, that to this end she wrote him one, probably two, notes requesting him to come there, that in response to these notes he went there, that defendant loaded his gun and remained at home for the purpose of killing the deceased when he should come, . . . that Nicholson came up to where defendant and his wife were sitting in the door of their house, spoke to them, asked what Mrs. Williams wanted to see him about, and, after talking with her a few minutes on that matter, left them and started to leave the premises," and that defendant then "shot him, when fifty or sixty feet away, in the back." The court said that "the jury could not well escape from finding as they did, that this homicide was perpetrated by lying in wait." And in State v. Walker (N. C.) 86 S. E. 1055, wherein it was objected "that there was no evidence of lying in wait," the court said: "The precedents show that while being in ambush would be lying in wait it is not necessary that a person should be concealed. The testimony here is that the prisoners were waiting and watching for the deceased, or rather for some one whom they took the deceased to be, and that it was after six o'clock on January 20, so dark that the witness Rives testified that while he could see the forms of the men he could not see them well enough to recognize them, and the witness Plunkett says that though he passed within eight or ten feet of them he could not distinctly recognize them. Waiting on the side of the road in the dusk, when it is too dark to be recognized, for a man to shoot and rob is a sufficient 'lying in wait' within the meaning of the charge of the court." Likewise in State v. Dooley, 89 Ia. 584, 57 N. W. 414, where it appeared that the deceased, a "little girl came running in from the barn, and as she came through the door" the defendant "struck her on the head with the padlock, and knocked her down; then shot her in the forehead," the court said that "the jury may have found, from the circumstances connected with the killing of the mother, the fact that the child was at the barn when her mother was killed, the evident desire of the defendant to effect at least a temporary concealment of the crime, and the further fact that the child was killed at the house, that the murder of the latter was accomplished by means of lying in wait, within the meaning of the law." In Riley v. State, 9 Humph. (Tenn.) 646, the court said: "This was done when all was quiet, when there were no angry words between any of the parties, when the deceased and the balance of the company were about to separate for the night: in the darkness and unseen by anyone, the prisoner came behind the deceased, and with a piece of timber four or five feet long, and as large as a stake or small fence rail, with both hands; he struck the deceased a blow on the top of the head, shivering the skull and causing death. Any commentary to show that this is a case of wilful, deliberate, malicious and premeditated killing, would be wholly superfluous. Such clear and unquestionable evidence of a deliberate purpose to kill rarely exists. We think, also, that the jury might have been warranted in finding that there was a lying in wait."

In accord with the foregoing view it has been held that murder committed by shooting the deceased at his home under cover of darkness is committed by "lying in wait." People v. Repke, 103 Mich. 459, 61 N. W. 861; State v. Henderson, 186 Mo. 473, 85 S. W. 576. See also White v. State, 30 Tex. App. 652, 18 S. W. 462. Thus in People v. Repke, 103 Mich. 459, 61 N. W. 861, wherein it appeared that "twelve persons, among whom was respondent, met at a place known as 'Reinke's Hill,' about four and a half miles from Rogers City, in Presque Isle county; and after talking over the object of the meeting, and taking an oath to keep secret what should take place, they went together to Rogers City, arriving there in the evening, and shot through the window and killed Albert Molitor, while he was engaged in his business in the office connected with his store," the court held that "it was a wilful, deliberate murder, perpetrated by lying in wait." Likewise in State v. Henderson, 186 Mo. 473, 85 S. W. 576, the facts as disclosed in a confession of the defendant were as follows: "Brown testified defendant told him that Price Edwards, Bruz Costilo and defendant were together at Price's house and then went together to Joe Buckner's with the intention of killing him, and after they had gone a hundred yards, they stopped and Price told defendant to go back to the house and get the gun, which he did, and then they walked to Buckner's house and they separated, two going together, Edwards and defendant, and Costilo by himself. Costilo went in a little front gate that led to the house from the county road, and the other two went into a big gate some thirty or forty yards east of the little gate, into a road between the orchard and the yard. The dog barked at them. Bruz went into the house and Price and defendant got into the yard and the dog was still raising a racket and old man Buckner came to the door (the south door) to see what was the matter and he, the defendant, shot him. He said he fired the shot, that Price was standing at his side, and defendant hesitated about doing it, and Price nudged him and said, 'Shoot, shoot,' and then he shot." The court said: "If the defendant killed the deceased in the circumstances detailed in his own confession, it was a murder perpetrated by lying in wait and falls peculiarly within the class of murders defined by our statute as murders in the first degree." And in White v. State, 30 Tex. App. 652, 18 S. W. 462, the court said: "It was an assassination, committed by the perpetrator, who was lying in wait, and who under the cover of the darkness of night shot down his unsuspected victim upon his own threshold, after having purposely made a noise on his premises, which caused him to come out upon his gallery."

MORRIS

v.

WINDSOR TRUST COMPANY.

New York Court of Appeals—November 10, 1914.

213 N. Y. 27; 106 N. E. 753.

Set-Off — Claims Not Connected with Cause of Action.

In a suit for conversion, alleged counterclaims based on contracts, not connected with the transaction set forth in the complaint and growing out of the indorsement of promissory notes by the bankrupt, to whose estate plaintiff had succeeded, do not fall within the classes enumerated by Code Civ. Proc. § 501, defining counterclaims.

Bankruptcy — Right of Set-Off.

Bankruptcy Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 68, 30 Stat. 565 (1 Fed. St. Ann. 696; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 805), declaring that in all cases of mutual debts or credits the account between the parties shall be stated and one debt set off against the other, was not intended to enlarge the doctrine of set-off, and does not give a party rights which he did not enjoy under previous statutes or general equitable principles.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Neither under Bankruptcy Act § 68, providing for the set-off of mutual debts, nor under general principles of equity, can a party sued for conversion of a pledge set off as a counterclaim rights based on contracts unconnected with the conversion and growing out of the indorsement of notes by the bankrupt to whose estate plaintiff had succeeded.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Bankruptcy Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 1, (11) 30 Stat. 544 (1 Fed. St. Ann. 527; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 464), declaring that the term "debt" shall include any debt, demand, or claim provable in bankruptcy, does not increase rights of counterclaim against the bankrupt's estate.

[See note at end of this case.]

Morris v. Windsor Trust Co. 163 N. Y. App. Div. 955, reversed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, First Judicial Department.

Action for conversion. Robert C. Morris, as trustee in bankruptcy of estate of Patrick J. Keiran, plaintiff, and Windsor Trust Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant at Special Term of Supreme Court. Judgment by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Plaintiff appeals. REVERSED.

[28] The Appellate Division certified the following questions:

"1. Is each of the counterclaims, numbered 1 to 13, inclusive, of the character specified in section 501 of the Code of Civil Procedure?

"2. Do each of said counterclaims, numbered 1 to 13, inclusive, state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action?

"3. Is each of said counterclaims, numbered 1 to 13, inclusive, a proper offset to the cause of action set forth in the complaint under section 63a of the Bankruptcy Act?

"4. Are the facts pleaded in said counterclaims, numbered 1 to 13, inclusive, properly pleaded as offsets to the cause of action set forth in the complaint?"

Henry F. Parmelee and Guthrie B. Plante for appellant.

Thomas F. Gilroy, Jr., and Thomas A. Byrne for respondent.

[29] CARDOZO, J.—The action is for conversion. The plaintiff sues a pledgee for the refusal to deliver the subject of the pledge after the payment of the debt which it was intended to secure. The counterclaims are based on contracts not connected with the transactions set forth in the complaint. They grow out of the indorsement of promissory notes by the bankrupt to whose estate the plaintiff has succeeded. The question is whether the defendant, when sued for the conversion of the pledge, may counterclaim upon the notes.

That the counterclaims do not come within the classes enumerated in section 501 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not seem to be doubtful. (Britton v. Ferrin, 171 N. Y. 235, 63 N. E. 954.) The question remains whether they may be sustained as set-offs either under section 68 of the Bankruptcy Act (1 Fed. St. Ann. 696; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 805), or, in view of the indorser's insolvency, under the general principles of equity. In reality this is a single rather than a two-fold question, for the Bankruptcy Act "was not intended to enlarge the doctrine of set-off, . . . in cases where the principles of legal or equitable set-off did not previously authorize it." (Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. 610, 622, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 731; Libby v. Hopkins, 104 U. S. 303, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 769; Western Tie, etc. Co. v. Brown, 196 U. S. 502, 509, 25 S. Ct. 339, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 571.)

I think the set-off is without sanction, either statutory or equitable. A wrongdoer who has misapplied the subject of a trust is not entitled, either under the Bankruptcy [30] Act or under the rules of equitable set-off, to apply a credit that belongs to him in his own right in cancellation of his liability as a fiduciary. A leading case is Libby v. Hopkins, 104 U. S. 303, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 769. That case construed section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1867, which is the same, except for immaterial variances of phraseology, as section 68 of the Bankruptcy Act in force to-day. The bankrupt was indebted on a note secured by mortgage and also on an account. He sent some money to his creditors, A. T. Stewart & Co., with instructions to apply it on the note, but the instructions were not followed. When called upon by the trustee in bankruptcy to refund the money, the holders of the money attempted to offset the account. They invoked the provision of the Bankruptcy Act (14 Stat. 517, section 20, act of March 2, 1867, now section 68 of the act of July 1, 1898) that "in all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the parties, the account between them shall be stated, and one debt set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid." The Supreme Court held that the terms "mutual debts" and "mutual credits" were used as correlative; that what is a debt on one side is a credit on the other; that Stewart & Co. held the money not as the bankrupt's debtors, but as his trustees; and hence, that there were no mutual debts within the meaning of the statute. The indebtedness was all on one side of Hopkins [the bankrupt]. The plaintiffs [A. T. Stewart & Co.] owed him nothing. They held his money in trust to apply it as directed by him. They refused to make the application as he directed. They held it, therefore, subject to his order. They continued so to hold it until the rights of the trustee in bankruptcy attached." (p. 309.)

The rule laid down in Libby v. Hopkins (supra) has been followed by the Supreme Court in bankruptcy proceedings under the present statute. (Western Tie, etc. Co. v. Brown, 196 U. S. 502, 509, 510, 25 S. Ct. 339, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 571.) It has [31] been followed by the same court where, in proceedings not in bankruptcy, the right to set-off was asserted under the general principles of equity. (Hanover Nat. Bank v. Suddath, 163 Fed. 1022, 82 C. O. A. 677, 215 U. S. 122, 30 S. Ct. 63, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 120; Cook County Nat. Bank v. U. S. 107 U. S. 445, 452, 2 S. Ct. 561, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 537.) It has been approved and applied in the decisions of this court. (People v. City Bank, 96 N. Y. 32; Straus v. Trademen's Nat. Bank, 122 N. Y. 379, 25 N. E. 372. See also, People v. Flynn, 135 App. Div. 276, 281, 120 N. Y. S. 511, and Britton v. Ferrin, 171 N. Y. 235, 245, 63 N. E. 954.) It is in accord with the rule of set-off in bankruptcy enforced by the courts of England. (2 Halsbury, The Laws of England, Title Bankruptcy and Insolvency, pp. 211, 212.)

The law is thus settled that if the defendant held the pledge in trust for the bankrupt, it cannot offset a debt that belongs to it in its own right. I think that, within the meaning of the rule which forbids the set-off of claims and liabilities held in inconsistent relations, a trust existed here. Within the meaning of that rule a trust may exist, though it results by implication of law from the relation between the parties. This court has many times held that a contract of pledge creates a fiduciary relation between the pledgor and the pledgee. (Toplitz v. Bauer, 161 N. Y. 325, 332, 55 N. E. 1059; Gillet v. Bank of America, 160 N. Y. 549, 560; Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 392, 398.) In so holding, its decisions have been in harmony with those of the Supreme Court of the United States. (Easton v. German-American Bank, 127 U. S. 532, 536, 8 S. Ct. 1297, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 210; Pauly v. State Loan, etc. Co. 161 U. S. 606, 618, 620, 17 S. Ct. 465, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 844.) That was the relation between the bankrupt and the defendant in the case at bar. After the debt secured by the pledge had been paid, the defendant held the pledge without beneficial interest or power of disposition. The one duty remaining was to preserve it safely and return it to the pledgor. The defendant from that moment held the collateral to the use of the bankrupt, just as truly as A. T. Stewart & Co. in Libby v. Hopkins [32] (supra), or the bank in People v. City Bank (supra), held in trust the money forwarded to them for application to a special purpose. To permit the duty that then arose to be avoided by the purchase and set-off of a claim in the fiduciary's own right is at war with the fundamental principle that a fiduciary may never deal for his own profit with the subject-matter of his trust. (Britton v. Ferrin, supra.) The courts have wisely been reluctant to give to the rules of equitable set-off a construction that would impair the obligation of that salutary principle.

Such cases as Hennequin v. Clews, 111 U. S. 676, 4 S. Ct. 576, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 565, and Crawford v. Burke, 195 U. S. 176, 25 S. Ct. 9, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 147, much relied on by the respondent, have little application here. They construed a provision excluding from the benefit of the act debts created by a bankrupt "in consequence of a defalcation as a public officer, or as executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee, or while acting in any other fiduciary capacity." They held that "the cases enumerated, 'the defalcation of a public officer,' 'executor,' 'administrator,' 'guardian,' or 'trustee,' are not cases of implied, but special trusts, and the 'other fiduciary capacity' mentioned, must mean the same class of trusts. The act speaks of technical trusts, and not those which the law implies from the contract." (Chapman v. Forsyth, 2 How. 202, 208, 11 U. S. (L. ed.) 236; Hennequin v. Clews, supra, 111 U. S.

679.) Accordingly, factors and stockbrokers who misapplied the property entrusted to them by their principals, were held to be entitled to a discharge from the liability thus created. There was no suggestion, however, that a factor or a stockbroker may not be a trustee within the meaning of the rules of equitable set-off. That a factor is a trustee within the application of those rules has in effect been held by this court in Britton v. Ferrin (supra). Indeed, the trust that was held to exclude a set-off in Libby v. Hopkins, in Western Tile, etc. Co. v. Brown, and in Hanover Nat. Bank [33] v. Suddath (supra), was not a technical or special one. It was rather one implied by law from the receipt of property or money subject to prescribed conditions. (Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 90, 111, 112.) It had certainly no greater element of trust than results from the acceptance of property by an agent or factor. The defendants in those cases may not have been trustees in such a sense as to have excluded them, in the event of their becoming bankrupts, from the privilege of a discharge. They were trustees within the meaning of the rules of set-off, alike in bankruptcy and in equity.

The respondent insists that section 1, subdivision 11, of the present Bankruptcy Act (1 Fed. St. Ann. 527; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 464) has changed the law of set-off in providing that "'debt' shall include any debt, demand or claim provable in bankruptcy." The act still provides, however, that set-off is not to be allowed unless the debts are mutual, and debts are not mutual unless held in the same right. (Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. 610, 622, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 731; Middleton v. Pollock, 1 L. R. 20 Eq. (Eng.) 29; Weston v. Barker, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 276, 7 Am. Dec. 319.)

The conclusion to which I am thus led makes it unnecessary to consider the appellant's argument that a right of set-off, sanctioned by the Bankruptcy Act or by general equitable principles, but not recognized by section 501 of the Code of Civil Procedure, must be enforced through a separate suit in equity, and may not be made the subject of a counterclaim at law. I assume for the purpose of this appeal that the law is to the contrary. (Code Civ. Pro. section 507; Coffin v. McLean, 80 N. Y. 560, 563; Van Zandt v. Hanover Nat. Bank, 149 Fed. 127, 79 C. C. A. 23; Frank v. New York Mercantile Nat. Bank, 182 N. Y. 264, 268, 74 N. E. 841, 108 Am. St. Rep. 805.)

The order should be reversed, with costs, and the questions certified answered in the negative.

Mutual Debts and Credits.

By section 68 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 (30 Stat. L. 565, 1 Fed. St. Ann. p. 696, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 805), it is provided that "in all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the estate of a bankrupt and a creditor the account shall be stated and one debt shall be set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid." Under that provision when the transaction between the parties constitutes a mutual credit or a mutual debt, the risk of set-off exists and the balance only is payable in the bankruptcy proceedings. Under section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1867, mutual debts and mutual credits were likewise permitted to be set off one against the other. Carr v. Hamilton, 129 U. S. 252, 9 S. Ct. 295, 32 U. S. By section 5 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1841, it was provided that "in all cases where there are mutual debts or mutual credits between the parties, the balance only shall be deemed the true debt or claim between them, and the residue shall be deemed adjusted by the set-off." See Ex p. Newhall, 2 Story 360, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,159; Stow v. Yarwood, 20 Ill. 597.

By section 42 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1800, mutual credits and mutual debts were set off one against the other. Ward v. Winship, 12 Mass. 481; Murray v. Riggs, 15 Johns. (N.Y.) 571.

However, if the claims are not mutual credits or mutual debts they cannot be set off under section 68 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898; Western Tie, etc. Co. v. Brown, 196 U. S. 502, 509, 510, 25 S. To the same effect see the following cases decided under section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1867; Gray v. Rollo, 18 Wall. 629, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 927; Libby v. Hopkins, 104 U. S. 303, 26 U. S. See also In re Wheeler, 2 Lowell 252, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17, 488. Section 68a of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, is almost a literal reproduction of section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1867, and in construing the latter act the Supreme Court of the United States in Libby v. Hopkins, 104 U. S. 303, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 769, said: "The terms 'credits' and 'debts' are used as correlative. What is a debt on one side is a credit on the other, so that the term 'credits' can have no broader meaning than the term 'debts.'" In Carr v. Hamilton, 129

U. S. 252, 9 S. Ct. 295, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 669, it was said: "Natural justice and equity would seem to dictate that the demands of parties mutually indebted should be set off against each other, and that the balance only against each other, and that the balance only should be considered as due. But the common law, for simplicity of procedure, determined otherwise, and held that each claim must be prosecuted separately. 'The natural sense of mankind,' says Lord Mansfield, 'was first shocked at this in the case of bankrupts; and it was provided for by 4 Ann. c. 17; § 11, and 5 Geo. II. c. 30; § 28.' Green v. Farmer, 4 Burrow (Eng.) 2214, 2220, cited in 2 Story's Eq. Jur. § 1433; Green v. Farmer, 1 W. Bl. (Eng.) 651. In pursuance of these old statutes, and of the dictates of equity, the principle of set-off between mutual debts and credits has for nearly 'two centuries' past been adopted in the English bankrupt laws, and has always prevailed in our own whenever we have had such a law in force on our statute book; and it mattered not whether the debt was due at the time of bankruptcy or not. See Babington on Set-off, 118; Ex p. Prescott, 1 Atk. (Eng.) 230, 231; Bacon's Abridg. tit. Bankrupt (K); Acts of Congress, 1800, c. 19, § 42; 2 Stat. 33; 1841, c. 9, § 5, 5 Stat. 445; 1867, c. 176; § 20, 14 Stat. 526; Bump on Bankruptcy, 10th ed. 91." And in Cumberland Glass Mfg. Co. v. De Witt, 237 U. S. 447, 35 S. Ct. 636, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1042, the court said: "Section 68a of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 provides that 'in all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the estate of a bankrupt and a creditor the account shall be stated and one debt shall be set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid.' The object of this provision is to permit, as its terms declare, the statement of the account between the bankrupt and the creditor, with a view to the application of the doctrine of set-off between mutual debts and credits. The provision is permissive rather than mandatory, and does not enlarge the doctrine of set-off, and cannot be invoked in cases where the general principles of set-off would not justify it. . . . In re Kyte, 182 Fed. 166. The matter is placed within the control of the bankruptcy court, which exercises its discretion in these cases upon the general principles of equity. Hitchcock v. Rollo, 3 Biss. 276, 4 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 690, 12 Fed. Cas. 6,535. The section was taken almost literally from section 20 of the act of 1867. In Sawyer v. Hong, 17 Wall. 610, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 731, in considering that section of the act of 1867, this court said: 'This section was not intended to enlarge the doctrine of set-off, or to enable a party to make a set-off in cases where the principles of legal or equitable set-off did not previously authorize it.' While the operation of this privilege of set-off has the effect to pay one creditor more than another, it is a provision based upon the generally recognized right of mutual debtors, which has been enacted as part of the Bankruptcy Act, and when relied upon should be enforced by the court. New York County Nat. Bank v. Massey, 192 U. S. 138, 24 S. Ct. 199, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 380. It hence appears that the object of this section was to give the District Court the right to apply the established principles of set-off to mutual credits, when its action was invoked for that purpose. The language of the act indicates the necessity of action by the court, for the statute provides that 'the account shall be stated' and the one debt set off against the other and the balance only allowed to be paid. This statute recognizes the nature of set-off, as established in common law and equitable procedure."

"The word 'debt' as used in section 68a includes any debt provable in bankruptcy." Germania Sav. Bank v. Loeb, 188 Fed. 285, 110 C. C. A. 263.

"The mutual debts or credits must exist at the time of bankruptcy. See Shepherd v. Turner, 3 McCord L. (S. C.) 249, 15 Am. Dec. 631 (Act of 1800). Thus the obligation of a bankrupt prior to his discharge cannot be allowed to offset claims contracted since his discharge. Petitpain v. Redean, 6 La. Ann. 431. See also Crosbie v. Leary, 6 Bosw. 312; Barclay v. Carson, 3 N. C. 243. And "a debt to or from the trustee in bankruptcy and arising after the bankruptcy in the management of the estate cannot be set off against a debt due from or to the bankrupt before the bankruptcy." *Howard v. An unliquidated claim based on a provable debt is available as a set-off. In re Harper, 175 Fed. 412, 23 Am. Bankr. Rep. 918 (Act of 1898); Lloyd v. Turner, 5 Sawy. 463 (Act of 1867). Compare In re Orne, 1 Ben. 361, 1 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 57, 6 Int. Rev. Rec. 84, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,581 (Act of 1867).

But it has been held that unliquidated damages arising out of tort are not available as a set-off. In re Becker, 139 Fed. 366, 15 Am. Bankr. Rep. 228 (Act of 1898); Pindel v. Holgate (Act of 1898) reported in full post, this volume, at page 983. However, where the tort can be waived and assumpsit brought it has been held that such a claim may be set off against a claim ex contractu. McCabe v. Winship, 17 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 113, 15 Fed. Cas. No. 8,668 (Act of 1867). See also Benoist v. Darby, 12 Mo. 196.

The mutual debts and credits must be in the same right. In re Lane, 2 Lowell 305, 13 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 43, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 8,043 (Act of 1867); Alvord v. Ryan, 212 Fed. 83, 128 C. C. A. 539 (Act of 1898); Rollins, Assignee, v. Twitchell, 14 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 201 (Act of 1867); Wright v. Rogers, 3 McLean 229, 30 Fed. Cas. No. 18,090 (Act of 1841); Davis v. Lohsen, 34 Misc. 769, 68 N. Y. S. 795 (Act of 1898). Thus it has been held that a claim in a representative capacity, as where one is simply the holder of the bare legal title, cannot be set off against a debt owing in a personal capacity. In re Lane, 2 Lowell 305, 13 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 43, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 8,043 (Act of 1867). And it has been held that a claim against an individual could not be set off against the claims of a corporation which carried on the business in the same name used by the individual. Davis v. Lohsen, 34 Misc. 769, 68 N. Y. S. 795 (Act of 1898). Under the rule that the mutual debts and credits must exist in the same right, a debtor cannot set off a claim due to him by the bankrupt estate against a trust fund claim which the bankrupt's estate has against him. So stockholders of a bankrupt corporation cannot set off debts owing to them by the bankrupt corporation against claims which the creditors have against them for unpaid subscriptions for stock. And it has been held that the fact that the stockholders are also bondholders does not change the rule. Babbitt v. Read, 173 Fed. 712, 23 Am. Bankr. Rep. 254 (Act of 1898). In Kiskadden v. Steinle, 203 Fed. 375, 121 C. C. A. 559, the court said: "In Sawyer v. Hoag, supra, 17 Wall. at page 622, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 731, when passing upon a provision of the Bankruptcy Act of 1867 (14 Stat. p. 526, § 20); similar to section 68 of the present act, Justice Miller said: 'This section was not intended to enlarge the doctrine of set-off, or to enable a party to make a set-off in cases where the principles of legal or equitable set-off did not previously authorize it. The debts must be mutual; must be in the same right. The case before us is not of that character. The debt which the appellant owed for his stock was a trust fund devoted to the payment of all the creditors of the company. As soon as the company became insolvent, and this fact became known to the appellant, the right of set-off for an ordinary debt to its full amount ceased. It became a fund belonging equally in equity to all the creditors, and could not be appropriated by the debtor to the exclusive payment of his own claim.'"

Generally a bank deposit may be set off against a debt due from a bankrupt depositor. See the note to Knoll v. Commercial Trust Co. reported post, this volume, at page 988.

In the case of In re Shults, 132 Fed. 573, the court said: "The next point urged is that, irrespective of the assignment by Henry P. Wilcox to the partnership of which he is a member, he may nevertheless legally set off and counterclaim the balance of the deposit after the payment of the Finch note against the liability of his firm to the bankrupts. The rule announced in Tucker v. Oxley, 5 Cranch 34, 3 U. S. (L. ed.) 29, upon which claimants place reliance, has no application to the facts of this case. The right to set off is invoked on account of the partnership liability in solido, and therefore it is contended the individual debt of Henry P. Wilcox must be set off against the joint indebtedness of the partners to the bankrupts. In the Tucker case the partners who were indebted to Tucker dissolved their relations, and Tucker in turn became indebted to the individual partner who continued the business and subsequently became bankrupt. His assignee brought an action against Tucker for this debt, and Tucker was allowed to set off his claim against the partners. The ground of the decision of the court, as stated in Gray v. Rollo, 18 Wall. 629, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 927, rested upon the fact that the debt due from the partners to Tucker was enforceable against the property of either of them, and, such debt being provable in bankruptcy against the partner who became bankrupt, the set-off against the bankrupt's claim was a correct application of the law. The rule in the state of New York seems to be that a joint debt cannot be set off or operate as a counterclaim against a separate debt, or, conversely, a separate debt against a joint debt. Spofford v. Rowan, 124 N. Y. 108, 26 N. E. 350; Hunter v. Booth, 84 App. Div. 585, 82 N. Y. S. 1000. This sound rule is thought to be general in its application. Gray v. Rollo, supra; Scammon v. Kimball, 92 U. S. 367, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 483. The bankrupts were not indebted to the claimants. No indebtedness was created by the transfer of the debts against the bankrupts, and therefore there exist no mutual debts or mutual credits between the estate of the bankrupts and the claimants. A different question would be presented if, for example, the firm of Wilcox & Son were insolvent, and the trustee sought to enforce the firm liability by proceeding against the partner to whom the bankrupts were indebted, or where the joint liability to the bankrupts and the debt to one of the partners grew out of the same transaction. See In re Crystal Spring Bottling Co. 100 Fed. 265. In such cases there would be a mutuality between the parties, and equitable considerations would not allow the trustee to retain the deposit, and also to collect the firm obligations from the separate estate of the partner to whom the bankrupts were indebted."

Claims Not Provable against Estate.

By clause b of section 68, Bankruptcy Act of 1898, (30 Stat. L. 544, 1 Fed. St. Ann. p.

696, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 806) it is provided that "a set-off or counterclaim shall not be allowed in favor of any debtor . . . which is not provable against the estate." Under that clause a claim is not available as a set-off or counterclaim when it is not provable against the estate. In re Bingham, 94 Fed. 796; In re Philip Semmer Glass Co. 135 Fed. 77, 67 C. C. A. 551; In re Becker, 139 Fed. 366; Steinhardt v. National Park Bank, 52 Misc. 464, 102 N. Y. S. 546, 18 Am. Bankr. Rep. 86. To the same effect see Wilson v. National Bank, 1 McCrary (U. S.) 538, decided under the Bankruptcy Act of 1867.

A claim may be used as a set-off if it is one provable in its nature at the time the set-off is claimed, and it need not be one that was provable in time to be proved in the bankruptcy proceedings. Norfolk, etc. R. Co. v. Graham, 145 Fed. 809, 76 C. C. A. 385, 16 Am. Bankr. Rep. 615 (Act of 1898); In re Catlin, 3 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 540 (Act of 1867); Morgan v. Wordell, 178 Mass. 350, 59 N. E. 1037, 55 L.R.A. 33 (Act of 1898); Wagner v. Burnham, 224 Pa. St. 586, 73 Atl. 990 (Act of 1898). In Morgan v. Wordell, supra, the court said: "The defendant also claims a set-off by virtue of his covenant. We assume that it has been adjudicated between the parties in the district court that the defendant has not a claim which he could prove in his own name, and that this decision carries with it the corollary that he could not prove his claim on the covenant against the estate. If therefore the prohibition of a set-off of a claim 'which is not provable against the estate' is to be taken with simple literalness as applying to any claim that could not be proved in the existing bankruptcy proceedings, the defendant's set-off cannot be maintained. But we are of opinion that the seemingly simple words which we have quoted must be read in the light of their history and in connection with the general provision at the beginning of § 88 for a set-off of mutual debts 'or mutual credits,' and that so read they interpose no obstacle to the defendant's claim. The provision for the set-off of mutual credits is old. St. 4 & 5 Anne, c. 17, § 12. 5 Geo. II. c. 30, § 28. 46 Geo. III. c. 135, § 3. Gibson v. Bell, 1 Bing N. C. 743, 753, 27 E. C. L. 562; Ex p. Prescott, 1 Atk. (Eng.) 230. It was adopted in the United States acts of 1800, c. 19, § 42, 1841, c. 9, § 5, and 1867, c. 176, § 20. But while the provision as to mutual credits was thought to be more extensive than that as to mutual debts (Atkinson v. Elliott, 7 T. R. (Eng.) 378, 380,) it was held that even the broader phrase did not extend to claims which, when the moment of set-off arrived, still were wholly contingent and uncertain, such for instance as the claim upon this covenant would have been if the defendant had not yet been called upon to pay anything upon the original partnership debt. Abbott v. Hicks, 5 Bing. N. C. 578, 35 E. C. L. 237; Robson, Bankruptcy (7th ed.) 374. But the moment when the set-off was claimed was the material moment. The defendant's claim might have been contingent at the adjudication of bankruptcy, and so not provable in the absence of special provisions such as are to be found in the later bankrupt acts in England and in the United States act of 1867, although not in the present law, and yet if it had become liquidated, as here by payment, before the defendant was sued, he was allowed without question to set it off. Smith v. Hodson, 4 T. R. (Eng.) 211; Ex p. Boyle, re Shepherd, 1 Cooke B. L. (8th ed) 561; Ex p. Wagstaff, 13 Ves. (Eng.) 65; Marks v. Barker, 1 Wash. (C. C.) 178, 181, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,096. The limitations worked out by these decisions were expressed in the section of the act of 1867 cited above, in the words 'but no set-off shall be allowed of a claim in its nature not provable against the estate.' These words, as it seems to us, following the cases, referred to the nature of the claim at the moment when it was sought to set it off, not to its nature at the beginning of the pending bankruptcy proceedings, and did not prevent a set-off of a claim which was liquidated at the later moment merely because, when the bankruptcy proceedings began, for some reason it did not admit of proof. The present statute leaves out the words 'in its nature,' but we can have no doubt that it was intended to convey the same idea as the longer phrase in the last preceding act, from which in all probability its words were derived. 'Provable' means provable in its nature at the time when the set-off is claimed not provable in the pending bankruptcy proceedings. The right to set off the claim when liquidated after the beginning of the bankruptcy proceedings was based upon its being a mutual credit, not upon the claim being provable, which it was not until the later bankruptcy statutes. Russell v. Bell, 8 M. & W. 277, 281. Conversely, of course the exclusion of a set-off, when the claim still was contingent and the defendant had made no payment, did not stand on the ground that the claim was not provable in the existing bankruptcy proceedings, but on the ground that it was not provable in its nature and that there was no machinery available to liquidate it. If we are right in supposing that the act of 1867 meant merely to codify a principle or rather a limitation developed by the courts, and that the words of the present act mean no more than those of the act of 1867, it follows that, although the defendant's claim could not have been proved against the estate, still it is a mutual credit and may be set off when he is sued."

It has been held that unliquidated damages for tort are not provable in bankruptcy and hence are not available as a set-off. In re Becker, 139 Fed. 366, 15 Am. Bankr. Rep. 228 (Act of 1898); Pendel v. Holgate (Act of 1898) reported in full post this volume, at page 983. See also Brown v. Cuming, 2 Caines (N. Y.) 33 (Act of 1800). But compare In re Harper, 175 Fed. 412, 23 Am. Bankr. Rep. 918, wherein an unliquidated counterclaim for false and fraudulent representations was allowed as a set-off under section 68 b and the decision in the case of In re Becker, supra, was criticised.

Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1867 it was held that a judgment for a penalty for a violation of a state statute against usury was not a provable debt in bankruptcy, and hence not available as a set-off. Wilson v. National Bank, 1 McCrary (U. S.) 538.

Purchase or Transfer for Purpose of Set-off.

By Clause 2 of section 68 b of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 (30 Stat. L. 544, 1 Fed. St. Ann. p. 696, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Sup. p. 806) it is provided that a set-off or counterclaim shall not be allowed in favor of any debtor of the bankrupt of a claim which "was purchased by or transferred to him after the filing of the petition, or within four months before such filing, with a view to such use and with knowledge or notice that such bankrupt was insolvent, or had committed an act of bankruptcy." Under that clause a set-off will not be allowed to one who, with knowledge of the bankrupt's insolvency, acquires claims against the bankrupt with a view to using the same by way of payment or set-off, or as to obtain an advantage over the creditors. Western Tie, etc. Co. v. Brown, 196 U. S. 502, 509, 510; 25 S. Ct. 339, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 571; Continental, etc. Trust, etc. Bank v. Chicago Title, etc. Co. 229 U. S. 435, 33 S. Ct. 829, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1268; In re Shults, 132 Fed. 573; Mason v. National Herkimer County Bank, 172 Fed. 529, 97 C. C. A. 155, reversing decree 163 Fed. 920. In Continental, etc. Trust, etc. Bank v. Chicago Title, etc. Co. supra, the court said: "It is the main purpose of this statute, as its terms show, to prevent debtors of the bankrupt from acquiring claims against the bankrupt for use by way of set-off and reduction of their indebtedness to the estate."

Thus where an indorser for a person who later became bankrupt took up the paper within four months of the filing of the petition and with a knowledge of the insolvency of the maker, with a view to using the same as a set-off against his liability to the bankrupt, it was held that the transaction came within the prohibition of the act. Mason

v. National Herkimer County Bank, 172 Fed. 529, 97 C. C. A. 155. And where a corporation, with a knowledge of its debtor's insolvency, and within four months of the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against him, deducted from the payroll of its laborers the sum that the laborers owed the insolvent debtor for supplies, with a view of setting off the same against the debtor's liability to the corporation, it was held that the corporation had attempted to obtain an advantage over the other creditors to which it was not lawfully entitled. Western Tie, etc. Co. v. Brown, 196 U. S. 502, 25 S. Ct. 339, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 571.

Where a bank which had issued certificates of deposit to a deposit, afterwards acquired them for the purpose of setting them off against the bankrupt's indebtedness to the bank, it was held that such a transaction did not come within the prohibition of the statute. Continental, etc. Trust, etc. Bank v. Chicago Title, etc. Co. 229 U. S. 435, 33 S. Ct. 829, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1268 (distinguishing Western Tie, etc. Co. v. Brown, 196 U. S. 502, 25 S. Ct. 339, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 571). And it has been held that a claim acquired for the purpose of set-off within the prohibited period may be used as a set-off against a claim assigned by the person contemplating bankruptcy. Stich v. Berman, 49 Misc. 104, 96 N. Y. S. 743.

Section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1867, provided that "no set-off shall be allowed in favor of any debtor to the bankrupt of a claim purchased by or transferred to him after the filing of the petition." That section was amended by the Act of 1874, which added the words "or in cases of compulsory bankruptcy, after the act of bankruptcy upon or in respect of which the adjudication shall be made, and with a view of making such set-off." Under the amendment the statute in terms forbade a set-off of any claims purchased by or transferred to the debtor after the filing of the petition, or in case of involuntary bankruptcy, after the act of bankruptcy. Rollins v. Twitchell, 2 Hask. 66, 14 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 201, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 12, 627; Hunt v. Holmes, 14 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 101; Fleming v. Andrews, 3 Fed. 632. See also In re Cleveland Ins. Co. 22 Fed. 200. And see Lloyd v. Turner, 5 Sawy. (U. S.) 463, wherein it was held that a claim purchased for the purpose of set-off with full knowledge of insolvency was still available under the Amendment of 1874, in case of voluntary bankruptcy.

Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1867, prior to the amendment of 1874, the decisions were in conflict as to whether a claim acquired for the purpose of set-off before the filing of the petition could be used in case the person seeking to use the same had full knowledge of the insolvency of the debtor at the time of acquiring the claim. The question was resolved in the affirmative in the following cases: In re City Bank, 6 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 71; Hovey v. Home Ins. Co. 10 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 224, 12 Fed. Cas. No. 6,743; Mattok v. Cady, 7 Am. L. Rec. 613, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,301; Mattocks v. Lovering, 3 Fed. 212. But an opposite conclusion was reached in Hitchcock v. Rollo, 4 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 690, and in Sawyer v. Hoag, 3 Biss. 293, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,400.

Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1841, a claim purchased after the petition was filed could not be used for the purpose of set-off. Smith v. Brinckerhoff, 6 N. Y. 305 affirming 8 Barb. 519.

Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1800 it seems that a claim could not be acquired for the purpose of set-off after the filing of the petition. Ogden v. Cowley, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 274. Compare Humphries v. Blight, 1 Wash. C. C. 44, 4 Dall. 370, 1 U. S. (L. ed.) 870, 12 Fed. Cas. No. 6,870.

Set-Off of New Credit after Preference.

By section 60 c. of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 (30 Stat. L. 544, 1 Fed. St. Ann. 677; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 746) it is provided that "if a creditor has been preferred and afterwards in good faith gives the debtor further credit without security of any kind for property which becomes a part of the debtor's estates, the amount of such new credit remaining unpaid at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy may be set off against the amount which would otherwise be recoverable from him." Under that section a preferred creditor who has extended new credit, without security, may set off the amount of the new credit against the amount which would otherwise be recoverable against him. Pirie v. Chicago Title, etc. Co. 182 U. S. 438, 21 S. Ct. 913, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 1171; Kaufman v. Tredway, 195 U. S. 271, 25 S. Ct. 33, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 190, 12 Am. Bankr. Rep. 685; In re Morrow, 134 Fed. 686, 13 Am. Bankr. Rep. 392; In re Tanner, 6 Am. Bankr. Rep. 196; Rogers v. American Halibut Co. 216 Mass. 227, 103 N. E. 689. See also In re Dickson, 111 Fed. 728, 49 C. C. A. 574, 55 L.R.A. 349.

Before there can be a set-off within the foregoing section, there must have been a preference prior to the extension of the new credit. In re Bailey, 110 Fed. 928. See also In re Ratliff, 107 Fed. 80; Price v. Derbyshire Coffee Co. 128 App. Div. 472, 112 N. Y. S. 830, 21 Am. Bankr. Rep. 280.

It has been held that there is no new credit within the foregoing section when the bankrupt receives property from a third person and afterwards grants a preference to the person seeking to set-off the same. Carleton Dry Goods Co. v. Rogers, 120 Fed. 14, 57 C. C. A. 34.

It has been held that where the new credit has passed the limit of a security given therefor, the credit in excess of the security will be held to be "without security of any kind" and entitled to be set off against the amount recoverable. In re Tanner, 6 Am. Bankr. Rep. 196.

If the creditor has acted in good faith, and extended credit without security, and the money or property has passed into the debtor's possession, the creditor is entitled to the offset provided for by section 60 c, without a showing that the money or property remained a part of the debtor's estate until the adjudication of bankruptcy. Kaufman v. Tredway, 195 U. S. 271, 25 S. Ct. 33, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 190, wherein "it will be noticed that the words used in paragraph 'c' are not 'the bankrupt's estate,' but 'the debtor's estate.' 'Debtor' is also found in the preceding clause as descriptive of the one to whom the credit is given. While the same person is both debtor and bankrupt, first debtor and then bankrupt, the use of the former term is suggestive of the time of the transaction as well as the status of the recipient of the credit. The paragraph further provides that 'the amount of such new credit remaining unpaid at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy may be set-off.' It is the non-payment and not the fact that the property remains still a part of the debtor's estate which entitles to a set-off. It would seem that if Congress intended that which the trial court held to be the meaning of the statute it would have said 'which becomes a part of the bankrupt's estate' or 'which becomes and remains a part of the debtor's estate until the adjudication in bankruptcy.' Further, Congress provided that the creditor act in good faith. Thus it excluded any arrangement by which the creditor, seeking to escape the liability occasioned by the preference he has received, passes money or property over to the debtor with a view to its secretion until after the bankruptcy proceedings have terminated, or with some other wrongful purpose. It meant that the creditor should not act in such a way as to intentionally defeat the bankrupt act, but should let the debtor have the money or property for some honest purpose. Requiring that it should become a part of the debtor's estate excluded cases in which the creditor delivered the property to a third person on the credit of the debtor, or delivered it to him with instruction to pass it on to some third party. The purpose was that the property, which passed from the creditor should in fact become a part of the debtor's estate, and that the credit should be only for such property. Still again, to require that the creditor should not only in good faith have extended the credit and that the money or property should have passed into and become a part of the debtor's estate, but that he should also show the actual disposition thereof made by the debtor would in many cases practically deny the creditor the benefit of a credit which he had extended in good faith. Suppose three months and a half before bankruptcy the creditor, in good faith, sells and delivers a bill of goods to the debtor, a merchant, how difficult it would be to show what had become of each particular article on that bill, or what was done with the money received for those that had been sold; and the same when, as in this case, money was delivered to the debtor. If Congress intended to require such proof it would seem that it would have used language more definite and certain. If the creditor has acted in good faith, extended credit without security, and the money or property has actually passed into the debtor's possession, why should anything more be required? Has the creditor not been already sufficiently punished when, having received money or property in payment of a just debt, he is compelled to refund that to the trustee because he believed, or had reason to believe, that the debtor, in paying that debt, preferred him? Why should he be punished in addition by the loss of the benefit of a credit given in good faith? We are of opinion that the state court erred in its construction of the statute and in peremptorily denying to the creditor the benefit of the credit."

Prior to the amendment of section 57g in 1903 (10 Fed. St. Ann. 45, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 706), whereby only such preferences as are void or voidable under sections 60b or 67e need be surrendered as a condition of the allowance of a claim, the decisions were in conflict as to whether the right to set-off within section 60c was confined to a case where the trustee brought an action to recover the preference under 60b, or was equally applicable to a case where a preferred creditor surrendered his preference under section 57g in order to have his claim allowed. The dispute concerned the scope of the words "otherwise recoverable" in 60c, and some of the cases may not now be entirely destitute of value. The following cases, superseded as stated by the amendment of 57g, in 1903, held that the right of set-off was not restricted to a case where the trustee sued to recover the preference. In re Ryan, 105 Fed. 780, 5 Am. A. 310 (Order 110 Fed. 738 affirmed). In C. S. Morey Mercantile Co. v. Schiffer, supra, the court said: "It is contended that this section authorizes these new credits to be set off only against amounts which might be recovered by the trustee from creditors who have knowingly received preferences in the way described in section 60, subd. 'b.' The question presented by this contention has been the subject of much debate. All the reasons for and against it have been repeatedly stated by the various courts, and it would be a work of supererogation to repeat or review them here. The arguments in support of the position of counsel for the trustee will be found in Re Christensen 101 Fed. 243; In re Arndt, 104 Fed. 234; In re Abraham Steers Lumber Co. 110 Fed. 738, 748. The reasons why, in our opinion, this contention cannot be and ought not to be sustained, have been presented in Peterson v. Nash, 112 Fed. 311, 50 C. C. A. 260, 55 L.R.A. 344; McKey v. Lee, 45 C. C. A. 127, 105 Fed. 923; In re Dickson, 111 Fed. 726, 49 C. C. A. 574, 55 L.R.A. 349; In re Ryan, 105 Fed. 780; In re Seckler, 106 Fed. 484; and In re Southern Overalls Mfg. Co. 111 Fed. 518. Since the decision in Peterson v. Nash, our attention has been called to the following remarks contained in the opinion of the supreme court in Pirie v. Chicago Title, etc. Co. 182 U. S. 455, 21 S. Ct. 908, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 1171: 'Nor, again, do we find anything which militates against our conclusion in subdivision 'c' of section 60. That subdivision is applicable to the cases arising under 'b' and allows a set-off which otherwise might not be allowed.' But there are at least two reasons why this remark is neither controlling nor persuasive: In the first place, the question whether or not the set-off provided for by subdivision 'c' might be allowed to creditors who had innocently obtained preferences, as well as to those who had done so with intent to evade the provisions of the bankrupt act, was not in issue in that case, and was not decided; and, in the second place, there is nothing in this remark inconsistent with the view that offsets against such preferences may be allowed. It merely states that subdivision 'c' is applicable to cases arising under subdivision 'b.' No one disputes that proposition. After a careful consideration of the authorities, and the arguments which they so forcibly present upon each side of the question now under consideration, this court, at its last term, arrived at the conclusion that section 60c entitles an innocent creditor who comes within its provisions to set off the amount of his new credits against the amount he would otherwise be required by section 57g to surrender before proving his claim, and that it is not limited in its application to cases where the trustee may sue to avoid the preferences under section 60b. Peterson v. Nash, 112 Fed. 311, 50 C. C. A. 260, 55 L.R.A. 344. The circuit court of appeals of the First and Seventh circuits have arrived at the same conclusion. McKey v. Lee, 105 Fed. 923, 45 C. C. A. 127; In re Dickson, 111 Fed. 726, 49 C. C. A. 574, 55 L.R.A. 349. A thoughtful reconsideration of this question at this term in the light of subsequent decisions, and of the remark of the supreme court to which reference has been made, has served but to confirm us in the rightness and soundness of that conclusion."

Besides the cases cited at the beginning of the foregoing quotation, the following cases held that the right to set-off was confined to a case where the trustee sued to recover the preference: In re Keller, 109 Fed. 118; In re Jones, 123 Fed. 128, 10 Am. Bankr. Rep. 513; In re Rosenberg, 27 Am. Bankr. Rep. 316.

Practice.

It is the duty of a trustee to interpose a set-off or counterclaim. In re Royce Dry Goods Co. 133 Fed. 100 (Act of 1898).

It has been held that a creditor by going to trial on an issue as to the allowance of a set-off consents to the jurisdiction of the court within section 23b of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 (30 St. L. 552, 1 Fed. St. Ann. p. 590, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 595). In re White, 177 Fed. 194, 98 C. C. A. 333, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451.

The person asserting a set-off has the burden of proving it. In re Harper, 175 Fed. 412, 23 Am. Bankr. Rep. 918 (Act of 1898); Ogden v. Cowley, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 274 (Act of 1800); Howard v. Magazine, etc. Co. 147 App. Div. 335, 131 N. Y. S. 910 (Act of 1898).

The person seeking to use a set-off may be barred by laches, or may be estopped to set up his counterclaim. Pindel v. Holgate (Act of 1898) reported in full, post, this page. Wagner v. Citizen's Bank, etc. Co. 122 Tenn. 164, 19 Am. Cas. 483, 122 S. W. 243, 135 Am. St. Rep. 869, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 484 (Act of 1898). Likewise a debtor by his conduct in the bankruptcy proceedings may waive his right subsequently to assert a set-off. Hunt v. Holmes, 16 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 101, 12 Fed. Cas. No. 6,890 (Act of 1867) Brown v. Farmers' Bank, 6 Bush (Ky.) 198, (Act of 1867). Thus where a creditor accepted a composition with full knowledge of the facts and without an endeavor to prove his set-off against the bankrupt, it was held that he had waived any set-off which he might have had against the bankrupt. Hunt v. Holmes, 16 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 101, 12 Fed. Cas. No. 6,890 (Decided under Act of 1867).

Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1867, it was held that the statute of limitations might have barred the right of action against the bankrupt, without affecting a set-off which existed at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy. Von Sachs v. Kretz, 10 Hun (N. Y.) 95. Compare Harwell v. Steel, 17 Ala. 372.

Where pending an action by a bankrupt the bankrupt obtains a discharge, the discharge does not affect the right of the other party to set up a counterclaim against the bankrupt. Wyckoff v. Williams, 136 App. Div. 495, 121 N. Y. S. 189 (Act of 1898).

PINDEL

v.

HOLGATE ET AL.

IN RE PINDEL.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit—March 16, 1915.

221 Fed. 342.

Bankruptcy — Review of Allowance of Claim.

Under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 25 (3), 30 Stat. 553 (1 Fed. St. Ann. 602; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 634), authorizing appeals as in equity cases from a judgment allowing or rejecting a debt or claim of $500 or over, an order allowing such a claim is not reviewable by a petition to revise, as each method of procedure for the review of orders in bankruptcy is exclusive of the other.

Review of Confirmation of Sale.

Under Bankr. Act, § 24b (1 Fed. St. Ann. 595; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 611), providing that the several Circuit Courts of Appeal shall have jurisdiction to superintend and revise in matters of law the proceedings of the several inferior courts of bankruptcy within their jurisdiction, an order confirming the sale of the land of a bankrupt in which he had a homestead interest is properly reviewable in matters of law by a petition to revise.

Review of Allowance of Claim in Conjunction with Another Order.

Though an order allowing a claim is not, standing alone, reviewable on a petition to revise, where there was only one other small claim, and the necessity for a sale of land in which the bankrupt had a homestead interest depended mainly upon the validity of the claim in question, the allowance of such claim will be reviewed on a petition to revise the order confirming a sale of the homestead.

Set-Off in Bankruptcy — Estoppel of Bankrupt.

A voluntary bankrupt in his schedules listed the claim of a bank based upon a judgment without mentioning any offset, and stated that he held no unliquidated claims or choses in action of any kind against any person, and in a proceeding to sell land in which he had a homestead interest, in which the necessity for making the sale rested upon the assumption that the claim of the bank was valid, resisted a sale on other grounds. An order of sale was affirmed on appeal, and a sale had. On application for an order confirming the sale, the bankrupt, more than four years after the petition was filed, for the first time set up an offset or counterclaim for wrongful attachment in the action in which the bank's judgment was obtained. It is held that he was estopped by the representations in the schedules and the order of sale from setting up such counterclaim, as a judgment is an adjudication, not only of all defenses actually interposed, but of all which might have been interposed.

[See note at end of this case.]

Judgments — Matters Concluded.

Under the rule established in Idaho, a judgment concludes all claims for wrongful attachment in the action in which the judgment is obtained.

Set-Off in Bankruptcy — Laches of Bankrupt.

Where, at the time a bankrupt sought to set up a claim for damages from an attachment as a counterclaim against the judgment obtained in the action in which the attachment was issued, an action by the judgment creditor against the sheriff for his negligence in caring for the attached property was barred by Rev. Codes Idaho, § 4055, subd. 1, requiring actions against sheriffs upon a liability incurred by the doing of an act in their official capacity and by virtue of their office, or by the omission of an official duty, to be brought within two years, and an action against the judgment creditor would have been barred by section 4054, subds. 2, 3, requiring actions for trespass upon real property and for taking or injuring personal property to be brought within three years, the bankrupt is barred by his laches from setting up such claim.

[See note at end of this case.]

Right to Set Off Unliquidated Claim.

In a bankruptcy proceeding, a claim for unliquidated damages for a tort could not be set off against a claim upon a judgment, whether the matter was controlled by Rev. Codes Idaho, § 4184, providing that a counterclaim must be a cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's claim or connected with the subject of the action, or, in an action arising upon contract, any other cause of action also arising upon contract, or by Bankr. Act, § 63 (1 Fed. St. Ann. 679: Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 753), specifying in subdivision "a" the claims which may be proved, and providing in subdivision "b" that unliquidated claims may be liquidated in such manner as the court shall direct, and may thereafter be proved and allowed against the estate, and section 68 (1 Fed. St. Ann. 696; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 805) providing for a set-off of mutual debts and credits, and providing that a set-off or counterclaim shall not be allowed which is not provable against the estate, as section 63b does not enlarge the scope of subdivision "a," and unliquidated claims arising out of torts are not covered by subdivision "a."

Petition to revise orders of United States District Court for Central District of Idaho.

Bankruptcy proceedings. Frank M. Pindel, bankrupt, and Norman J. Holgate, trustee. Bankrupt petitions to revise orders reversing orders of referee and allowing claim of Bank of Nez Perce and confirming sale of homestead. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Edwin H. Williams and Ren F. Tweedy for petitioner.

Finis Bentley for trustee.

Eugene O'Neill for claimant.

Sitting: GILBERT, ROSS and MORROW, Circuit Judges.

[344] MORROW, J.—The controversy involved in this case was before this court on a petition for revision of an order in bankruptcy proceedings in the District Court of the United States for the District of Idaho, in the case of Nez Perce Bank v. Pindel, 193 Fed. 917, 113 C. C. A. 645. The Bank of Nez Perce had recovered a judgment in the state court of Idaho against Frank M. Pindel, on February 15, 1909, for $5,382.28. Upon this judgment the proceeds of the sale of certain attached property, amounting to $1,956.25 had been credited, leaving a balance of $3,426.03. While proceedings were still pending in the state court upon this judgment upon a claim of homestead made by the judgment debtor, he filed his petition in voluntary bankruptcy in the United States District Court for the District of Idaho. The petition was filed on February 10, 1910, and on February 14, 1910, Pindel was adjudicated a bankrupt, and thereafter a trustee was regularly appointed. In Pindel's petition in bankruptcy he listed the balance of the judgment in favor of the Nez Perce Bank as an unsecured claim against his estate. No set-off or counterclaim was stated.

The question before this court upon revision related to certain exemptions of property claimed by the bankrupt under the statute laws of Idaho and the Bankruptcy Act.

Among others was the claim of homestead which had been pending in the state court. The judgment of the state court in favor of the bank and against the bankrupt, and the balance due thereon, were not questioned by the bankrupt or his wife. The statutes of Idaho provide that a homestead may be selected and claimed by the head of a family of not exceeding $5,000 in value. Where the homestead is of a value exceeding $5,000, a method of procedure is provided in execution proceedings whereby, if the land claimed can be divided without material injury, it shall be so divided, and a homestead, including the residence, of the value of $5,000, be set apart for the claimant, and execution enforced against the remainder; but if the land cannot be so divided it shall be sold and out of the proceeds of sale $5,000 shall be paid to the homestead claimant. The District Court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction "to determine all claims of bankrupts to their exemptions" (clause 11, § 2, Bankruptcy Act; 1 Fed. St. Ann. 535; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 478), found the value of the property claimed as a homestead to be $9,000, or $4,000 in excess of the exemption provided in the state law. The court directed that upon the payment into court by the bankrupt, for the benefit of the creditors of the estate, of the sum of $4,000 within [345] 30 days, the entire tract should be set apart as a homestead. In default of such payment the trustee was authorized to sell the land, under the direction of the referee in the manner provided by law, for not less than $5,000. Out of the proceeds of the sale $5,000 was to be paid to the bankrupt and his wife, and the balance, if any, was to be distributed in due course of administration. Being dissatisfied with this order of the court, the bankrupt and his wife petitioned this court for a revision of the order, on the ground that the District Court was without jurisdiction to determine their homestead rights, and that the matter rested entirely with the state court. It was also contended that the District Court erred in directing that the exemption pay the sum of $4,000 into the estate; otherwise, that the homestead be sold for a sum not less than $5,000, and when sold that the said sum of $5,000 be paid to Mrs. Pindel, and the surplus, if any, to the trustee. In the petition to this court the petitioners alleged "that the Bank of Nez Perce, with a claim of $3,427.93, and C. C. Triplett, with a claim of $70.85, were the only judgment creditors." No question was raised as to the balance due the bank, nor was any claim made that there was any set-off or counterclaim as against the bank. The order of the District Court was affirmed. 193 Fed. 917, 113 C. C. A. 545.

down on October 21, 1912, and thereafter, and after the bankrupt had refused to pay the trustee for the benefit of the creditors of the estate the sum of $4,000, a sale of the property was ordered, and a sale was made for the sum of $10,500 (being $5,500 in excess of the exemption). Thereupon the referee, upon petition of the trustee, proceeded with a hearing which involved, among other things, a set-off or counterclaim of the bankrupt against the judgment of the Bank of Nez Perce and also the confirmation of the sale of the property. The result of this hearing was an order of the referee providing, among other things, that the claim of the Bank of Nez Perce be disallowed, because of a set-off or counterclaim exceeding the judgment, and that the sale of the homestead be not confirmed. The trustee in bankruptcy and the bank thereupon petitioned the District Court for a review of this order of the referee.

Upon a hearing before the District Court, the order of the referee was reversed, the claim of the bank was allowed for the principal sum of $3,294.53, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from February 15, 1909, to February 10, 1910, the date of the filing of the petition, amounting to $227.30, making a total of $3,521.83, interest to be thereafter allowed pursuant to the general rules of law and as the facts might warrant. The set-off or counterclaim was disallowed. The order further provided that the order of the referee refusing to confirm the sale of the homestead be reversed, and that the sale be confirmed. Such confirmation was not, however, to become absolute or final until the expiration of 35 days from the date of the order, and if during that period the bankrupt or his wife should cause to be paid to the trustee the sum of $5,500 [346] (being the excess over the exemption of $5,000), with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum until paid, to be applied and distributed as assets of the estate, thereupon the order should become of no effect, and said lands and the whole thereof should be set apart as the homestead of the bankrupt and his wife, and should be exempt from administration and free from all claims of creditors. Upon the other hand, if the payment was not made within the time specified, upon the expiration of said period the order should be deemed to be final, and the trustee should, upon receiving the full purchase price, execute and deliver to the purchaser or his assigns a proper instrument of conveyance, and said conveyance should be deemed to relate back to the date of the order. The bankrupt is dissatisfied with these orders, and now petitions this court for a review of these two orders of the District Court in matters of law, under section 24b of the Bankruptcy Act (1 Fed. St. Ann. 595; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 611).

Upon the question there reviewed the decision of this court became the law of the case. The mandate of this court was sent

It is assigned as error that the District Court erred in reversing the order of the referee, disallowing the claim of the Bank of Nez Perce, and allowing such claim, and in the conclusions of law allowing the claim of the bank against the bankrupt estate.

Clause 3 of section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act (1 Fed. St. Ann. 602; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 634), provides that appeals as in equity cases may be taken in bankruptcy proceedings from the courts of bankruptcy to the Circuit Court of Appeals, from a judgment allowing or rejecting a debt or claim of $500 or over. It is obvious that the order of the District Court allowing the claim of the Bank of Nez Perce comes under this review of orders in bankruptcy is exclusive of the other. In the case of In re Loving, 224 U. S. 183, 32 S. Ct. 446, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 725; In re Mueller, 135 Fed. 711, 68 C. C. A. 349; Bothwell v. Fitzgerald, 219 Fed. 408, 135 C. C. A. 212. Standing alone, this order is, therefore, not reviewable on this petition. But it appears that the petition in bankruptcy was because of this claim against the petitioner. The only other claim against his estate set forth in the petition in bankruptcy was a small one, amounting to only $70.85. The sale of the homestead and the bankruptcy proceedings connected with the distribution of the estate are mainly dependent upon the validity of this claim, and the increase in the value of the homestead during the bankruptcy proceedings has made the homestead itself an important factor in the case. The order confirming the sale of the homestead is properly before us, and is reviewable, under section 24b, upon matter of law. In re Knosher, 197 Fed. 136, 116 C. C. A. 560. But we cannot review the question involved in that order without considering the validity of the claim of the bank. Whether the homestead shall be sold or not is the controlling question, but we cannot determine that question without knowing whether a sale of the homestead is in fact required to pay the debts of the estate; that is to say: Are there any creditors to whom the proceeds of sale will be distributed in the event a sale is made? If there are no debts, the only other ground for a sale would be to pay the expenses of the bankruptcy proceedings; but that question is not before us. In this situation of the case, we are of opinion that we may, in carrying out the [347] manifest purpose of the Bankruptcy Act, review the order allowing the claim as involved in the order of sale; but in such a review we are limited to questions of law.

The evidence is not in the record, and the only question open to us is whether the findings of the court are sufficient to support the order of the court allowing the claim. There are no formal findings by the court, but they are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court to enable us, with the record, to review the order upon its merits. In addition to the facts already stated, the court finds that the petitions and schedules in bankruptcy were filed by Frank M. Pindel on February 10, 1910, and the adjudication was made February 14, 1910, and thereafter a trustee was appointed for the estate; that in the schedules filed by the bankrupt the claim of the Bank of Nez Perce was listed for the amount of $3,427.93; that the claim was founded upon a judgment obtained by the bank against Frank M. Pindel and his wife, Sarah E. Pindel, in the state district court of Idaho on February 15, 1909, for $3,635.16, and costs taxed at $1,747.12, making a total of $5,382.28; that upon this judgment there were credited the proceeds of the sale of certain attached property, amounting to $1,956.25, leaving a balance of $3,426.03, which, together with interest, constituted the claim as set forth in the schedules; that in the schedules of the bankrupt, under appropriate headings, he represented that he held no unliquidated claims or choses in action of any kind against any person, and in the special proceeding relating to the sale of real estate, which resulted in the order of court providing for such sale, and which was brought to this court for review in the former case, and affirmed, the necessity for making the sale rested upon the assumption that the claim of the bank was valid; that in these proceedings the bankrupt and his wife resisted the making of the order of sale, but at no time was the validity of the judgment or the amount due thereon put in issue, nor was the suggestion ever made that the sale should not be ordered because there was no indebtedness to pay.

Referring now to the petition of the bankrupt and his wife in this court for review of the order of sale, we find that it was represented that the Bank of Nez Perce, with a claim of $3,427.93, and C. C. Triplett, with a claim of $70.85, were the only judgment creditors. The affirmance of the order of sale by this court left nothing to be done but to make the sale, or release the property to the bankrupt, in accordance with the terms therein provided. Referring now to the record, it appears that on March 1, 1913, a sale of the property was ordered, the bankrupt having refused to pay to the trustee the sum of $4,000 for the benefit of the creditors of the estate. It appears further from the record that the land was sold on April 5, 1913, after due notice published and posted, for the sum of $10,500. The return of sale was made on April 23, 1913, and an order of confirmation was asked by the trustee. To this return the bankrupt caused certain objections to be made, among others that there was nothing due to the Bank of Nez Perce, and he claimed damages against the bank for the taking of his wife's property under the execution issued by the state court. The damages claimed upon the hearing were for wrongful attachments, [348] and exceeded the judgment. These objections, setting up a set-off or counterclaim in the identical case heard and determined in the state court, were filed more than four years after the bankrupt had filed his petition in bankruptcy, wherein he had listed the balance due the bank as an unsecured claim against the estate, and no set-off or counterclaim was stated. It appears further that under appropriate headings in the schedules the bankrupt represented that he held no unliquidated claims or choses in action of any kind against any person. The bank and the trustee answered the objections of the bankrupt, and thereupon the referee proceeded to a hearing upon the issues thus presented.

The evidence taken upon this hearing is, of course, not in the record. The judge of the District Court, referring to it, says:

"A voluminous and complicated record is presented, a mere sketch of which would be of inordinate length, and therefore I shall attempt little more than to state in brief the reasons upon which my conclusions are based."

The conclusions which the court drew from the record are, however, sufficiently supported by the facts already stated. The court says:

"Surely, if there had been any suggestion of the issue now presented for the first time, the court would not have ordered a sale to pay a debt which might, in fact, prove to have no existence at all. It would have required that issue to be first tried out. That was the time for the bankrupt to speak, and to claim his defense, if any he had. The courts will not try a controversy in piecemeal. There must be an end to litigation. The bank was then seeking a sale of the real estate for the payment of its claim. If we credit him, the bankrupt had two defenses. He pleaded one of them, went to trial, failed, went to the appellate court, again failed, and after all the delay and expense, and when the order of sale is about to be made effective, he draws from its concealment his other defense. Under a familiar rule, he should not be heard. A judgment is an adjudication, not only of all defenses actually interposed, but as well all of which might have been interposed. It is thought that not only by the representations made in the schedules, but by the order of May 20th, the bankrupt is estopped from setting up the counterclaims at this time. . . . The judgment in the state court is unquestionably valid, and the sale of the attached property was legally made. Under the rule established by the Supreme Court of the state, the judgment concluded all claims for wrongful attachment. Willman v. Friedman, 4 Idaho 209, 38 Pac. 937, 95 Am. St. Rep. 59."

Referring to a claim that the property was worth more than it sold for, and that it might have had better care, the court says:

"It is, of course, easy enough at this late date to produce opinion testimony tending to show that the property was worth much more than it sold for, and that it might have had better care. Upon such an issue the passing of time usually operates in favor of the claimant and against the officer, especially in cases where, as here, the officer is without notice that any claim of damages will be asserted, and therefore has no reason to fortify himself by gathering and preserving the necessary evidence. It was doubtless for that reason that the Legislature has provided (section 4055, subd. 1, Revised Codes of Idaho), that an action upon such a claim against an officer must be commenced within two years from the time the cause of action accrues. The theory of the law urged by counsel for the bankrupt is that the defendant may maintain his action against the plaintiff for the negligence of the sheriff in executing the writ, and that the plaintiff's remedy in turn is against that officer and his bondsmen. But here the defendant waits until any remedy the bank may have [349] had against the sheriff is cut off by the statute of limitations, and then for the first time asserts his claim. As a further consideration it is to be observed that upon his appointment these counterclaims vested in the trustee, and it is apparent that if he had brought a plenary suit thereon against the bank at the time they were first put forward by the bankrupt in this proceeding, section 4054, subds. 2, 3, of the Idaho Revised Codes, providing for a three-year period of limitations for actions for trespass upon real property and for taking or injuring personal property, could have been successfully pleaded in bar. While in terms these statutes do not apply to a proceeding of this character, the principle is the same; in equity the bankrupt should be held to be barred by his own laches.

"Thus far the discussion has been upon the assumption that a claim for unliquidated damages for a tort may be set off against a claim upon a judgment; but may this be done? If the question be referred to the Idaho Statutes, it is plain that under section 4184 of the Revised Codes the answer must be in the negative, for clearly the claim does not fall within subdivision 2 thereof, and in so far as it comes within the first subdivision, it should have been set up in the original action, and must therefore be held to be barred or extinguished under the rule of section 4185 and Willman v. Friedman, supra. If the view be taken that the Idaho Statutes do not apply, and that the question is to be referred to the Bankruptcy Act alone, seemingly the same conclusion is unavoidable. Section 68 (1 Fed. St. Ann. 696; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 805) provides for a set-off of 'mutual debts and credits,' but declares that a counterclaim cannot be allowed in favor of a debtor unless the claim is provable against the estate. Section 63 (1 Fed. St. Ann. 679; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 753) defines the claims which may be proved, and provides in subdivision 'b' that 'unliquidated claims against a bankrupt may, pursuant to application to the court, be liquidated in such a manner as it shall direct and may thereafter be proved and allowed against the estate;' but this provision is held not to enlarge the scope of subdivision 'a,' and unliquidated claims arising out of torts, such as are here relied upon, are not covered by subdivision 'a.' See Remington on Bankruptcy, §§ 704, 705, 706, and cases cited thereunder. In the case of In re Becker, 139 Fed. 366, the precise question was involved. The impropriety of the course here pursued is shown in the counterclaims. He [the referee] simply finds that they exceed the bank's claim; but if they may be waged as counterclaims at all, and if this proceeding be adopted as a method for the liquidation of the damages growing out of the alleged torts, they should be fully liquidated and determined, so that the estate may have the benefit of the surplus, if any there be, after offsetting the claims of the bank."

In these conclusions we entirely concur. We need not, therefore, enter into a useless discussion of the various phases of the controversy as presented by the briefs in this court; but after a careful consideration of all the matters therein stated we are entirely satisfied with the orders of the District Court allowing the claim of the Bank of Nez Perce and ordering confirmation of the sale of the property.

The orders of the District Court are accordingly affirmed.

NOTE.

In the reported case it is held that a set-off in bankruptcy may be barred by laches or estoppel, and that an unliquidated claim for tort is not available as a set-off under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898. For a comprehensive discussion of set-off under American Bankruptcy Acts, see the note to Morris v. Windsor, reported ante, this volume, at page 972.

v.

COMMERCIAL TRUST COMPANY.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court—April 19, 1915.

249 Pa. St. 197; 94 Atl. 750.

Bankruptcy — Voidable Transfer — Set-Off of Deposit against Debt to Bank.

While, in the absence of fraud, a bank having a bankrupt's funds on deposit may set off a debt owing it by the bankrupt against the trustee's claim for the deposit and may prove any balance against the estate, yet where a bank holding a depositor's notes accepts payment thereof by check against the deposit within four months of the bankruptcy of the depositor and with full knowledge of his insolvent condition, it receives an "unlawful preference," within the meaning of Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 60 (a) (b) 30 Stat. 562 (1 Fed. St. Ann. 672, 674; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 729, 739), and its right to set off the notes is thereby forfeited, and it becomes liable to the trustee for the amount of the check.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Berks county: WAGNER, Judge.

Assumpsit to recover alleged preference given by bankrupt. John J. Knoll, trustee of Walley-Sarge Company, plaintiff, and Commercial Trust Company of Reading, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Cyrus G. Derr for appellant.

E. H. Deyscher and William Rick for appellee.

[193] JUSTICE FRAZER, J.—Defendant bank held an overdue note of $4,000 against the Walley-Sarge Company, one of its depositors, and on September 30, 1912, the latter gave to defendant its check for $3,500 drawn against its account. A week later a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the Walley-Sarge Company and it was subsequently adjudged a bankrupt. The trustee in bankruptcy sued to recover the $3,500 claiming the payment was a preference of creditors within the meaning of Sec. 60, (a) and (b) of the National Bankruptcy Act of July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 (1 Fed. St. Ann. 672, 674; Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 729, 739), which provides that such transfer of property, made within four months of the date of filing the petition, shall be voidable by the trustee. Defendant, appellant, contended that the transaction was within the provision of Sec. 68a of the Bankruptcy [199] Act (1 Fed. St. Ann. 696; Fed. St.

Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 805), which permits a set-off of mutual debts or credits.

The principal question for determination is whether the acceptance of a check, from a depositor, by a bank which holds an overdue note of the latter, operates as a forfeiture of the right of the bank to set-off the note against the deposit in event of bankruptcy of the depositor within four months from the date of the transaction.

Before considering this question it is necessary to dispose of another question raised by appellant, in the "statement of the questions involved," namely, whether any right of set-off by the bank existed independently of the effect of payment by means of a check drawn by the depositor against the bank. This question is well settled. In New York County Nat. Bank v. Massey, 192 U. S. 138, 24 S. Ct. 199, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 380, it was held that, in absence of fraud, a bank may set-off its notes against a bankrupt and prove its balance against his estate.

Mr. Justice Day, delivering the opinion of the court, said (page 145): "It cannot be doubted that, except under special circumstances, or where there is a statute to the contrary, a deposit of money upon general account with a bank creates the relation of debtor and creditor. The money deposited becomes part of the general fund of the bank, to be dealt with by it as other moneys, to be lent to customers, and parted with at the will of the bank, and the right of the depositor is to have this debt repaid in whole or in part by honoring checks drawn against the deposits. It creates an ordinary debt, not a privilege or right of a fiduciary character.

Page 146, Section 68a of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 is almost a literal reproduction of Sec. 20 of the Act of March 2, 1867, c. 176, 14 Stat. 517. So far as we have been able to discover, the holdings were uniform under that act that set-off should be allowed as between a bank and depositor becoming bankrupt." This decision has been frequently cited and followed, having [200] been reaffirmed in the recent case of Studley v. Boylston Nat. Bank, 229 U. S. 523, 33 S. Ct. 806, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1313; and disposes of the question of right of set-off.

The main question in the present case is, as was stated at the outset, whether such right was forfeited, or whether the status of the parties was changed, by the fact that the same result, which would have been reached by the exercise of the right of set-off by the creditor, was accomplished by the act of the depositor in giving the bank a check against the deposit prior to bankruptcy. The lower court instructed the jury that such transaction was a preference under the bankruptcy laws, thus in effect deciding the right of set-off was, under the circumstances, not properly exercised by the acceptance of a check for the amount in controversy. The question is not without precedent. It was raised in Traders' Bank v. Campbell, 14 Wall. 87, 20 U. S. (L. ed.) 832, where the creditor gave his bank a check for the balance of his account, which the bank applied to the indebtedness. The bank contended that, as it had a right to set-off its claim against the deposit, it was immaterial that the same thing was accomplished by the check. The court held this was a payment, not a set-off, and as both creditor and bank knew of the insolvency of the former, the payment was a preference in violation of the Bankrupt Act. The court said (pages 97-98) that "if they had stood on their right of set-off it might possibly have been available, but when they treat it as the bankrupt's property and endeavor to secure an illegal preference by getting the bankrupts to make a payment in one case, and seizing it by execution in the other, when they knew of the insolvency, both appropriations are void."

The question again arose in Studley v. Boylston Nat. Bank, 229 U. S. 523, 33 S. Ct. 806, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1313, relied upon by appellant as supporting its contention. In that case the bankrupts had been large depositors and also borrowers from defendant bank. As notes, representing loans, matured they were charged to the general account, but on three [201] occasions payment was made by check of the depositor. It was alleged these credits and payments, made within four months of filing the petition in bankruptcy, amounted to an illegal preference; and even if the notes charged were not such, payments made by check were clearly improper transfers. The court, by Mr. Justice Lamar, said (pages 528-529): "There is nothing in Sec. 68a which prevents the parties from voluntarily doing, before the petition is filed, what the law itself requires to be done after proceedings in bankruptcy are instituted. . . . It cannot have been illegal for the parties, on September 12th, 20th, 30th, October 3d and 14th, to do what the law would have required the trustee to do in stating the account after the petition was filed on December 16, 1910. No money passed in either instance: for, whether the checks for $5,000 were paid or notes for $5,000 were charged, was, in either event, a book-entry equivalent to the voluntary exercise by the parties of the right of set-off."

While the foregoing language appears to be contrary to the earlier case of Traders' Bank v. Campbell, supra, a reference to the facts of the two cases shows there is in fact no conflict. In the earlier case the creditor and the bank both knew of the fact of insolvency, while in the later case the decision was based on the fact that the bank had no knowledge thereof. This is shown by the following language on page 526: "But if, as found by the referee, the bank had no reasonable cause to believe such transfers would effect a preference, the payments by checks for $15,000, drawn on the deposit account, are as much protected as if on the same dates similar checks had been given in payment of like amounts due another bank with which the Collver Company, the depositor, kept no account." It appears from this the decision was based, not on the question of right of set-off, but on absence of the creditor's knowledge of the debtor's insolvent condition.

Traders' Bank v. Campbell was followed by In re [202] Starkweather, 206 Fed. Rep. 797, where a bank, with knowledge of the depositor's financial condition, threatened to charge a note against his account unless paid, and the depositor gave his check for it. This was held a voidable preference.

Under the above decisions, the transaction between the parties in this case was a payment, not a set-off, and the instruction which forms the basis of the eighth assignment of error was correct, if the defendants had reasonable cause to believe the result of the transaction would be a preference, that is, if they had such knowledge of the depositor's financial condition as would lead a reasonable business man to foresee the probable result of such payment to them. This question was submitted to the jury, who found they had such knowledge, and, since there is ample evidence in the case to support such finding, there is no reason for interfering therewith.

There was no error in admitting the record of the bill in equity brought by a stockholder creditor of the Walley-Sarge Company asking for the appointment of a receiver on the ground of insolvency, the offer of the bill being accompanied by an offer to show it was handed to the general counsel of defendant. While there was a denial of the authority of the attorney to represent defendant in the particular matter, there was sufficient evidence in the case to warrant a submission of the question to the jury, which was done by the trial judge in his charge. It was further shown that the Walley-Sarge Company passed a resolution authorizing their attorney to file an answer to the bill admitting insolvency and joining in the request for the appointment of a receiver on that ground, and that the whole matter was called to the attention of defendants' attorney. There was also evidence of notice to the treasurer of defendant of a proposition having been made to settle with creditors at forty cents on the dollar. Although denied by him, this was competent evidence for the jury of notice to the bank. The schedules, accounts and distribution sheets [203] were also competent on the question of insolvency: In re Docker-Foster Co., District Court, Eastern District of Penna., McPherson, Dist. Judge, 123 Fed. 190. All this was evidence tending to establish reasonable cause for defendant to believe its transaction with its depositor would effect a preference. Nothing further in the record calls for comment.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

Set-Off by Bank of Deposit against Debt Due Bank by Depositor as Voidable Transfer under Bankruptcy Law.

The recent cases are in accord with the rule laid down in Booth v. Prete, 81 Conn. 636, 15 Ann. Cas. 306, that a bank deposit may be set off against a debt due to the bank from the depositor who becomes bankrupt, without creating a voidable preference under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 (1 Fed. Stat. Ann. 525). Continental, etc. Trust, etc. Bank v. Chicago Title, etc. Co. 229 U. S. 435, 33 S. Ct. 829, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1268; Studley v. Boylston Nat. Bank, 229 U. S. 523, 33 S. Ct. 806, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1313; In re Myer, 107 Fed. 86; Germania Sav. Bank, etc. Co. v. Loeb, 188 Fed. 285, 110 C. C. A. 263; In re Percy Ford Co. 197 Fed. 334; In re Wright-Dana Hardware Co. 212 Fed. 397, 129 C. C. A. 73; In re Radley Steel Const. Co. 212 Fed. 462; Chisholm v. Le Roy First Nat. Bank, 269 Ill. 110, 109 N. E. 657; Shields v. John Shields Const. Co. 83 N. J. Eq. 21, 89 Atl. 1022; De Long v. Mechanics, etc. Nat. Bank, 168 App. Div. 525, 153 N. Y. S. 1010; Whitaker v. Crowder State Bank, 26 Okla. 786, 110 Pa. 776. See also Continental, etc. Trust, etc. Bank v. Chicago Title, etc. Co. 229 U. S. 435, 33 S. Ct. 829, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1268; Walsh v. Maysville First Nat. Bank, 201 Fed. 522, 120 C. C. A. 30. In Studley v. Boylston Nat. Bank, supra, the court said: "The money so deposited was the proceeds of the sale of tickets to a large party of round-the-world tourists and was put in bank; not for the purpose of preferring it, but in the expectation of being used for carrying on the business in the future as in the past. Indeed, the payments were made with the statement that the company would expect the Bank to discount other notes. We find nothing in the record to indicate that the deposits were made for the purpose of enabling the Bank to secure a preference by the exercise of the right of set-off. The case, therefore, comes directly within the decision in New York County Nat. Bank v. Masser, 192 U. S. 138 [24 S. Ct. 199, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 380], where $3,884 deposited by an insolvent customer, in good faith, four days before the filing of the petition against him was allowed to the Bank by way of set-off on notes of the bankrupt held by it. An effort is made to distinguish that case from this, by calling attention to the fact that here, by checks drawn on the account or notes charged to the account, the parties themselves voluntarily made the set-off before the petition was filed, —while in the Massey Case the Trustee, under the supervision of the Referee stated an account and allowed the set-off as permitted by section 68a, which provides 'that in all cases of mutual debts, or mutual credits between the estate of a bankrupt and a creditor the account shall be stated and one debt shall be set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid.' That section did not create the right of set-off but recognized its existence and provided a method by which it could be enforced even after bankruptcy. What the old books called a right of stoppage—what business men call set-off, is a right given or recognized by the commercial law of each of the States and is protected by the Bankruptcy Act if the petition is filed before the parties have themselves given checks, charged notes, made book entries, or stated an account whereby the smaller obligation is applied on the larger. The banker's lien on deposits, the right of retention and set-off of mutual debts are frequently spoken of as though they were synonymous, while in strictness, a set-off is a counterclaim which the defendant may interpose by way of cross-action against the plaintiff. But, broadly speaking, it represents the right which one party has against another to use his claim in full or partial satisfaction of what he owes to the other. That right is constantly exercised by business men in making book entries whereby one mutual debt is applied against another. If the parties have not voluntarily made the entries and suit is brought by one against the other, the defendant, to avoid a circuitry of action, may interpose his mutual claim by way of defense and if it exceeds that of the plaintiff, may recover for the difference. Such counterclaims can be asserted as a defense or by the voluntary act of the parties, because it is grounded on the absurdity of making A pay B what B owes A. If this set-off of mutual debts has been lawfully made by the parties before the petition is filed, there is no necessity of the Trustee doing so. If it has not been done by the parties, then, under command of the statute, it must be done by the Trustee. But there is nothing in section 68a which prevents the parties from voluntarily doing, before the petition is filed, what the law itself requires to be done after proceedings in bankruptcy are instituted." So, in Mandel v. Koerner, 149 N. Y. S. 455, it was held that a tenant might set off a deposit in the private bank of his bankrupt landlord against a claim of his landlord for rent.

The right of a bank to set off a deposit against a debt due to the bank is not affected by the fact that the debt is not due at the date of the adjudication in bankruptcy. Germania Sav. Bank, etc. Co. v. Loeb, 188 Fed. 285, 110 C. C. A. 263; In re Percy Ford Co. 199 Fed. 334; De Long v. Mechanics, etc. Nat. Bank, 168 App. Div. 525, 153 N. Y. S. 1010; Conquist v. Broadway Nat. Bank (Tenn.) 183 S. W. 160; Neely v. Grayson County Nat. Bank, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 513, 61 S. W. 559. In Germania Sav. Bank, etc. Co. v. Loeb, 188 Fed. 285, 110 C. C. A. 263, the court said: "The word 'debt,' as used in section 68a includes any debt provable in bankruptcy. Bankr. Act 1898, sections 1, cl. 11; . . . And a debt is provable, whether due or not at the time of bankruptcy. Bankr. Act 1898, section 63a (1). It is thus immaterial to the application of section 68a whether or not the notes were due."

However in case of collusion between the bank and the bankrupt with a view of creating a preferential transfer which would operate as a fraud on the other creditors of the bankrupt, it has been held that the bank will not be allowed to set off the deposit against the bankrupt's indebtedness. In re Starkweather, 206 Fed. 797; In re Wright-Dana Hardware Co. 207 Fed. 636; In re National Lumber Co. 212 Fed. 928, 129 C. C. A. 448; Heyman v. Jersey City Third Nat. Bank, 216 Fed. 685; Schmidt v. Bank of Commerce, 15 N. M. 470, 110 Pac. 613, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 558. And see the reported case. Thus, where a bank solicited a deposit for the express purpose of using it as a set-off against the bank's debt, it was held that the set-off was voidable by the trustee. Schmidt v. Bank of Commerce, 15 N. M. 470, 110 Pac. 613, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 558. And where a depositor gave the bank a post-dated check for the express purpose of enabling the bank to set off the same against the deposit, it was held to create a voidable preference. In re Starkweather, 206 Fed. 797. And, see the reported case wherein it is held that the acceptance of a check from a depositor by a bank which holds an overdue note of the latter, operates as a forfeiture of the right of the bank to set off the note against the deposit in the event of the bankruptcy of the depositor within four months from the date of the transaction.

The rule does not permit a special deposit to be set off against the bankrupt's general indebtedness to the bank. Bank of Brodhead v. Smith, 199 Fed. 703, 118 C. C. A. 141; Continental, etc. Trust, etc. Bank v. Chicago Title, etc. Co. 199 Fed. 704, 118 C. C. A. 142; Farmer's, etc. State Bank v. Park, 209 Fed. 613, 126 C. C. A. 607; Wagner v. Citizens' Bank, etc. Co. 122 Tenn. 164, 19 Ann. Cas. 483, 122 S. W. 245, 135 Am. St. Rep. 869, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 484.

It has been held that a bank cannot set off a deposit made after the filing of the petition against a claim against the bankrupt. In re Michaelis, 196 Fed. 718. Compare Toof v. City Nat. Bank of Paducah, 206 Fed. 250, 124 C. C. A. 118. And where it appeared that a bank accepted a check for collection on the same day the petition in bankruptcy was filed but at an hour subsequent to the filing it was held that the proceeds of the check could not be set off against the bankrupt's liability to the bank on the ground that the petition in bankruptcy related back to the first moment of the day on which it was filed. LESLIE ET AL.

SHEILL.

England—Court of Appeal—April 6, 1914.

[1914] 3 K. B. 607.

Infants — Liability on Contract — Money Loaned.

No recovery can be had at law or in equity against an infant for money loaned, though the loan was procured by false representations of the infant as to his age.

[See note at end of this case.]

[607] Appeal of the defendant from a decision of Horridge J. after trial with a common jury.

The plaintiffs were a firm of registered money-lenders, and they sued the defendant, to whom they had made two advances [608] of 200*l.* each, to recover 475*l.*, being the amount of the advances with interest, on the ground that the defendant had obtained the advances by fraudulently representing that he was of full age at the time; in the alternative, they claimed 475*l.* as money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiffs; the defendant was still a minor at the date of the issue of the writ, though he attained full age before the trial. The learned judge left the following question to the jury: "Were the plaintiffs induced to make the two advances of 200*l.* each, or either of them, by the fraudulent misrepresentation of the defendant that he was twenty-one?"; to which the jury answered, "Yes—both." Upon further consideration, Horridge J. ordered judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs for 400*l.* The defendant appealed.

Harry Dobb for appellant.

J. B. Matthews, K.C., and G. F. Spear for respondents.

M. A. Jacobs solicitor for appellant.

Dresser & Earl solicitors for respondents.

[611] LORD SUMNER.—At the time of the transaction in question the appellant was an infant. He succeeded in deceiving some money-lenders by telling them a lie about his age, and so got them to lend him 400*l.* on the faith of his being adult. Perhaps they were simpler than money-lenders usually are; perhaps the infant looked unusually mature. At any rate when they awoke to the fact that they could not enforce their bargain and sought to recover the 400*l.* paid, charging him with fraud, the jury found that the appellant had been guilty of fraud, and he does not now complain of the verdict. On further consideration Horridge J. gave judgment against him for the full amount that he received.

It is not a pretty story to begin life with, and one might have expected that the appellant's chief anxiety would have been to live it down, but money is money, and I suppose 400*l.* is more than he cares to pay, or rather to repay, if he can manage to avoid it. Accordingly he appeals, alleging that there is no process of law by which the money-lenders can get their money back from him, and, if this is so, he must succeed on this appeal.

The claim first pleaded is for the amount of principal and interest, as damages sustained because by his fraud the plaintiffs have been induced to make and act upon an unenforceable contract. So long ago as Johnson v. Pye, 1 Sid. 258, it was decided that, although an infant may be liable in tort generally, he is not answerable for a tort directly connected with a contract which, as an infant, he would be entitled to avoid. "One cannot make an infant liable for the breach of a contract by changing the form of action to one ex delicto," per Byles J. in Burnard v. Haggis, 14 C. B. N. S. 45, 108 E. C. L. 45 (1863) 32 L. J. C. P. 189. "A married woman," says Pollock C.B. in Liverpool Adelphi Loan Assoc. v. Fairhurst (1854) 9 Exch. 422, 23 L. J. Exch. 163, speaking before the common law had been altered by Married Women's Property Acts, "is liable for frauds committed by her on any person as for any other personal wrong. But when the fraud is directly connected with the contract with the wife and is the means of effecting it and parcel of the same transaction, the wife cannot be responsible or the husband be sued for it together with the [612] wife. If this were allowed, it is obvious that the wife would lose the protection which the law gives her against contracts made by her during coverture, for there is not a contract of any kind, which a feme covert could make whilst she knew her husband to be alive, that could not be treated as a fraud, for every such contract would involve in itself a fraudulent representation of her capacity to contract. . . . In the case of an infant it was held for a similar reason that he could not be made liable for a fraudulent representation that he was of full age, whereby the plaintiff was induced to contract with him. . . . If the action should be maintainable 'all the pleas of infancy would be taken away, for such affirmations are in every contract.' The Chief Baron's quotation is from Johnson v. Pye, 1 Sid. 258. As Lord Kenyon says in Jennings v. Rundall (1765) 3 Burr. 1804, adding to Zouch v. Parsons (1799) 8 T. R. 335, at p. 337, "this protection was to be used as a shield and not as a sword; therefore if an infant commit an assault or utter slander God forbid that he should not be answerable for it in a Court of justice. But where an infant has made an improvident contract with a person who has been wicked enough to contract with him, such person cannot resort to a Court of law to enforce such contract." It is perhaps a pity that no exception was made where, as here, the infant's wickedness was at least equal to that of the person who innocently contracted with him, but so it is. It was thought necessary to safeguard the weakness of infants at large, even though here and there a juvenile knave slipped through. The rule is well settled. No action of deceit lay against the present appellant and this claim was abandoned, but for the purposes of this case it is important to observe the principles on which an infant's immunity is established in this regard.

Nor does the other cause of action pleaded fare any better. To the claim for return of the principal moneys paid to the infant under the contract that failed, as money had and received to the plaintiffs' use, there are at least two answers: the infancy itself was an answer before 1874 at common law, and the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, is an answer now. An action for money had and received against an infant has been sustained, where in substance [613] the cause of action was ex delicto: Bristow v. Eastman, 1 Esp. 172, approved before 1874 in In re Seager, 60 L. T. N. S. 665, and cited without disapproval in Covern v. Nield [1912] 2 K. B. 419. Even this has been doubted, but where the substance of the cause of action is contractual, it is certainly otherwise. To money had and received and other indebitatus counts infancy was a defence, just as to any other action in contract: Alton v. Midland R. Co. per Willes J., 19 C. B. N. S. 213, 115 E. C. L. 213 (1865) 34 L. J. C. Pl. 292 at pp. 297, 298; In re Jones, per Jessel M.R., 18 Ch. D. 118; Dacey on Parties, p. 284; Bullen and Leake's Precedents of Pleadings, 3rd ed. p. 605. Further, Ann. Cas. 1916C.—63.

under the statute the principle, which at common law relieved an infant from liability for a tort directly connected with a voidable contract, namely, that it was impossible to enforce in a roundabout way an unenforceable contract, equally forbids Courts of law to allow, under the name of an implied contract or in the form of an action quasi ex contractu, a proceeding to enforce part of a contract; which the statute declares to be wholly void. This has been recently illustrated in the closely analogous case of a claim on the footing of money had and received for moneys paid but irrecoverable under what in law was a lending and borrowing ultra vires: Sinclair v. Brougham [1914] A. C. 398.

The ground on which Horridge J. held the appellant liable was that by reason of his fraud he was compellable in equity to repay the money, actually received and professedly borrowed, and compellable too by a judgment in personam for the amount, not by any mere proprietary remedy. The rule in equity has been so stated at times by text-writers, both remote and recent (Fonblanque's Equity, 1820, 5th ed. i. 77; Roscoe's Nisi Prius, 16th ed. 642; Wace on Bankruptcy, ed. 1904, p. 6), but of authority for it there is very little. Esron v. Nicholas, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 488, a decision of Lord King's, was much relied upon. He is reported to have said "infants have no privilege to cheat men," a wholesome truth indeed, but I should hardly call it a principle. The case was examined by Knight Bruce V.-C. in Stikeman v. Dawson, 1 De G. & Sm. 90, who concluded that the facts as reported do not [614] support the decree as made. He procured the note in the registrar's book and found it impracticable to appreciate the decision without knowing the evidence and the pleadings in full, and these unfortunately are not forthcoming. It is a case in which an infant stood by (apparently without actual fraud) while his guardian, or a person purporting to be his guardian, granted a lease. He received or took the benefit of the fine, but when he came of age he repudiated the lease. In a suit to compel him either to grant the plaintiff a new lease or refund the fine, the decree was that, if he did not grant the lease, he should pay back the fine. This seems to be the converse of a line of decisions, both at law and in equity, the gist of which is that a person who takes and keeps property cannot rely on infancy to release him from its burdens, especially if sued when of age, as in some instances was the case: see Year Book, 2 Hen. 6, 318; Kirton v. Elliott (1613) 2 Bulst. 69; Buckinghamshire v. Drury (1761) 2 Eden 61; Evelyn v. Chichester (1765) 3 Burr. 1717; Lemprière v. Lange (1879) 12 Ch. D. 675; whatever may be thought of some of these decisions, they do not touch the present case. There is a long gap in the cases relied on after Eason v. Nicholas, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 488.

For a very long time and in many forms equity has interfered to give relief against frauds committed by infants, or has refused it to infants guilty of fraud; but the practice and even the principles applicable to such cases were long ill-defined. "An infant," says Knight Bruce V.-C. in Stikeman v. Dawson, 1 De G. & Sm. 90, "however generally for his own sake protected by an incapacity to bind himself by contracts, may be doli capax in a civil sense and for civil purposes in the view of a Court of Equity, though perhaps only when pubertati proximus, or older . . . and may therefore commit a fraud for which or the consequences of which he may after his majority be made civilly liable in equity. . . . I agree . . . that in what cases in particular a Court of Equity will thus exert itself it is not easy to determine." Though many cases have been decided on this subject, none has been cited to us till one in last year in which the decision has directly been [615] that the defendant must pay back under a judgment purely in personam a sum equal to that which he obtained during infancy under a purported contract of lending and borrowing, which was entered into by the lender on the faith of the borrower's fraudulent assertion that he was of full age.

There are, however, some dicta of importance and some decisions which are alleged to bear indirectly on the point. In Nelson v. Stocker, 4 De G. & J. 464, Turner L.J. says: "if the case had depended simply upon the point of the defendant having represented himself to be of age, when he was not of age, I should have felt no doubt about it. . . . Infants are no more entitled than adults are to gain benefit to themselves by fraud, and had the case therefore depended upon this point alone I should have agreed most fully with the decision of the Vice-Chancellor," which was that the defendant should be decreed to pay 1000*l.* under his covenant, made when an infant, to place that sum in the hands of trustees, contained in a marriage settlement executed by him and by other parties after he had fraudulently represented himself to be of full age. As, however, the party to the settlement who was most concerned, namely the infant's wife, knew the truth, the Lords Justices allowed the appeal. It will be seen that the actual decision in Nelson v. Stocker, 4 De G. & J. 458, does not touch the present case, nor does the dictum, if its principle be estoppel, after majority against denying the truth of a statement made when under age, as explained by Sir Ford North in Mohori Bibee v. Dhurmodas Ghose (1903) L. R. 30 Ind. Ap. at p. 122; and see Wright v. Snowe (1848) 2 De G. & Sm. 321. The observations of the Court of Appeal in Levene v. Broug- ham, 25 Times L. Rep. 265, that there could be no such estoppel were made apparently without citation of any of these cases, but in such a case the Infants' Relief Act would be an answer to estoppel now.

Much reliance was placed on Ex p. Unity Joint Stock Mut. Banking Assoc. 3 De G. & J. 63, with which should be read the comments on it by Bacon V.-C. in In re Jones, 18 Ch. D. 115 (which are in point though his actual decision was overruled) and by [616] Baggallay L.J. at p. 123. In that case the debtor King, while under age, had obtained advances from the association by a fraudulent misrepresentation that he was of full age. He was adjudicated bankrupt after he came of age and the association was admitted to prove in the bankruptcy for the amount advanced. The Lords Justices arrived at this conclusion somewhat reluctantly on the authority of uncited decisions of Lord Cowper, Lord Hardwicke, and Lord Thurlow. Lord Cowper's case is probably Watts v. Creswell, 9 Vin. Abr. tit. Enfant, N. pl. 24, p. 415, in which he says that if an infant was old enough and cunning enough to carry on a fraud he ought in a Court of Equity to make satisfaction for it. Lord Hardwicke's opinion may be that in Buckinghamshire v. Drury, 2 Eden 71—"minors are not allowed to take advantage of infancy to support a fraud," against which should be set Lord Mansfield's more particular statement in the same case at p. 72, that if the infant took an estate and was to pay rent for it, he should not hold the estate and defend himself against payment of the rent by pretence of infancy. The allusion to Lord Thurlow probably is to the case of Beckett v. Cordley (1784) 1 Bro. C. C. 358, where he said, "if there was fraud of which the infant was cognizant, she would be bound as much as an adult." If these be the authorities relied on in Ex p. Unity Joint Stock Mut. Banking Assoc. 3 De G. & J. 63, and I can find none nearer, they hardly touch the decision in that case, nor do they, or the decision itself in Ex p. Unity Joint Stock Mut. Banking Assoc. 3 De G. & J. 63, affect the case now before us. There, the bankruptcy standing unchallenged and the question being how the assets should be administered among competing creditors or claimants, it was held that persons who had been defrauded by the bankrupt when under age and thereby induced to lend him money had a claim on his assets, not against him personally, which was available in competition with creditors in the full sense of the word. It is clear that Jessel M.R. thought the decision anomalous and one not to be extended: see In re Jones, 18 Ch. D. at pp. 120, 121. Since then it has been decided in Reg. v. Wilson (1879) 5 Q. B. D. 28, [617] that an infant cannot be convicted, under s. 12 of the Debtors Act, 1869, of quitting the country fraudulently with property that ought to be divided among his creditors, since in law he has none. Whatever may be said of Ex p. Unity Joint Stock Mut. Banking Assoc. 3 De G. & J. 63, now, it does not govern the present case, but it must be admitted that the language of the Lords Justices is hardly consistent with any other view than that the bankrupt was in equity personally liable to pay the debt in question. There is further language of a similar kind in Maclean v. Dummett (1869) 22 L. T. N. S. 711, where the Privy Council speaks of an infant as "contracting debts" in his trade by fraudulently asserting himself to be of full age, but this again was not necessary to the decision. These seem to be all the material dicta.

As to the cases, Clarke v. Cobley [1789] 2 Cox Ch. 173, is one in which the Court restored the status quo affected by an infant's fraud by ordering him to return promissory notes, the surrender of which he had procured by falsely stating that he was of age, and by putting him under terms not to plead the Statute of Limitations, if sued upon them, but a decree against him to pay the amount of the notes, though he was now of age, was expressly refused. In Cory v. Gertcken (1816) 2 Madd. 40, where Sir T. Plumer says "though in general a payment to an infant may be bad, yet if the infant practises a fraud he is liable for the consequences," he only decided that a person could not make his trustee pay over again a sum that he had got from him by fraudulently representing himself, while still an infant, to be already of full age, and in Chubb v. Griffiths (1865) 35 Beav. 127, Lord Romilly M.R., when saddling an infant defendant with costs who had been passing off his safes as Chubb's safes, says that he does so "on the principle laid down in Cory v. Gertcken." (1816) 2 Madd. 40. What he conceived this principle to be I can hardly tell, but at any rate it is not a general liability in equity for fraud. Jessel M.R. in In re Jones, 18 Ch. D. 118, regards Cory v. Gertcken as a pure action of tort. The grounds of an infant defendant's liability for costs were again discussed in Woolff v. Woolff [1899] 1 Ch. 343, another case of similar dishonesty, and the liability [1818] was rested on the above principle and authority, also without any hint of a wider one than in equity an infant is generally liable for fraud. I think that the whole current of decisions down to 1913, apart from dicta which are inconclusive, went to shew that, when an infant obtained an advantage by falsely stating himself to be of full age, equity required him to restore his ill-gotten gains, or to release the party deceived from obligations or acts in law induced by the fraud, but scrupulously stopped short of enforcing against him a contractual obligation, entered into while he was an infant, even by means of a fraud. This applies even to Ex p. Unity Joint Stock Mut. Banking Assoc. 3 De G. & J. 63: Restitution stopped where repayment began; as Kindersley v. C. puts in Vaughan v. Vanderstegen (1854) 2 Drew. 363, an analogous case, "you take the property to pay the debt."

Last year, in Stocks v. Wilson [1913] 2 K. B. 235, an infant, who had obtained furniture from the plaintiff by falsely stating that he was of age and had sold part of it for 30*l.*, was personally adjudged by Lush J. to pay this 30*l.* as part of the relief granted to the plaintiff. This is the case which more than any other influenced Horridge J. in the Court below. I think it is plain that Lush J. conceived himself to be merely applying the equitable principle of restitution. The form of the claim was that, by way of equitable relief, the infant should be ordered to pay the reasonable value of the goods, which he could not restore because he had sold them. The argument was that equity would not allow him to keep the goods and not pay for them, that if he kept the property he must discharge the burden, and that he could not better his position by having put it out of his power to give up the property. Lush J. expressly says [1913] 2 K. B. 247, "it is a jurisdiction to compel the infant to make satisfaction," and, at p. 248, "the remedy is not on the contract." At pp. 242-243 he says "what the Court of Equity has done in cases of this kind is to prevent the infant from retaining the benefit of what he has obtained by reason of his fraud. It has done no more than this, and this is a very different thing from making him liable to pay damages and compensation for the loss of the other party's [1619] bargain. If the infant has obtained property by fraud he can be compelled to restore it," but now comes the proposition, which applies to the present case and is open to challenge, "if he has obtained money he can be compelled to refund it." The learned judge thought that the fundamental principle in Ex p. Unity Joint Stock Mut. Banking Assoc. 3 De G. & J. 63, was a liability to account for the money obtained by the fraudulent representation, and that in the case before him there must be a similar liability to account for the proceeds of the sale of the goods obtained by this fraud. If this be his ratio decidendi, though I have difficulty in seeing what liability to account there can be (and certainly none is named in In re King; Ex p. Unity Joint Stock Mut. Banking Assoc. 3 De G. & J. 63, the decision in Stocks v. Wilson [1913] 2 K. B. 235, is distinguishable from the present case and is independent of the above dictum, and I need express no opinion about it. In the present case there is clearly no accounting. There is no fiduciary relation: the money was paid over in order to be used as the defendant's own and he has so used it and, I suppose, spent it. There is no question of tracing it, no possibility of restoring the very thing got by the fraud, nothing but compulsion through a personal judgment to pay an equivalent sum out of his present or future resources, in a word nothing but a judgment in debt to repay the loan. I think this would be nothing but enforcing a void contract. So far as I can find, the Court of Chancery never would have enforced any liability under circumstances like the present; any more than a Court of law would have done so, and I think that no ground can be found for the present judgment, which would be an answer to the Infants' Relief Act. Accordingly the appeal succeeds; the judgment must be set aside and entered for the defendant. He will have the costs here, where he succeeds, and of the further consideration below, where he ought to have succeeded. Further than this there should be no costs given him. He cannot be made to pay the costs of the action, in which he was entitled to judgment, but I think that, as he was charged with fraud and found guilty of it, he must pay the costs of that issue, to be set off against such [620] costs as he gets, and as to any other general costs of the action, which must be small, I think there is good ground for saying that there be no order for payment on either side.

KENNEDY, L.J.—The plaintiffs, a firm of money-lenders, sue in this action the defendant, an infant, claiming 475*l.* and interest as damages for fraudulent misrepresentation, and, alternatively, 475*l.* as money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiffs. The alleged misrepresentation was a statement of the defendant that he was of age, made by him in order to induce the plaintiffs to lend him, as they did, two sums of 200*l.* each in December, 1911. The case was heard by Horridge J. sitting with a common jury. The verdict was that the plaintiffs were induced to make both loans by the fraudulent misrepresentation.

Horridge J. has held that an action ex delicto raising a claim for damages for fraud would not lie against an infant when, as in this case, the fraud was an inducement to the contract, the nonperformance of which was the basis of the pecuniary injury for which the plaintiff claims compensation in damages. This, in my judgment, was clearly right. The law is well put by Sir Frederick Pollock in his Principles of Contract, 8th ed. at p. 78: "He" (i. e., the infant) "cannot be sued for a wrong when the cause of action is in substance ex contractu, or is so directly connected with the contract that the action would be an indirect way of enforcing the contract—which, as in the analogous case of married women, the law does not allow.

But if an infant's wrongful act, though concerned with the subject-matter of a contract, and such that but for the contract there would have been no opportunity of committing it, is nevertheless independent of the contract in the sense of not being an act of the kind contemplated by it, then the infant is liable." The first proposition was established as long ago as the year 1665 in the case of Johnson v. Pye, 1 Sid. 258, and was dwelt upon by the judges of the King's Bench in Jennings v. Rundall, 8 T. R. 335; the second is illustrated, in regard to an infant, by Burnard v. Haggis (1863) 14 C. B. N. S. 45, 108 E. C. L. 45, [621] in the year 1863, and in regard to the analogous case of a married woman who has represented herself as a feme sole or sui juris, by the judgment of the Court of Exchequer pronounced by Pollock C.B. in Liverpool Adelphi Loan Assoc. v. Fairhurst (1854) 9 Exch. 422, in the year 1854.

In regard to the second and alternative claim in this action—a claim, as pleaded, for 475*l.* as money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiffs, which the learned judge has in his judgment reduced to 400*l.*, by the omission, I presume, of interest—I am equally of opinion that the plaintiffs' case cannot be maintained. I venture, with all due deference to the fact of the citation of it with approval in 1889 by Kay J. in In re Seager, 60 L. T. N. S. 665, and by my brother Phillimore in 1912 in Cowern v. Nield [1912] 2 K. B. 423, to entertain a doubt whether in Bristow v. Eastman, 1 Esp. 172, tried by Lord Kenyon, where an infant had fraudulently converted moneys of the plaintiff to his own use, (and therefore there was a good cause of action substantially ex delicto and wholly independent of contract upon which the plaintiff was entitled to succeed) the plaintiff's claim, if and so far as it depended upon an indebitatus count, ought to have prevailed against a plea of infancy. Be that as it may, I am certainly of opinion that in the present case, where the defendant is an infant, the cause of action is in substance ex contractu and is so directly connected with the contract of loan that the action would be an indirect way of enforcing that contract. "So far as regards the principal moneys lent the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover upon their alternative common law claim for money had and received by the defendant for their use." I think that this would be so as the law stood before 1874, and further that to hold otherwise now would be improperly to open the door to a serious inroad upon the statutory provisions of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, ss. 1, 2, and the Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, 1892, s. 5. It appears to me that Horridge J. intended so to hold and to dismiss the plaintiffs' claim not only so far as it rested upon the claim for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation, but also so far as it rested upon the claim on an implied contract for money had and [622] received to the use of the plaintiffs. I think that is so, although he gave judgment for the plaintiffs in an action in which those were the only claims pleaded, and in which, so far as the report informs us, no amendment of the plaintiffs' pleadings was asked for or granted. Reading the concluding portion of the judgment commencing with the words "There remains, however, the question whether or not a Court of Equity would order restitution to be made by an infant who had obtained property by fraud" (1913) 29 Times L. Rep. 555, I think that the learned judge held that; having all the facts and the finding of the jury before him, the just and proper course was, without requiring any formal amendment, to treat the plaintiffs as basing their claim upon an assertion such as was pleaded by the plaintiff in the recent case of Stocks v. Wilson [1913] 2 K. B. 235, before Lush J., to which Horridge J. expressly refers in an earlier passage in his judgment. Such a course was, in my opinion not only unobjectionable, but right.

We have, therefore, to consider in this Court whether or not the defendant lay under such an equitable liability to the plaintiffs as entitled them to the judgment for 400*l.* which the learned judge has entered in their favour. Now, beyond all question, there are cases in which a Court of Equity will interfere to prevent the fraud of an infant, such as an express misrepresentation of full age, from working an injustice. There is, at the same time, excellent authority for declining to define in positive terms the range of such interference. In Stikeman v. Dawson, 1 De G. & Sm. 90, at p. 109, a case in the year 1847 referred to by counsel in the course of their arguments, Knight Bruce V.C., after quoting certain language of Ulpian and Paulus to shew the view of the civil law in regard to the fraud of infants, proceeded thus: "Unquestionably it is the law of England that an infant, however generally for his own sake protected by an incapacity to bind himself by contracts, may be doli capax in a civil sense and for civil purposes in the view of a Court of Equity, though perhaps only when pubertati proximus or older, and not, I suppose, at so early an age as in a criminal sense and for criminal purposes, and may therefore commit a fraud for which [623] or the consequences of which he may, after his majority, be made civilly answerable in equity." I am not now speaking of cases in which infants, if liable at all, are liable at law only, or in which adults, if suable in respect of acts done during infancy, are suable at law only. But, as far as equity is concerned, the practical application of the rule or doctrine to which I have just been referring must not seldom, I conceive, be matter of much delicacy and difficulty. I agree with a learned author who says that in what cases in particular a Court of Equity will thus exert itself it is not easy to determine." I shall certainly not embark upon an adventure of which so eminent a master of equity as Sir J. L. Knight Bruce has spoken thus discouragingly. Happily, it is not necessary to do so for the decision of the present case. We have not to discover to what other cases the rule or doctrine ought to be held to extend, but whether there is either principle or binding judicial authority for its application to this particular case, in which the plaintiffs have been held by Horridge J. entitled in virtue of it to obtain by an action in personam repayment from an infant of the principal money owing to them under a contract of loan into which the lenders were induced to enter by a fraudulent representation of the borrower that he was of full age. After a careful consideration of the numerous reported decisions which have been brought to our attention by the industry of counsel, I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of Horridge J. cannot be supported. I am not satisfied that the rule or doctrine of equity referred to by Knight Bruce V.C. has ever been so applied. Lord Sumner in his judgment, which I have had the opportunity of reading, has so fully, and, in my judgment, so satisfactorily, dealt with the equity cases and the judicial dicta in which the plaintiffs' counsel seek to find support for the judgment in their favour, as well as the recent judgment of Lush J. in Stocks v. Wilson [1913] 2 K. B. 235, that it is quite useless for me to consider those cases or those dicta in detail. I desire, however, to add a few further observations.

In the first place, it appears to me that whilst Courts of Equity have interfered to make an infant restore property found in his possession which he had obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation, [624] as, e. g., the promissory note in the old case of Clarke v. Cobley, 2 Cox Ch. 173; to compel the recognition, in regard to property in his possession, of rights and interests of persons whom he has misled into entering into transactions in regard to it (cf. Watts v. Creswell, 9 Vin. Abr. 415); and to prevent the payment over again to the infant of moneys of which he has procured the payment already by a representation of full age, as in Cory v. Gerteken, 2 Madd. 40; there is no case in which I can find that a Court of Equity has given judgment against an infant in circumstances like the present, that is to say, in which it has interfered on the ground of the fraud of the infant, whereby he induced the making of the contract of loan, to order the infant to pay the plaintiff a sum equal to the sum borrowed under the void contract, and so, in effect, to the amount of the principal lent, to give validity as against the infant to a void contract.

In the next place, I desire to say that in my view, whilst there are no doubt dicta in the judgments of the Lords Justices in Ex p. Unity Joint Stock Mut. Banking Assoc. 3 De G. & J. 63, upon which the plaintiffs in this case naturally lay stress, the decision ought, as I understand the judgment of Lindley J. in Miller v. Blankley (1878) 38 L. T. N. S. 527 at p. 530 (and the language used by Jessel M.R. in the later case of Ex p. Jones, 18 Ch. D. 120, appears to me to be in accord), to be treated as expressing the law in bankruptcy and not as expressing a doctrine of general application. The action in Miller v. Blankley, 38 L. T. N. S. 527, was an action of debt against a builder for goods supplied. He pleaded infancy as a defence. The plaintiff's counsel relied upon Ex p. Unity Joint Stock Mut. Banking Assoc. 3 De G. & J. 63. In the course of this judgment Lord Lindley (then Lindley J.) said: "We are now asked to carry further the doctrine which Turner L.J. in Ex p. Unity Joint Stock Mut. Banking Assoc. 3 De G. & J. 63, expressed his reluctance to act upon. He concurred, however, in the judgment of Knight Bruce L.J.; and no doubt that case must be taken to decide that where an infant borrows money upon a fraudulent misrepresentation and subsequently becomes bankrupt the debt is provable in his bankruptcy. [625] I think that is still law in bankruptcy; but we should not take the doctrine any further."

In my judgment the nature of the claim in the present case is not one to which the equitable rule or doctrine invoked by the respondents applies so as to make the action maintainable, and this appeal must be allowed. As to costs, I concur in the special order stated by the president of this Court in his judgment.

A. T. LAWRENCE, J.—The plaintiffs sue for 475l., first, as damages for deceit, secondly, for money had and received to their use. The plaintiffs are money-lenders, who made loans to the defendant while he was an infant. They were induced to do so upon the faith of false representations made by the defendant as to his age.

The defendant pleads his infancy.

It was admitted that upon the authorities the cause of action in deceit must fail: Johnson v. Pye, Sid. 258, 1 Keb. 913; Bartlett v. Wells, 1 B. & S. 836, 101 E. C. L. 836. The defendant was of an age when he would be responsible criminally and also for his torts independent of contract, but not for frauds in obtaining a contract, because to hold him responsible in damages for such frauds would in effect be to hold him responsible for the contract so obtained.

It would be a simple thing for those who prey upon infants to obtain from them materials which could be used to support a charge of fraud—as easy as obtaining the usual promissory note. The result would be that the infant would have both to establish his infancy and to face a charge of fraud.

It has been the policy of the law to protect infants; they have been held incapable of binding themselves by their contracts—with certain exceptions not material to this case. That this is the law was admitted. But it was argued for the plaintiffs that these considerations do not affect the claim for "money had and received." Horridge J. was induced to take the view (following a decision of Lush J. in Stocks v. Wilson [1913] 2 K. B. 235) that there was in equity a right to relief to the extent of the money actually [626] received. It was said for the plaintiffs that the action for money had and received was not founded upon a promise implied by law, but rested upon what was called by counsel a "doctrine of equity." I do not think this argument is well founded. There are no doubt many cases in which equity will give relief against frauds perpetrated by infants. Wherever the infant requires as a plaintiff the assistance of any Court, it will be refused until he has made good his fraudulent representation. Wherever the infant is still in possession of any property which he has obtained by his fraud he will be made to restore it to its former owner. But I think that it is incorrect to say that he can be made to repay money which he has spent, merely because he received it under a contract induced by his fraud.

The contracts of an infant, which were formerly voidable only, are now by the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, made absolutely void. He is further protected in respect of loans by 55 & 56 Vict. c. 4, ss. 3, 4, 5. These statutes are as binding upon the equitable, as they are upon the common law, jurisdiction of the Court. I do not think that it is correct to say that the action for money had and received is wholly independent of contract. It arises wherever money has been received which ex æquo et bono belongs to the plaintiff. In such case the law implies a promise to pay it to the plaintiff, but where the express promise to repay the money is by statute "absolutely void" it is impossible to imply a promise to repay the same money: see observations of Jessel M.R. in Ex p. Jones, 18 Ch. D. 118. To do so would be to (in large part) defeat the policy of the statute, and would violate the well-established principle that where there is an express promise no other like promise can be implied.

Lord Mansfield in Moses v. Macferlan, 2 Burr. 1003, excepted debts "contradicted during infancy" from the operation of the action for money had and received, shewing that he regarded it as an action depending upon an implied promise.

None of the authorities cited to us in my opinion extend to establish the plaintiff's claim in this case.

The judgment in Stocks v. Wilson [1913] 2 K. B. 235, seems to treat the [627] subsequent sale of the property by the infant as wrongful, and as affording a foundation for treating the money obtained thereby as received to the plaintiff's use. If this had been so, if it had been a wrong independent of contract, it would no doubt have made a case in which the plaintiff could, by waiving the tort, have afforded a consideration for the implied promise to pay over the proceeds, and he could have recovered on the common count for "money had and received." But this is rendered impossible by the judge's finding that the property in the goods had passed to the infant before he disposed of them (and as to the major portion thereof that he did so with the concurrence of the plaintiff in the action). The really wrongful act was the obtaining the goods under the contract of purchase by the pretence that he was of full age; as to that, it was admitted that he could not be sued in tort for the fraud. There was therefore no actionable tort independent of contract which could be waived to form a consideration for the implied promise.

In the case of Watts v. Creswell, 9 Vin. Abr. 415, which was relied upon the fraudulent infant was in possession of the lands as to which he had misrepresented the title, and was setting up a former settlement upon himself to defeat the mortgagee under that title. It was held that he could not do so in equity without making satisfaction for the fraud. This is a long way from establishing anything like an equity to sue as for "money had and received." If when the action is brought both the property and the proceeds are gone, I see no ground upon which a Court of Equity could have founded its jurisdiction.

In the case of Esron v. Nicholas, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 488, 1 De G. & Sm. 118 (which is very imperfectly reported), the defendant was ordered to repay a premium received while he was an infant in respect of a lease granted by a person whom he had falsely represented to be his guardian. He was now claiming to receive the rents and profits reserved under a subsequent lease of this very property granted by himself after he came of age. Knight Bruce V.-C. does not seem to have approved of the case: see Stikeman v. Dawson, 1 De G. & Sm. 90; but at least it can be said that the infant's possession of the property and [628] claim to set up the later lease and to receive the rents and profits thereof afforded a ground for the intervention of the Court of Equity. In Stikeman v. Dawson, 1 De G. & Sm. 90, the Vice-Chancellor, it is true, refused relief against the infant upon the ground that he had made no express misrepresentation; but there the infant was seeking to recover certificates of shares he had sold and handed over to the purchaser. In such a case, if fraud were established against the infant, there would be ground for equity to interfere to restrain him from recovering the certificates without making compensation for the money obtained by the fraud.

The only case which has been cited to us which gives rise to any difficulty is Ex p. Unity Joint Stock Banking Mut. Assoc. 3 De G. & J. 63, where a proof in bankruptcy was allowed in respect of a loan made to the bankrupt when an infant on the faith of a fraudulent misrepresentation that he was of full age. Knight Bruce L.J. treated himself as bound by authority, and the Court reluctantly allowed the proof. I have examined all the cases cited on that occasion, and cannot find that any one of them goes to the length supposed. The case may be applicable in bankruptcy, but certainly ought not to be extended generally so as to impair the protection which the law affords to infants. I think it cannot now be regarded as of general application: see Reg. v. Wilson, 5 Q. B. D. 28; Ex p. Jones, 18 Ch. D. 118; Lovell v. Beauchamp [1894] A. C. 607.

If the cause of action for money had and received existed, I should expect to find ample authority for it, as, whenever an honest money-lender lends to an infant, he has probably been deceived as to the age of the borrower.

I think that this appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant.

Appeal allowed.

NOTE.

Infancy as Defence to Action for Money Loaned.

General Rule.

A plea of infancy is good against an action at law for money loaned, where the money was not borrowed directly for the purpose of buying necessaries, although it may later have been expended in the purchase of them, as money is not classed under the head of necessaries in the contemplation of the law. Price v. Sanders, 60 Ind. 310; Beeler v. Young, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 519; Watson v. Cross, 2 Duv. (Ky.) 147; Denning v. Nelson, 1 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 503, 10 West. L. J. 215; West v. Gregg, 1 Grant Cas. (Pa.) 53; Bent v. Manning, 10 Vt. 225. And see Swift v. Bennett,

10 Cush. (Mass.) 436; Smith v. Oliphant, 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 306; Meyers v. Blackburn, 38 Nova Scotia 50. Thus in Price v. Sanders, supra, the court said: "A minor cannot be held liable at law on his note or other contract for money, even though he expends the money for necessities. The indebtedness must be created directly for the necessities, or he will not be liable at law. The reason of the law is, that the minor might waste the money, and no matter ex post facto can entitle the plaintiff to his action." In West v. Gregg, 1 Grant Cas. (Pa.) 53, it was said: "This is an action against a minor for money lent to him, and to meet the defense of infancy, it was offered to prove that the money was lent to him for the purpose of making repairs and removing encumbrances upon land devised to him by his father, and that it was so used. The court below rejected the evidence on the ground that the infant had no power to make such a contract, and we think they were right. The general rule is that an infant can bind himself or his estate only for necessities, and the plaintiff can escape from this rule only by showing a case which ought to be treated as an exception to it; which he has not done. Necessity has certainly demanded many exceptions to this rule, but here it demands none; for this minor had a guardian acting for him, and the law has provided the very mode in which the end might have been reached." In Beeler v. Young, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 519, the court said: "As to the money lent, the law will never trust the infant with the application and laying of it out; for it might be lent to purchase necessities, but squandered in luxuries and dissipation. So if one lends money, which the infant actually lays out afterward in necessities, yet he shall not be subject to the action of the lender. For it is upon the lending that the liability must arise, after that no assumpsit can be raised to bind the infant; the application of the loan cannot, ex post facto, entitle the lender to his action." In Ayers v. Burns, 87 Ind. 245, 44 Am. Rep. 759, the court said: "The suit is founded upon an implied contract of the appellant Ayers to repay the money which the administrator of his surety had been compelled to pay on his promissory notes. Such an implied contract, if it existed, was not binding and could not be enforced against him during his infancy. Indeed, it may well be doubted if his promissory notes, even though given for necessities, could have been enforced against him during infancy in suits thereon by the payees thereof."

In Dorrell v. Hastings, 28 Ind. 478, an action to recover money paid to relieve an infant from a military draft to which the law held him subject, which payment had been made at his request, it was held that a plea of infancy was a good defense. The court said: "No particular objection to the answer is pointed out, or reason given why it is not good, and we are not able to discover any. We are not aware of any authority that would justify us in holding that money paid to relieve an infant from a military draft to which the law subjects him, comes within the exception of necessities. Upon principle, we think it clear that it does not." In Turner v. Gaither, 83 N. C. 357, 35 Am. Rep. 547, it was held that infancy was a good defense to an action on a bond of an infant for money advanced by his father's administrator and used by him in the acquirement of a professional education, as such expenses were not necessities. In Burton v. Anthony, 46 Ore. 47, 79 Pac. 185, 114 Am. St. Rep. 847, 66 L.R.A. 826, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff loaned an infant money to redeem land of his (the infant's) on which a mortgage had been foreclosed, with the understanding that he was to be subrogated to the rights of the judgment creditor, it was held that the infant was under no binding obligation to repay the money. The court said: "Though the redemption of the land conferred on him a pecuniary benefit, the furnishing of the money for that purpose at his request does not, by reason of his incapacity to enter into a valid contract, create a binding obligation, because it was not necessary to his sustenance." In Magee v. Welsh, 18 Cal. 155, it was held that a plea of infancy was good against a note and mortgage which had been given to raise money to pay off another mortgage on the same property and that the money so raised could not be considered necessities in the contemplation of the law.

It has been held that one who has paid off a mortgage on the land of certain infants, though at the request of their guardian, cannot maintain an action against them for money had and received or for money lent. Bicknell v. Bicknell, 111 Mass. 265.

In Cane v. Cawthon, 32 La. Ann. 953, it was held that a person who loaned money to certain minors, under the authority of the court, was protected by the decree, whether or not the loan was necessary and for the use of the minors.

Money furnished for the purpose of supplying an infant with mourning goods on the death of her mother has been held to be classed as necessities and to be recoverable as such. De Moss v. Giltner, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 691.

An agreement to repay money borrowed on a joint account by an infant and another is voidable, but if affirmed by the infant after her coming of age, is binding on her. Kennedy v. Doyle, 10 Allen (Mass.) 161.

In England, since 1874 a transaction whereby an infant borrows money is absolutely void under the Infants Relief Act, 1874.

Levene v. Brougham, 53 Sol. J. (Eng.) 243, 25 Times L. Rep. 265; Nottingham Permanent Ben. Bldg. Soc. v. Thurstan, [1903] A. C. 6, 72 L. J. Ch. 134, 87 L. T. N. S. 529, 51 W. R. 273, 67 J. P. 129, 19 Times L. Rep. 54. Thus where it appeared that an infant member of a building society borrowed from it to buy land and complete houses which were being built on it, giving in consideration thereof a mortgage, it was held that the mortgage was void under the Infants Relief Act, 1874, as against the infant. Nottingham Permanent Ben. Bldg. Soc. v. Thurstan, supra. In Levene v. Brougham, 53 Sol. J. (Eng.) 243, 25 Times L. Rep. 265, it appeared that an infant had obtained a loan, giving his promissory note therefor, and at the time the loan was made had represented himself as being of age. It was held that the contract was void under the Infants Relief Act, 1874, and the infant could rely on the statute, as his misrepresentation as to his age did not operate as an estoppel. The reported case is to the same effect. In Bateman v. Kingston, 6 L. R. Ir. (Eng.) 328, wherein in an action on certain promissory notes one of the makers set up a plea of infancy, it was held that a reply alleging that at the time the loan was made, the defendant represented himself to be of age, thereby fraudulently inducing the plaintiff to lend him the money, was bad. Compare the following English cases decided prior to the enactment of the statute: Probart v. Knouth, 2 Esp. 472; Clark v. Leslie, 5 Esp. 28; Darby v. Boucher, 1 Salk 279, 91 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 244; Earle v. Peale, 1 Salk 386, 91 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 336; Smith v. Gibson, Peake Add. Cas. 52, 4 Rev. Rep. 888; Marlow v. Pitfield, 1 P. Wms. 558; Martin v. Gale, 46 L. J. Ch. 84, 4 Ch. Div. 428, 36 L. T. N. S. 357, 25 W. R. 406; Rearsby's Case, Godb. 219, 78 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 133; Ellis v. Ellis, 12 Mod. 197, 3 Salk 197, 1 Ld. Raym. 344; Ex p. Unity Joint Stock Mut. Banking Assoc. 3 De G. & J. 63, 44 Eng. (Reprint) 1192.

Exceptions to Rule.

In equity a person who lends money to an infant to pay a debt incurred for necessities, will be subrogated to the rights of the original creditor, and the minor will be liable to him. Price v. Sanders, 60 Ind. 310; Watson v. Cross, 2 Duv. (Ky.) 147; Hickman v. Hall, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 338; Beeler v. Young, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 519. If a creditor furnishes money to a minor, which he uses to purchase necessities, and the creditor shows its application for the purchase of necessities, the minor will be liable in equity; or if a person lends money to a minor to pay a debt incurred for necessities, and the debt is so paid, he will stand in equity in the place of the original creditor, and the minor will be liable to him. Price v. Sanders, supra. In Watson v. Cross, 2 Duv. (Ky.) 147, which was an action brought by an infant for the recovery of a watch and a trunk, it appeared that when the property came into the possession of the appellant, he was a licensed innkeeper in Frankfort. The infant became his guest, and remained with him two weeks. The infant's entertainment, for that time, was worth twenty-eight dollars. The appellant also loaned the infant fifteen dollars to go after his trunk, and twelve dollars to pay his traveling expenses to Maysville, where he resided. The appellant had a lien on the watch and trunk, as an innkeeper, and in addition thereto, the infant also pledged them as security for the payment of the sums of money mentioned, amounting to fifty-five dollars. The court said: "As to the twelve dollars furnished to pay traveling expenses to the home of appellee, although it cannot be recovered as borrowed money from the infant, yet, as the parties to whom it was paid for traveling expenses of appellee could have recovered of him the value of their respective services as necessities, the appellant may, equitably, be substituted to their rights, as he, in effect, paid them what the infant was bound for, and on that ground recover the twelve dollars, which does not seem to have been more than was necessary and proper to be furnished to pay the expenses of a trip from Frankfort to Maysville. The appellant has manifested no right to recover the fifteen dollars, there being nothing in the record to show that the money was furnished, or that it was expended for necessities; and the infant had no legal capacity to borrow money and bind himself therefor. It is a well-settled principle that an innkeeper has a lien on the property of his guests for the price of his entertainment; and upon this ground appellant had a right to retain the property sued for until the twenty-eight dollars and its accruing interest was paid or tendered; and as the twelve dollars was furnished upon the faith of his being in the possession of the property, and under circumstances to make the infant liable therefor, the chancellor will not permit the possession to be disturbed until it is paid. The appellee seeking equity must do equity, and his infancy cannot take him out of the operation of this principle."

The same principle has been applied at law, when a person, at the request of a minor, has advanced the money for, or has himself paid a bill for necessities previously contracted by the infant. Kilgore v. Rich, 83 Me. 305, 22 Atl. 176, 23 Am. St. Rep. 780, 12 L.R.A. 859; Swift v. Bennett, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 436; Conn v. Coburn, 7 N. H. 368, 26 Am. Dec. 746; Randall v. Sweet, 1 Denio (N. Y.)

460; Equitable Trust Co. v. Moss, 149 App. Div. 615, 134 N. Y. S. 533; Bradley v. Pratt, 23 Vt. 378. So in Kilgore v. Rich, supra, wherein it appeared that an infant induced another to pay a board-bill contracted while attending school, the court said: "It was also ruled at the trial, that an infant being liable to one person for such a bill, could make himself liable to another who should pay such bill for him at his request; the liability to such other person not to be measured by the amount actually paid, but limited, irrespective of the contract price, to such sum as would be a reasonable compensation for the board. This ruling does not appear to infringe against any legal principle, and an examination of the cases satisfies us that it is well supported by the authorities. The infant's liability is in no way enlarged by owing the debt to one rather than to another. The rule lends no temptation to create a debt as it is already created. The right to transfer the liability from one to another might be a great convenience to a minor. One creditor might be unable or unwilling to wait for payment, while a friend and acquaintance, as a substituted creditor, might be accommodating in that respect. It would give a self-supporting minor more facilities for support. We have not, in our examination of authorities, noticed any case that opposes the principle. . . . The defendant relies on the rule generally prevailing in the cases that money is not a necessary, though lent to an infant who afterwards purchases necessities with it. 'But,' says Mr. Bishop, 'one who pays money at his (infant's) request to a third person for necessities can recover it.' Bish. Con. § 914. The difference is between lending or paying. Mr. Wharton (Whar. Con. § 72) finds the doctrine adopted in late American cases, that a person who lends money to an infant to purchase 'specific' necessities stands in the position of the tradesman who furnishes the necessities. In the case at bar the plaintiff could have taken an assignment of the claim, and been entitled to recover it, and there really is no good reason to defeat his claim as it is here presented." In Swift v. Bennett, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 436, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, at the request of an infant, paid a note given for certain necessities for a whaling trip, the court said: "The suit is not brought upon the order or draft of the defendant, which was accepted and paid by the plaintiffs. They do not seek to charge him as drawer of this order. The action is brought to recover money paid, laid out, and expended by the plaintiffs at the defendant's request, for necessities furnished to him. The order is introduced only as evidence of the request and of the amount furnished and paid for by the plaintiffs. The gist of the defendant's liability in this action is the payment of money, by the plaintiffs, at his request, for necessities. We suppose the rule to be well settled, that an infant is liable to an action at the suit of a person advancing money to a third party to pay for necessities furnished to the infant, but that he is not liable for money supplied to him, to be by him expended, although it may actually be laid out for necessities. The reason for this distinction is, that in the latter case the contract arises upon the lending, and that the law will not support contracts which are to depend for their validity upon a subsequent contingency. . . . The present case seems very clearly to fall within the principle recognized and established in these decisions, by which an infant is held liable for money advanced to pay for necessities furnished to him. The transaction between the parties was equivalent to an advancement by the plaintiffs to Brown & Co. to pay for the articles furnished by them to the defendant. The goods were, in fact, not sold by Brown & Co. to the defendant, on his credit, but they were delivered to him on the credit of the plaintiffs. Brown & Co. were, in a certain sense, the agents of the plaintiffs in supplying the defendant with the goods. The dealing between the parties was tantamount to an agreement between them, that Brown & Co. should furnish necessities to the defendant for which the plaintiffs were to pay. It does not, therefore, come within the rule that money lent to an infant, to be expended by him in the purchase of necessities, cannot be recovered. It is the payment, by the plaintiffs, of money to a third person, for necessities supplied to the defendant, for which an action may well be maintained against him."

In Conn v. Coburn, 7 N. H. 368, 26 Am. Dec. 746, it was held that where a person who became a surety on an infant's note given for necessities paid the same, he could recover the amount paid as money paid for the benefit of the infant, but could not sue on the note. To the same effect see Haine v. Tarrant, 2 Hill L. (S. C.) 400. And in Bradley v. Pratt, 23 Vt. 378, the court said: "The case of Conn v. Coburn, 7 N. H. 368, 26 Am. Dec. 746, where it was held, that an infant was liable to one who signed a note with him, as surety, given for necessities, who had paid the money, goes to that extent, we think. Here the plaintiff has, at the defendant's request, paid Légrand Bradley for necessities for the defendant, and agreed to look solely to the defendant. And if in such a case the law implies a promise on the part of the infant to indemnify his surety, and the cause of action arises, when the surety pays the money, how does the case differ from the present, except that the defendant has executed a promissory note to his surety? Upon the view taken of this case in the county court, it seems to us identical with that of Conn v. Coburn. We see no good reason to distinguish between this case and that of a promissory note given to the party providing the necessities. It is equally open to examination as to the consideration. The chief reason, perhaps, why an infant is not liable at law, and is liable in equity, for money borrowed, and which is actually expended for necessities, is the want of privity between the lender and the one who furnishes the necessities. If one buy necessities for an infant with money, or if, at the request of the infant, he pay for those already furnished, the infant is liable, I apprehend. That privity is here established. It is difficult to perceive, why, if an infant is liable on a single bill, which is a bond without penalty, given for necessities, he should not be equally so on a promissory note, or an account stated." But in Ayers v. Burns, 87 Ind. 245, 44 Am. Rep. 759, it was held that such an action was not maintainable by the surety during the infancy of the minor.

Likewise, where the loan and the use of money form but one transaction, as where the lender of the money does not pay it over to the infant, but himself applies it directly to the purchase of necessities, it has been held that the transaction is beneficial to the infant, and therefore he will be bound by it. Smith v. Oliphant, 2 Sandf. 806, wherein the court said: "It is true, that in general, an infant is not liable for money which he has borrowed; and it has been decided that the lender cannot recover, although it be proved that the infant actually laid out the money in necessities. The reason given is, that by intrusting the money to the infant, he was enabled to spend it in dissipation if he had been so minded; and his subsequent judicious use of it could not confer a right of action, when none existed at the time of the loan. On the other hand, there are many authorities which show, that where an infant has incurred a debt for necessities, one who, at his request, pays such debt, may recover against him for the money paid. On the same principle, and with greater reason, should the infant be deemed liable for money lent and applied by the lender in procuring him necessities. But it is said, that such an application establishes a demand for money paid for the infant's use; not a demand for money lent. It may well be, that the person so applying his money, can recover it, under a count for money paid, laid out and expended. Money lent is not unfrequently applied by the lender, directly to the use for which the borrower obtains it; but it is nevertheless money lent and advanced. In the case made by this replication the lender, upon the request of the infant, advanced money to the latter, by laying it out in the purchase of necessities; thus using his more mature judgment in respect of price and quality. No debt was incurred to the one who furnished the necessities; and there was no liability of the infant to be discharged by the payment of the money. This was strictly money lent and advanced. In the instances of money paid, for which infants have been held liable, the debts had been previously incurred, and the party furnishing the money, simply discharged such debts. It is manifest, that the true interests of an infant would be more likely to be promoted by the direct application of the money to the purchase by the lender; and that the claim founded upon such an advance, stands on higher ground than that for money paid."

Where an infant borrows money on the strength of a fraudulent representation that he is of age, and the representation is relied on by the lender, infancy is no defense to an action for the recovery of the money so loaned. Ostrander v. Quin, 84 Miss. 230, 36 So. 257, 105 Am. St. Rep. 426; Pemberton Bldg. etc. Assoc. v. Adams, 53 N. J. Eq. 258, 31 Atl. 280. Thus, in Ostrander v. Quin, supra, it was held that where an infant by representations that he was of age borrowed money, giving a mortgage as security therefor, which money was used by him for the purchase of necessities, he could not avoid the mortgage on the ground of infancy at the time of the loan and the giving of the mortgage. But in Baker v. Stone, 136 Mass. 405, it was held that where a minor, not disclosing her minority, borrowed money from a person who believed her to be of full age, and gave a note and mortgage of land to secure it, these facts would not estop her from avoiding the note and mortgage.

STATE

BUNTING.

Oregon Supreme Court—March 17, 1914.

71 Oregon 259; 139 Pac. 731.

Labor Laws — Limiting Hours of Labor.

Laws 1913, c. 192, prohibiting the employment of any person in any mill, factory, or manufacturing establishment more than 10 hours in a day, can be sustained only under the police power, since the right to labor or employ labor on terms stipulated by the parties is a property right guaranteed by U.

S. Const. Amend. 14, providing that no state shall make any law abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor deprive any person of property without due process of law, nor deny the equal protection of the law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The right to labor and to employ labor is subject to reasonable limitations necessary to promote the health, general welfare, and intelligence of the citizens, and the peace and good order of the state: U. S. Const. Amend. 14, not being designed to limit the right of the state under its police power to prescribe such regulations.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The hours of labor in industries in which too many hours of service in one day would be injurious to the health and well-being of the operatives may be reasonably regulated by the state under the police power, and this power legitimately exercised can neither be limited by contract nor bartered away by legislation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Constitutional Law — Police Power.

While the police power cannot excuse the enactment of unreasonable, oppressive, or unjust laws, it may be legitimately exercised to preserve the public health, safety, morals, and general welfare.

[See 6 R. C. L. tit. Constitutional Law, p. 183.]

Labor Laws — Limiting Hours of Labor.

The limitation of Laws 1913, c. 102, prohibiting employment of labor for more than 10 hours in one day to mills, factories, and manufacturing establishments, is not an unconstitutional discrimination.

[See note at end of this case.]

Constitutional Law — Presumption in Favor of Statute.

All reasonable intendments will be made in favor of a law not obviously void on its face, and it will be presumed that the Legislature has acted within constitutional limitations.

[See 6 R. C. L. tit. Constitutional Law, p. 97.]

Labor Laws — Limiting Hours of Labor.

Laws 1913, c. 102, prohibiting the employment of any person in any mill, factory, or manufacturing establishment for more than 10 hours in one day, except night watchmen, persons engaged in making necessary repairs, and, in cases of emergency, providing that employees may work overtime not to exceed three hours in a day at the rate of time and one half of the regular wage, is a proper police regulation, and does not violate the Constitution of the United States or of the state.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In Laws 1913, c. 102, prohibiting the employment of labor in mills, factories, and manufacturing establishments for more than 10 hours per day, a proviso permitting employees to work overtime not to exceed three hours in a day at the rate of time and a half the regular wage does not render the whole act void. [See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lake county: BENSON, Judge.

Criminal action. F. O. Bunting convicted of violating statute relating to hours of labor and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

W. Lair Thompson for appellant.

Andrew M. Crawford, James W. Crawford and O. C. Gibbs for appellee.

[261] BEAN, J.—Section 1 of the act declares as follows:

"It is the public policy of the State of Oregon that no person shall be hired, nor permitted to work for wages, under any conditions or terms, for longer hours or days of service than is consistent with his health and physical well-being and ability to promote the general welfare by his increasing usefulness as a healthy and intelligent citizen. It is hereby declared that the working of any person more than ten hours in one day, in any mill, factory or manufacturing establishment is injurious to the physical health and well-being of such person, and tends to prevent him from acquiring that degree of intelligence that is necessary to make him a useful and desirable citizen of the state."

Section 2 enacts the following:

"No person shall be employed in any mill, factory or manufacturing establishment in this state more than ten hours in any one day, except watchmen and employees when engaged in making necessary repairs, or in case of emergency, where life or property is in imminent danger; provided, however, employees may work overtime not to exceed three hours in any one day, conditional that payment be made for said overtime at the rate of time and one half the regular wage."

Section 3 provides a penalty for a violation of the statute.

Defendant demurred to the indictment upon the ground that the legislative enactment alleged to have been violated is invalid, because repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and to that of the State of Oregon.

1. It is contended that the statute violates the right of contract, the right of property, and that it is class legislation and void. The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which it is claimed the act contravenes, declares, inter alia, that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall [262] abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Article I, Section 20, of the Constitution of this state is as follows:

"No law shall be passed granting to any citizen or class of citizens, privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens."

To give the act vitality it must be done by virtue of the police power of the state.

2. It is an announced principle of law that the right to labor or to employ labor on such terms and conditions as may be stipulated by the contracting parties is not only a liberty, but a property right guaranteed to every citizen by the fourteenth amendment above quoted. Such right cannot be arbitrarily or unreasonably interfered with by the legislature: State v. Muller, 48 Ore. 252, 85 Pac. 855, 120 Am. St. Rep. 895, 11 Ann. Cas. 88; affirmed in 208 U. S. 412, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 551, 28 S. Ct. 324, 13 Ann. Cas. 957. The right to labor and to employ labor, like all other rights, is itself subject to such reasonable limitations as are necessary to promote the health, general welfare, and intelligence of the citizens, and the peace and good order of the state. To this end a large discretion is from necessity vested in the lawmakers to determine not only what the interest of the public require but what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests: State v. Muller, 48 Ore. 252, 85 Pac. 855, 120 Am. St. Rep. 895, 11 Ann. Cas. 88, 208 U. S. 412, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 551, 28 S. Ct. Rep. 324, 13 Ann. Cas. 957; State v. Baker, 50 Ore. 381, 92 Pac. 1076, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1040; Lawton v. Steele, [263] 152 U. S. 133, 136, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 385, 14 S. Ct. 499; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 U. S. (L. ed.) 205, 8 S. Ct. 273, 296; Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 780, 18 S. Ct. 383; Ritchie Co. v. Wayman, 244 Ill. 509, 91 N. E. 695, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 994; State v. Buchanan, 29 Wash. 602, 70 Pac. 52, 92 Am. St. Rep. 930, 59 L.R.A. 342; Ex p. Boyce, 27 Nev. 299, 75 Pac. 1, 1 Ann. Cas. 66, 65 L.R.A. 47, 57; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 830. By the adoption of the fourteenth amendment it was not designed nor intended to curtail or limit the right of the state under its police power to prescribe such reasonable regulations as might be essential to the promotion of the peace, welfare, morals, education, or good order of the people. It was adopted primarily to protect the then newly liberated negroes of the south from practical re-enslavement by their former masters, and to authorize Congress to protect the civil rights of these persons by appropriate legislation: Reports of Committees of House, 39th Congress, 1st Sess. Vol. 2, p. 13 et seq. To now invoke its provisions to perpetuate industrial servitude would be a perversion of its beneficent purposes.

3. The hours of labor in certain industries, in which too many hours of service in one day would be injurious to the health and well-being of the operatives, may be reasonably regulated by the state, under its police power. This power legitimately exercised can neither be limited by contract nor bartered away by legislation. We quote from Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 520, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 282, 4 S. Ct. 111, 118: "The Constitution of the United States was ordained, it is true, by descendants of Englishmen, who inherited the traditions of English law and history; but it was made for an undefined and expanding future, [264] and for a people gathered and to be gathered from many nations and of many tongues." See Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 388, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 790, 18 S. Ct. 388. The extent and limitations upon the police power of a state are well stated by Mr. Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 53, 84:

"We think it is a settled principle, growing out of the nature of well-ordered civil society, that every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it may be so regulated, that it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community. All property in this commonwealth, as well that in the interior as that bordering on tide waters, is derived directly or indirectly from the government, and held subject to those general regulations which are necessary to the common good and general welfare. Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law, as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution, may think necessary and expedient."

4. The police power cannot be forwarded as an excuse for the enactment of unreasonable, oppressive, or unjust laws. Yet it may be legitimately exercised for the purpose of preserving the public health, safety, morals, and general welfare: Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 616; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 220, 6 S. Ct. 1064. We quote from the majority opinion in Re Ten-Hour Law for Street Ry. Corp. 24 R. I. 603, at page 605; 54 Atl. 602, at page 603, 61 L.R.A. 612:

[265] "There is also a common assent that the legislature has the right of control in all matters affecting public safety, health, and welfare, on the ground that these are within the indefinable but unquestioned purview of what is known as the police power. It is indefinable, because none can foresee the ever-changing conditions which may call for its exercise; and it is unquestioned, because it is a necessary function of government to provide for the safety and welfare of the people. Private rights are often involved in its exercise, but a law is not on that account rendered invalid or unconstitutional."

The police power comprehends by far the greater portion of the powers which may be exercised by a state. As stated by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations (7 ed.), page 829, it "embraces its whole system of internal regulation, by which the state seeks not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offenses against the state, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizens with citizens those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights, and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own so far as is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of rights by others."

5. The limitation of the law to mills, factories, or manufacturing establishments is not in itself an unconstitutional discrimination. The work in factories is as different from that in mercantile houses as that in mines is from either: Freund, Police Power, § 313. It is conceded that the state by virtue of its police power may regulate the hours of labor of women and minors (Com. v. Riley, 210 Mass. 387, 97 N. E. 367, Ann. Cas. 1912D 368); State v. Shorey, 48 Ore. 396, 86 Pac. 681, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1121, also of [266] persons in underground mines, reduction plants, and smelters, and of men in the employ of common carriers.

6. All reasonable intendments will be made in favor of a law not obviously void upon its face: Cline v. Greenwood, 10 Ore. 230; Crowley v. State, 11 Ore. 512, 6 Pac. 70. It will therefore be presumed that the legislature has acted within constitutional limitations. Mr. Justice Brewer in Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 96, 104, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 909, 913, 19 S. Ct. 609, 612, said:

"It is also a maxim of constitutional law that a legislature is presumed to have acted within constitutional limits, upon full knowledge of the facts, and with the purpose of promoting the interests of the people as a whole, and courts will not lightly hold that an act duly passed by the legislature was one in the enactment of which it has transcended its power."

The legislature is the exclusive judge of the propriety and necessity of legislative interference within the scope of legislative power. If a state of facts could exist which would justify legislation, it would be presumed that it did exist: In re Ten-Hour Law for Street Ry. Corp. supra; State v. Peckham, 3 R. I. 289; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 77. As a general rule statutes should be sustained unless their unconstitutionality is clear beyond a reasonable doubt. Such doubt should be solved in favor of a legislative enactment and the act sustained: Cooley, Const. Lim. (7 ed.), pp. 252, 253; State v. Narragansett, 16 R. I. 424, 16 Atl. 901, 3 L.R.A. 295; State v. Schluer, 59 Ore. 18, 35, 115 Pac. 1057. See dissenting opinions of Mr. Justice Harlan, Mr. Justice White and Mr. Justice Day concurring, and of Mr. Justice Harlan in Lochner v. New York, 198 U. S. 45, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 937, 25 S. Ct. R. 539, 3 Ann. Cas. 1133, 1139.

7. In order to render a statute invalid by reason of discriminations which are clearly unreasonable, arbitrary, [267] oppressive, or partial, the vice of the law must be apparent upon its face. One of the objects of resorting to the governmental function known as the police power is for the betterment of social and economic conditions which affect the community at large, with a view of accomplishing "the greatest good of the greatest number." A certain minimum of physical well-being is necessary in order that social life may exist, the usefulness and intelligence of the citizens be increased, and the progress of civilization accelerated: Freund, Police Power, §§ 8, 10. The conditions which may call for the exercise of this power are continually changing. For this reason the police power is sometimes referred to as if it were elastic. We are of the opinion, however, that the changes refer to the application of the function, and that the power remains immutable, being called into requisition when the conditions authorize and demand legislative action. The required minimum of well-being varies in different periods, but rises with advancing civilization until it includes a certain standard of comfort. We quote Mr. Justice Holmes in Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 111, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 112, 31 S. Ct. 186, 188, Ann. Cas. 1912A 487, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1062:

"It may be said in a general way that the police power extends to all the great public needs. . . . It may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage, or held by the prevailing morality or strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare."

In the latter case the constitutionality of a statute of Oklahoma requiring the payment of contributions by banks toward a depositors' guaranty fund for the protection of depositors was under consideration upon the ground that the legislature of Oklahoma had by implication [268] declared free banking a public danger, and it was held that it was not palpable or beyond doubt that it was not true.

In Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 253, 8 S. Ct. 992, 1257, the constitutionality of a statute of Pennsylvania prohibiting the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine was questioned. No evidence was offered on the trial to show that the article was impure or unwholesome. On the contrary, there was an offer to prove that it was a wholesome, nutritious food, in all respects as healthful as butter produced from pure cream. The court held that whether the manufacture of oleomargarine of the kind described in the statute involved such danger to the public health as to require for the protection of the people the entire suppression of the business, rather than its regulation in such manner as to prevent its manufacture and sale to go on, were questions of fact and of public policy which belonged to the legislative department to determine, and that the court could not interfere without usurping the powers of the legislative department.

By the code of the State of Georgia, 1895, Sections 2615, 2619, the hours of labor in cotton or woollen manufacturing establishments were limited to 11 hours, except in case of engineers, etc., and help employed to make repairs, the aggregate of working hours per week was not to exceed 66, and contracts for a long time were declared void: See 2 Labatt's Master and Servant (2 ed.), § 886.

Judge Cooley says:

"Whether a statute is constitutional or not is always a question of power; that is, a question whether the legislature in the particular case, in respect to the subject matter of the act, the manner in which its object is to be accomplished, and the mode of enacting it, [269] has kept within the constitutional limits and observed the constitutional conditions. In any case in which this question is answered in the affirmative the courts are not at liberty to inquire into the proper exercise of the power. They must assume that legislative discretion has been properly exercised": Cooley Const. Lim. (7 ed.), p. 257.

A note to Com. v. Riley, Ann. Cas. 1912D at page 393, reads thus:

"It is generally held that a statute limiting the length of a day's labor is a valid exercise of the police power"—citing, among other cases, Ex parte Boyce, 27 Nev. 299, 75 Pac. 1; 1 Ann. Cas. 66, 65, L.R.A. 47; U. S. v. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. (D. C.) 189 Fed. 954; In re Martin, 157 Cal. 51, 106 Pac. 235, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 242; In re Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 124 Pac. 427; Inland Steel Co. v. Yedinak, 172 Ind. 423, 87 N. E. 229, 139 Am. St. Rep. 389; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. McWhirter, 145 Ky. 427, 140 S. W. 672; Withey v. Bloem, 163 Mich. 419, 128 N. W. 913, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 628; People v. Erie R. Co. 198

N. Y. 369, 91 N. E. 849, 139 Am. St. Rep. 828, 19 Ann. Cas. 811, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 240; Byars v. State, 2 Okla. Crim. 481, 102 Pac. 804, Ann. Cas. 1912A 765; State v. Somerville, 67 Wash. 638, 122 Pac. 324.

In Chicago v. Schmidinger, 243 Ill. 167, 90 N. E. 369, 17 Ann. Cas. 614, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 632, it was held that the bread ordinance of the City of Chicago which fixed the size of loaves and regulated the sale of bread was a valid exercise of the police power. And in Chicago v. Bowerman Dairy Co. 234 Ill. 294, 84 N. E. 913, 123 Am. St. Rep. 100, 14 Ann. Cas. 700, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 684, it was held that the regulation by the city of the sale of milk and cream in bottles and glass jars was a proper exercise of the police power.

[270] In Freund, Police Power, Section 310, it is stated:

"Legislation for the protection of labor which restrains individual liberty and property rights falls under the police power, but the object is not necessarily an economic one. The great mass of labor legislation is enacted in the interest of health and safety, and in factory and mining regulations we find, especially where women and young persons are concerned, provisions to promote decency and comfort. Laws of this character rest upon a clear and undisputed title of public power."

In Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606, 608, 609, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 323, 23 S. Ct. 168, 170, Mr. Justice Holmes uses this language:

"While the courts must exercise a judgment of their own, it by no means is true that every law is void which may seem to the judges who pass upon it excessive, unsuited to its ostensible end, or based upon conceptions of morality with which they disagree. Considerable latitude must be allowed for differences of view as well as for possible peculiar conditions which this court can know but imperfectly, if at all. Otherwise a Constitution, instead of embodying only relatively fundamental rules of right, as generally understood by all English-speaking communities, would become the partisan of a particular set of ethical or economical opinions, which by no means are held semper ubique et ab omnibus."

The restriction as to the hours of labor is in the same category as safe and sanitary regulations. The need of the restriction arises out of the employment and because of it. There is a real substantial relation between the need and the particular employment. It is therefore a proper police regulation.

The act in question is a human life, health, and welfare statute. While a penalty for a violation of its provisions is provided, it is remedial in its nature, and [271] should be given an interpretation in the interest of the public good, so as to carry out the legislative intent: State v. Ottawa, 84 Kan. 100, 113 Pac. 391, 394. Legislative regulation of the hours of labor of men and that of women differ only in the degree of necessity therefor. In the judgment of the legislature the interest of the public requires that no person be employed in any manufacturing establishment more than 10 hours in any one day, except watchmen, employees, engaged in making repairs, or in case of emergency. Obviously, in addition to the reasons declared in the law, it was in the legislative mind that the regular employment of persons for longer hours in factories where different kinds of machinery and facilities are operated under the present day high-pressure power would tend to increase the danger of accidents, and to a greater extent jeopardize life and limb, thereby increasing the demand for compensation for such injuries, a portion of which, under certain circumstances, would ultimately be borne by the state: See Industrial Act, chapter 112, Laws 1913, pp. 188, 198, § 20. It is worthy of note that in the latter act, filed in the office of the Secretary of State on the same date as the one in question, mills and factories in which machinery is used are classed as places of hazardous occupations: See § 13 of the act.

Another consideration not without weight is that suggested in the preamble to the act, which discloses, among other things, that the working of any person more than 10 hours a day in any mill, factory, or manufacturing establishment "tends to prevent him from acquiring that degree of intelligence that is necessary to make him a useful and desirable citizen of the state." While labor is heaven's first law and a reasonable amount of physical exertion is salutary, it is [272] an undeniable fact that prolonged and excessive physical labor is performed at the expense of the mental powers, and it requires no argument to show that a man who day in and day out labors more than 10 hours must not only deteriorate physically, but mentally. The safety of a country depends upon the intelligence of its citizens, and if our institutions are to be preserved and the state must see to it that the citizen shall have some leisure which he may employ in fitting himself for those duties which are the highest attributes of good citizenship. As a voter, a juror, and, in this state, as a legislator, the best results can only be attained by so limiting the hours of toil that they may not be unduly prolonged to the extent of causing that mental deterioration that is sure to accompany undue and long-continued physical exertion. In view of the well-known fact that the custom in our industries does not sanction a longer service than 10 hours per day, it cannot be held, as a matter of law, that the legislative requirement is unreasonable or arbitrary as to hours of labor. Statistics show that the average daily working time among workmen in different countries is, in Australia, 8 hours; in Great Britain, 9; in the United States, 9½; in Denmark, 9½; in Norway, 10; Sweden, France, and Switzerland, 10½; Germany, 10½; Belgium, Italy, and Austria, 11; and in Russia, 12 hours: Lochner v. New York, 198 U. S. 45, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 937, 25 S. Ct. 539, 3 Ann. Cas. 1141.

In order to warrant declaring the act violative of the fundamental law, it should be shown that in the light of the world's experience and common knowledge the act under consideration is palpably and beyond reasonable doubt one that will not tend to protect or conserve the public peace, health, or welfare in its enforcement. It is by no means clear beyond a reasonable [273] doubt that the law will not promote the peace, health, and general welfare of citizens of the state, or that longer hours of labor in factories would not be injurious to the health as declared by the act, or that the act is repugnant to the Constitution. The presumption, therefore, is in favor of the wisdom and the correctness of the legislative finding and determination that the law is a necessity for the protection of the health, well-being, and general welfare of the public; that the regulation prescribed by the enactment will tend to correct the evil at which it is aimed. The courts cannot set aside the legislative decree without intrenching upon the prerogatives of a co-ordinate branch of the state government, and usurping the powers of the legislature.

The law does not prevent the laborer from working as many hours per day as he sees fit, and does not violate his right to labor as long as he may desire, but only prohibits his being employed in any mill, factory, or manufacturing establishment more than a certain number of hours in any one day: Com. v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 120 Mass. 383, and cases there cited. It is urged by the learned counsel for defendant that if it is possible for the legislature to make the declaration that to work in a factory more than 10 hours in one day is injurious to the health, then that body can make four hours a day's work, and require two hours of the work to be performed before 8 o'clock A. M. It is sufficient to say that the question of four hours constituting a day's labor, or when any part of it shall be done, is not now before this court. When our journey has so far progressed as to arrive at that bridge, if it ever does, it will then be an opportune time to cross it. We have, however, already adverted to the rule that the governmental [274] power in question cannot be made an excuse for arbitrary, unreasonable, or oppressive legislation.

The act applies to all the people of the state who employ labor in mills, factories, or manufacturing establishments. In the very nature of things the occupations affected by the law furnish a reasonable basis for the statutory regulation. In the light of the former decisions of this court the classification is not unreasonable: In re Oberg, 21 Ore. 406, 28 Pac. 130, 14 L.R.A. 577; State v. Frazier, 36 Ore. 178, 59 Pac. 5; State v. Thompson, 47 Ore. 492, 84 Pac. 476, 8 Ann. Cas. 646, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 480; State v. Muller, 48 Ore. 252, 85 Pac. 855, 120 Am. St. Rep. 805, 11 Ann. Cas. 88, 208 U. S. 412, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 551, 13 Ann. Cas. 957, 28 S. Ct. 324. See, also, Com. v. Riley, 210 Mass. 394, 97 N. E. 370, Ann. Cas. 1912D 388.

8. It is contended by counsel for defendant that the provision for employees to work overtime not to exceed three hours in any one day, conditioned that payment be made for said overtime at the rate of time and one half the regular wage, renders the whole act void. It is clear that the intent of the law is to make 10 hours a regular day's labor in the occupations to which reference is made. Apparently the provisions permitting labor for the overtime on express conditions were made in order to facilitate the enforcement of the law, and in the nature of a mild penalty for employing one not more than three hours overtime. It might be regarded as more difficult to detect violations of the law by an employment for a shorter time than for a longer time. This penalty also goes to the employee in case the employer avails himself of the overtime clause. Reasonable modes of enforcing a statute should be upheld: Fisher v. McGirr, 1 Gray [275] (Mass.), 1, 61 Am. Dec. 381; Com. v. Riley, 210 Mass. at page 394, 97 N. E. at page 370, Ann. Cas. 1912D 388, at page 392, where Mr. Chief Justice Rugg says:

"When the constitutionality of the statute limiting the hours of labor of women is settled, the means by which the aim of the statute may be forwarded within reasonable bounds are matters for legislative determination."

Legislative provisions are frequently made that a portion of a fine for the infraction of a statute shall be paid to the informer. The aim of the statute is to fix the maximum hours of service in certain industries. The act makes no attempt to fix the standard of wages. No maximum or minimum wage is named. That is left wholly to the contracting parties.

The statute under which the complaint is made in this case is not violative of the Constitution of the United States or of this state. As a consequence, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Affirmed.
Ann. Cas. 1916C.—64.

Eakin, J., took no part in the consideration of this case.

Rehearing denied July 7, 1914.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that a statute limiting the length of a day's labor is valid, although it is restricted to persons employed in mills, factories and manufacturing establishments. It holds also that such an act is not invalidated by a proviso permitting employees to work overtime not to exceed three hours a day at one and one-half times the regular wage. The cases discussing the validity of a statute limiting the length of a day's labor are reviewed in the notes to Ex parte Boyce, 1 Ann. Cas. 66; State v. Muller, 11 Ann. Cas. 88; Muller v. Oregon, 13 Ann. Cas. 957; Com. v. Riley, Ann. Cas. 1912D 388; Booth v. People, 78 Am. St. Rep. 243.

v.

CASSIDY ET AL.

New York Court of Appeals—January 12, 1915.

213 N. Y. 388; 107 N. E. 718.

Conspiracy — Acts and Declarations of Co-conspirators Admissible.

Where evidence of a conspiracy has been given to make the question of its existence one for the jury, any evidence of the acts and declarations of the conspirators in furtherance of the common purpose is competent, and it is unnecessary that the conspiracy should be charged in the indictment to make the proof competent.

[See 3 Am. St. Rep. 486; 5 R. C. L. tit. Conspiracy, p. 1089.]

Same.

Where, on the trial of C., a political leader, for selling a nomination to W. for a public office there was evidence sufficient to make a question of the existence of a conspiracy between C., W. and a third person to bring about the nomination of W., the testimony of a witness as to what W. said to him after W. and C. and the third person had conferred about the nomination, and later at the time he procured a loan for W. on a note, and before the money was paid over to him, is admissible.

Evidence — Relevancy — Rebutting Inference.

Where there is testimony justifying an inference that a portion of the amount subsequently borrowed by W. was used by him to discharge the note, evidence of the payment of the note by W.'s brother, limited to contradict the inference, is admissible.

Same.

Where evidence is elicited on cross-examination from which an inference of a fact favorable to accused may be drawn, subsequent evidence of other facts showing that the inference is not warranted is competent and material.

Witnesses — Privilege against Self-Crimination — Scope.

The personal privilege guaranteed by Const. art. 1, § 6, against self-incrimination cannot be asserted unless the person to whom the privilege is given is subject to criminal prosecution or a forfeiture, though the constitutional provision must receive a broad construction in favor of the right which it is intended to secure.

[See 75 Am. St. Rep. 318.]

Waiver of Privilege.

The personal privilege against self-incrimination guaranteed by Const. art. 1, § 6, may be waived in any case by the person offering himself as a witness, and, when the privilege is waived, the person is subject to cross-examination like any other witness.

Effect of Waiver — Subsequent Proceeding.

A person cannot waive the privilege against self-incrimination guaranteed by Const. art. 1, § 6, and give testimony to his advantage or the advantage of his friends, and at the same time and in the same proceeding assert his privilege to answer questions to his disadvantage or to the disadvantage of his friends, but a waiver of the privilege cannot extend to new and independent proceedings, where the circumstances, surroundings, and prospective criminal charges are different.

[See note at end of this case.]

Immunity as to Self-Criminating Testimony.

Penal Law (Consol. Laws, c. 40) § 770, declaring that a person committing offenses against the elective franchise is a competent witness against another person so offending, and may be compelled to testify, but the testimony shall not be used in any prosecution or proceeding, civil or criminal, against him, provides for immunity, and one may be compelled to testify, but his testimony cannot be used against him unless he has previously waived his right to claim immunity.

Effect of Waiver of Privilege — Subsequent Proceeding.

One who voluntarily testified before a Supreme Court justice, investigating a charge in connection with a nomination of a candidate by a judicial convention for a public office, and who expressly waived immunity, did not thereby waive his constitutional right to decline to give testimony on the trial of one subsequently indicted for crime in connection with the nomination, because one who is entitled to the constitutional protection is so entitled in each new and independent proceeding, for otherwise he would subject himself to a new cross-examination and be required, under new and changed conditions, to give testimony that might not have been anticipated or intended in subjecting himself to examination in the prior and different proceeding.

People v. Cassidy, 164 N. Y. App. Div. 15, affirmed.

People v. Walter, 164 N. Y. App. Div. 25, reversed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Second Judicial Department.

Criminal action. Joseph Cassidy and Louis T. Walter, Jr., convicted in Trial Term of Supreme Court, Kings county, of making, tendering, and offering to procure and cause nomination to public office on payment and contribution of valuable consideration. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED as to defendant Cassidy, and REVERSED as to defendant Walter.

Robert H. Elder for appellant Cassidy.

Robert M. Moore for appellant Walter.

James C. Cropsey, Hersey Egginton and Ralph E. Hemstreet for respondent.

[391] CHASE, J.—The defendant Cassidy in this case based his motion in arrest of judgment upon the ground, among others, that the indictment did not state facts sufficient to constitute a crime. In this respect the record on his appeal differs from the record in the Willett appeal. The judgment of the Appellate Division affirming the judgment of the trial court as against the defendant Cassidy was unanimous. Most of the questions presented on this appeal by the defendant Cassidy, and on which he claims that the judgment should be reversed, have been discussed in the opinion in the case of People v. Willett, 213 N. Y. 368, 107 N. E. 707, the decision in which case is handed down herewith.

When sufficient evidence of a common design and purpose amounting to a conspiracy has been given to make the question one for the jury, any evidence of the acts and declarations of the conspirators in furtherance of the common purpose is competent. In a case like this it is not necessary in order to make such proof competent that the conspiracy should be charged in the indictment. (People v. McKane, 143 N. Y. 455, 38 N. E. 950.) There is evidence in this case sufficient to make the question whether the defendants and one Willett unlawfully conspired to bring about the nomination of Willett for the office of justice of the Supreme Court in the Democratic judicial convention for the second judicial district in 1911 one of fact. The testimony of Merrill as to what Willett said to him after Willett and defendants had conferred about the nomination, and October 23d, at the time he procured a loan of $5,000 for Willett on a thirty-day note, and before the money was paid over to him, was not error in view of the agreement which the jury had a right to find was entered into by and between Willett and the defendants herein, relating to the nomination.

[392] The testimony as to the payment of the note by Willett's brother was also properly received, because of the fact that testimony had then been elicited from which as stated by the Appellate Division in their opinion, the jury could have been asked to draw the inference that a portion of the amount subsequently borrowed by Willett was used by him to discharge the $5,000 thirty-day obligation which came due in the latter part of October and thus account for some of the moneys borrowed by him. The evidence as to the payment of the note by Willett's brother was expressly limited by the court for use in contradiction of such inference.

When upon the trial of an action evidence is elicited on cross-examination from which an inference as to a fact favorable to a defendant may be drawn, subsequent evidence of other facts or circumstances showing that the inference sought to be drawn is not warranted becomes competent and material. (People v. Buchanan, 145 N. Y. 1, 24, 39 N. E. 846; People v. Zigouras, 163 N. Y. 250, 255, 57 N. E. 465.)

The defendants criticise in many ways the charge made by the court to the jury. Most of such criticisms have been answered by what has been said in this opinion and in the Willett opinion. Taken in its entirety, we do not think that the charge was prejudicial to the defendant Cassidy.

A question has been raised by the defendant Walter that does not apply to the defendant Cassidy. It is of supreme importance to Walter.

After the nominating convention referred to in the indictment and information was presented to Supreme Court Justice Scudder, charging that a crime had been committed in connection with the nomination of candidates at such judicial convention, witnesses were sworn and examined before said justice in Queens county, and the defendant Walter appeared voluntarily and offered himself as a witness. He expressly waived immunity and was also told that any testimony that he might give [393] could be used against him at any time thereafter. He was sworn and gave testimony on the day of such appearance and also at an adjourned day. On a day to which the proceeding was subsequently adjourned he was duly subpoenaed and attended pursuant to such subpoena. In response to the justice he said that the testimony that he had given was given voluntarily, but that if he gave any further testimony he would expect immunity. He was not called as a witness on such adjourned day, but was compelled to sign a transcript of the testimony that he had voluntarily given as stated. The result of the Queens county proceeding was the discharge of the persons there charged with crime. (People v. Quinn, 150 App. Div. 813, 135 N. Y. S. 477.) Sometime thereafter an investigation was conducted by the grand jury of Kings county and an indictment was found in Kings county against Willett and a separate joint indictment against Cassidy and Walter. The indictment against Willett was first tried and a few days thereafter the indictment against Cassidy and Walter was tried. The appeal now under consideration by this court is from the judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court affirming the judgment convicting the defendants of the crime found pursuant to the indictment in Kings county. on the Willett trial Walter was called as a witness by the People, but declined to testify on the ground that his testimony might tend to convict him of a crime. He was compelled to attend and testify in that case and was examined at great length therein. On the trial of the joint indictment against him and Cassidy, Walter pleaded giving his testimony as a witness in the Willett trial in bar of his prosecution under the indictment.

The fifth article or amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and section 6 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state provide that no person shall "be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." The constitutional provisions quoted gave [394] expression to public sentiment. Public sentiment on the subject grew out of an abhorrence of the inquisitorial rack. The personal privilege became a part of the common law of England and has been made secure by constitutional provision in the Federal and most of the State Constitutions. The constitutional provisions must have a broad construction in favor of the right which it was intended to secure. (Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 12 S. Ct. 195, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 1110.) It is a privilege, but a privilege that cannot be asserted unless the person to whom the privilege is given is subject to criminal prosecution or forfeiture. It cannot be asserted in a case where the person offered as a witness has been tried upon the charge and acquitted, nor in a case where the Statute of Limitations has run against the crime or where full pardon has been granted covering the alleged criminality. (Wigmore on Evidence, sections 2279, 2280.) It can be waived in any case by the person offering himself as a witness. When the privilege is so waived the person becomes subject to cross-examination the same as any other witness examined in the case. (Brandon v. People, 42 N. Y. 265; Connors v. People, 50 N. Y. 240; People v. Tice, 131 N. Y. 651, 30 N. E. 494, 15 L.R.A. 669; People v. Webster, 139 N. Y. 73, 84, 34 N. E. 730; Fitzpatrick v. U. S. 178 U. S. 304, 20 S. Ct. 944, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 1078; People v. Casey, 72 N. Y. 393.)

A person cannot waive his privilege under the constitutional provisions and give testimony to his advantage, or the advantage of his friends, and at the same time and in the same proceeding assert his privilege and refuse to answer questions that are to his disadvantage or the disadvantage of his friends. A confidential communication once published to the world cannot be recalled. The seal of confidence, once broken, remains broken forever. (People v. Bloom, 193 N. Y. 1, 15 Ann. Cas. 932, 85 N. E. 824, 127 Am. St. Rep. 931, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 898.) The giving of testimony by a person that can be used in a criminal case against him like disclosing conversations between persons occupying confidential relations, makes it thereafter impossible to recall the admission or the disclosures resulting from the evidence.

[395] The admissions made by a person who gives testimony in court of a transaction without asserting his constitutional privilege cannot be recalled, but the waiver of the privilege does not by any fair reasoning extend to new and independent proceedings where the circumstances, surroundings and prospective criminal charges may be entirely different. A person who is entitled to the benefit of the constitutional provisions is so entitled in each new and independent proceeding, otherwise he would subject himself to a new cross-examination and be required under new and changed conditions to give testimony that may not have been anticipated or intended in subjecting himself to examination as a witness in a prior and different proceeding.

The defendant Walter's examination in the Willett trial subjected him to a general cross-examination and exposed him to such charges as might result from a new, complete and adverse examination in a criminal case in which his testimony was apparently deemed important in order to convict one who was charged with him in the violation of the elective franchise. It is provided by section 770 of the Penal Law as follows: "A person offending against any section of this article is a competent witness against another person so offending and may be compelled to attend and testify on any trial, hearing or proceeding or investigation in the same manner, as any other person. The testimony so given shall not be used in any prosecution or proceeding, civil or criminal, against the person testifying. Any such person testifying shall not thereafter be liable to indictment, prosecution or punishment for the offense with reference to which his testimony was given, and may plead or prove the giving of testimony accordingly, in bar of such an indictment or prosecution."

Under this section of the Penal Law Walter was obliged to testify and, having testified, the statute expressly provides for immunity. The immunity is not [396] disputed unless Walter by testifying in the examination before Justice Scudder waived all right thereafter to claim of immunity.

Wigmore in his work on Evidence (Section 2276, page 3158) says: "The waiver involved in the accused taking the stand is limited to the particular proceeding in which he thus volunteers testimony. His voluntary testimony before a coroner's inquest or a grand jury or other preliminary and separate proceeding is therefore not a waiver for the main trial; nor is his testimony at a first trial a waiver for later trial."

The weight of authority is against the claim of the People that Walter by giving testimony before Justice Scudder waived his constitutional right to decline to give testimony on the trial of Willett that could be used against him in a criminal case. (Emery v. State, 101 Wis. 627, 78 N. W. 145; Overend v. Superior Court, 131 Cal. 280, 63 Pac. 372; State v. Burrell, 27 Mont. 282, 70 Pac. 982; Temple v. Com. 75 Va. 882; Cullen v. Com. 24 Grat. (Va.) 624; In re Mark, 146 Mich. 714, 110 N. W. 61; Samuel v. People, 164 Ill. 379, 45 N. E. 728; Georgia R. etc. Co. v. Lybrend, 99 Ga. 421, 27 S. E. 794; Miskimins v. Shaver, 8 Wyo. 392, 58 Pac. 411, 49 L.R.A. 831 Boston Marine Ins. Co. v. Slocovitich, 55 Super. Ct. 452, 14 N. Y. St. Rep. 718; Cullinan v. Quinn, 85 App. Div. 492, 88 N. Y. S. 963; *Com. v. The judgment of conviction as against the defendant Cassidy should be affirmed, and the judgment of conviction as against the defendant Walter should be reversed, and the defendant Walter discharged.

Judgment accordingly.

NOTE.

Waiver by Witness of Constitutional Privilege as Extending to Subsequent Trial or Proceeding.

General Rule.

It is well settled that a person who has waived his constitutional privilege of refusing to give self-incriminating testimony in a trial or proceeding is not estopped from asserting the privilege as to the same matter in a subsequent trial or proceeding. Overend v. Superior Court, 131 Cal. 280, 63 Pac. 372; Georgia R. etc. Co. v. Lybrend, 99 Ga. 421, 27 S. E. 794; Samuel v. People, 164 Ill. 379, 45 N. E. 728; Com. v. Phoenix Hotel Co. 157 Ky. 180, 162 S. W. 823; In re Mark, 146 Mich. 714, 110 N. W. 61, 13 Detroit Leg. N. 917; Boston Marine Ins. Co. v. Slocovitch, 55 Super. Ct. 452, 14 N. Y. St. Rep. 452; Cullen v. Com. 24 Grat. (Va.) 624; Temple v. Com. 75 Va. 892; Emery v. State, 101 Wis. 627, 78 N. W. 145; State v. Lloyd, 152 Wis. 24, Ann. Cas. 1914C 415, 139 N. W. 514; Miskimmins v. Shaver, 8 Wyo. 392, 58 Pac. 411, 49 L.R.A. 831. And see the reported case. See also State v. Burrell, 27 Mont. 282, 70 Pac. 982; Cullinan v. Quinn, 95 App. Div. 492, 88 N. Y. S. 963. Compare State v. Van Winkle, 80 Ia. 15, 45 N. W. 388; State v. Simmons, 78 Kan. 852, 98 Pac. 277. "A witness is not estopped by his previous statements, voluntarily made, either in court or out of it, from claiming his privilege when introduced as a witness. The privilege attaches to the witness in each particular case in which he may be called on to testify, and whether or not he may claim his privilege is to be determined without reference to what he said when testifying as a witness on some other trial, or on a former trial of the same case, and without reference to his declarations at some other time or place." Com. v. Phoenix Hotel Co. 157 Ky. 180, 162 S. W. 823.

"It has, it is true, been very justly held that if a witness, being fully aware of his right to maintain silence, nevertheless voluntarily enters upon a partial disclosure concerning matters as to which he could claim his privilege, he will be deemed to have waived it, and may be compelled by a rigid cross-examination to disclose the whole truth regarding such matters. The reason of this rule is, that a witness cannot arbitrarily in part waive, and in part reserve, his privilege for the purpose of becoming a partisan in the case, revealing only so much of the truth as will benefit one of the parties, and asserting his privilege when interrogated as to facts which would cut the other way. . . . There is, however, no necessity or reason for extending this rule to cover a case where a witness voluntarily testifies as to privileged matters upon one trial, and subsequently, at a second and entirely different trial, claims his privilege of giving no testimony whatever in regard thereto. The second trial is a de novo investigation before another jury, whose duty it is to consider the case in the light only of the evidence adduced at that hearing; and to allow the witness to assert his privilege could result in no undue advantage or injustice to either party to the cause." Georgia R. etc. Co. v. Lybrend, 99 Ga. 421, 27 S. E. 794.

Application of Rule.

In Samuel v. People, 164 Ill. 379, 45 N. E. 728, it was contended that a witness who caused a prosecution to be commenced by his voluntary act of swearing to the truth of an information thereby waived his right to insist on his privilege not to answer a question on the ground that the answer would incriminate him or expose him to a penal liability, when called on to testify at the trial subsequently taking place. The court said: "The privilege in question is a constitutional right, of which the citizen cannot be deprived by either legislatures or courts. . . . It cannot be regarded as released or waived by some disclosure, which he may have made elsewhere and under other circumstances. If the answer to a question put to him as a witness upon the stand might tend to criminate him, it would not tend any the less to do so because he had elsewhere made a statement having such a tendency. The question is not as to what he may have previously said in an affidavit, but the question is whether the disclosure he is asked to make as a witness upon the trial of the case will have a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge or penalty. We are of the opinion that his constitutional right in this regard is not abridged or waived by the fact of making the ex parte affidavit indorsed upon the information filed by the prosecuting attorney." In Overend v. Superior Court, 131 Cal. 280, 63 Pac. 372, the court in holding to be void an order declaring a witness guilty of contempt said: "It appears that the trial court based its judgments of contempt largely upon the ground that the witness had, without objection, testified at the preliminary examination of Minnie Campbell, and for that reason had waived his right to refuse to testify at the trial upon the ground that his evidence would tend to convict him of a felony. The position of the trial court in this regard is untenable." In Georgia R. etc. Co. v. Lybrend, 99 Ga. 421, 27 S. E. 794, it was contended that a waiver of the privilege to refuse to give self incriminating evidence by a party as a witness binds him in a subsequent trial of the same cause. The court said: "It was urged, however, that the waiver was binding upon him, because he was not simply a witness but a party to the case. This cannot be a sound position. A party often waives at one trial what he has an undoubted right to object to at a subsequent hearing of the same case. For instance, he may permit irrelevant testimony to be introduced, or may allow the contents of a writing to be proved by parol without accounting for the paper, or he may allow an unrecorded deed to go in evidence without proof of its execution. Surely, it cannot be said that because he does these, or similar things, at one investigation, he is until the end of that particular case estopped from making objections he had formerly chosen not to urge. We therefore conclude that Lybrend's right as a witness to decline answering the objectionable questions was not lost because, as a party swearing in his own behalf, he had on a previous trial answered similar questions without objection." In Cullen v. Com. 24 Grat. (Va.) 624, it was held that where a witness testified before a coroner's inquest to facts criminating him without being warned, there was no waiver of his privilege and that on a subsequent trial he could assert his privilege. The court said: "But it has been earnestly argued that this is not a proper case to recognize the privilege, because the witness has already made elsewhere a full and voluntary disclosure of the facts, and that nothing he could now say would do more to criminate him than has been done already by that statement. Conceding this to be so, we are by no means prepared to say that it answers the claim of the witness to his privilege. If, as we have held to be the case, a full disclosure of the facts might tend to criminate the witness, we cannot see how that tendency is at all removed by showing that the witness had elsewhere made a statement tending to criminate him. The question before us is not what the witness may have said elsewhere; but whether, when it is apparent that a disclosure from him may tend to criminate him, he shall now, in a pending trial, be compelled to make that disclosure, although he claims his constitutional right of refusal. We do not see that his statements elsewhere have anything to do with the question. They are matters of fact wholly collateral, on which issues might be taken. . . . Without deciding that a witness can be held in any case to have waived his privilege by answering before a different tribunal, we are clearly of opinion that there has been no such waiver in this case." In Temple v. Com. 75 Va. 892, which followed Cullen v. Com. supra, it was said: "These sound views of Judge Bouldin may be applied verbatim et literatim to the case before us. The only difference is that in Cullen's case the disclosure was made before a coroner's inquest, and in the other before a grand jury. In principle there is no difference between the two cases. So I think there is nothing in the fact that Temple had already testified before the grand jury—and especially in view of the circumstances under which he was brought before the grand jury, and in view of the further fact, that after he was in jail, held as a witness, he consulted counsel, who advised him that his testimony in court would criminate himself." In Boston Marine Ins. Co. v. Sloocovitch, 55 Super. Ct. (N. Y.) 452, a ruling declaring to be incompetent a deposition which showed that at another trial a witness had given evidence which was a waiver of the privilege to refuse to testify which the witness claimed, was upheld. The court said: "We think that there was no error in this ruling. The witness had not waived his privilege by testifying on another occasion, nor was what he had testified to on another occasion admissible as evidence on this trial. The testimony given by the witness on the former examination could only be used for the purpose of contradicting the testimony given by him on this examination or of refreshing his memory, neither of which contingencies existed on this trial."

State v. Van Winkle, 80 Ia. 15, 45 N. W. 388, cannot be said to be directly opposed to the general doctrine. In that case it appeared that during the trial a witness refused to answer a question on the ground that the answer would incriminate him and the refusal being sustained by the court the witness was retired. Without any further proceedings intervening the witness was recalled when objection was made by the attorneys of the defendant to the testimony because the witness had claimed his privilege, but the objection was overruled. The court in upholding the ruling said: "The court held that the privilege was personal to the witness; that the defendant could not claim it in his favor; that it appeared from the records of the court that the witness testified before the grand jury in this case, and there disclosed what he claimed to know about it, without claiming his privilege; therefore he ought not to be permitted to claim it here. These rulings are fully supported by the authorities. . . . The only reason for excluding this testimony is, that the witness claimed his privilege. Had he waived his privilege, and testified, the defendant had no grounds for objecting. If his privilege was denied him wrongfully, the wrong was to the witness, and not to the defendant, and the testimony was admissible as to the defendant, though it might not thereafter be used against the witness."

V.

STATE EX REL. HOGAN

Ohio Supreme Court—June 26, 1914.

90 Ohio St. 363; 107 N. E. 758.

Insurance — Burial Contract.

Contracts under which an undertaker agreed, in consideration of the payment of monthly interest on so-called mutual notes issued by him during the lives of the makers, that he would provide them with respectable funerals, are contracts of insurance, rendering the undertaker, in the transaction of such insurance business, subject to regulation by the insurance department, under Gen. Code, § 670.

[See note at end of this case.]

Error to Court of Appeals. Franklin county.

Quo warranto proceeding. Timothy S. Hogan, relator, and John Renschler, defendant. Judgment for relator. Defendant brings error. The facts are state in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Aaline, Betts & Kerns for plaintiff in error.

Timothy S. Hogan, Frank Davis, Jr., and Chas. J. Pretzman for defendant in error.

[363] BY THE COURT.—In February of 1913, the relator, Timothy S. Hogan, attorney general of Ohio, filed his petition in quo warranto in the court of appeals of Franklin county against John Renschler, resident of Hancock county, Ohio, charging the [364] respondent with unlawfully exercising the franchise and privilege of writing life insurance.

It appears from the agreed statement of facts set forth in the record that the respondent, Renschler, was, at the time of the institution of this action and at the time of making the contracts hereinafter mentioned, engaged as an individual in the undertaking business in the city of Findlay, Hancock county, Ohio; that in connection with such business and to further its volume, Renschler, during the last two years, not acting as a corporation, partnership, firm or association, or as the agent or member of any such, but wholly in his individual capacity as a natural person, entered into certain written contracts with certain other parties, of the following nature:

The contract was termed a mutual note whereby the party of first part promised to pay to respondent during the natural life of first party the sum of fifteen cents (termed "interest") on or before the 10th of each month in advance. The face value of the note varied from $50 to $100. The contract or note provides that if the said first party be not in default at time of his or her death, the second party, Renschler, agrees to furnish funeral for said first party.

There are many stipulations in the so-called mutual note, among which are these provisions:

1. That any person in good health from one to sixty years of age can purchase one note as follows: one to ten years of age shall pay eight cents interest per month on a $50-note contract; ten to sixty years of age shall pay fifteen cents interest per month on a $100-note contract.

[365] 2. The object of the note is to provide the holder with a respectable burial, such funeral to be furnished and conducted by the respondent his heirs or assigns only.

3. After period of one year's payments has been completed, the holder may discontinue payments and will receive a credit slip, which slip may be applied on his or her funeral expenses, provided the funeral be conducted by respondent.

4. Note not payable in cash and redeemable for its face in such goods as handled by the respondent to be selected by his or her heirs, or friends making funeral arrangements.

5. If holder of note was not in good health at time of issue or if obtained through fraud, it shall be deemed void.

It further appears from the agreed statement of facts that the respondent has entered into a number of such contracts, all, however, confined to the territory within which he operates as undertaker; that he is receiving monthly payments, termed "interest," on mutual notes from many parties, both young and old, and has been ready, able and willing to comply with the terms of the contract, and as an individual undertaker has in fact complied with the terms thereof on the death of any holder of such mutual note and is now furnishing funeral outfits whenever any of the holders of such notes decess.

It is also made to appear that the respondent has never applied for or received any license or permission to transact any insurance business, from the superintendent of insurance of Ohio; or from [366] any other officer or branch of the state government, nor has he made any report of the nature or extent of his business to the said insurance department.

In February, 1914, the court of appeals of Franklin county, on the foregoing agreed facts, entered its decree of ouster against the respondent, and error was thereupon prosecuted by respondent to this court.

Held: The so-called mutual note is clearly insurance. By all the tests to which the contract may be subjected, it unerringly leads one to the conclusion that the intention of the parties was on the one hand to receive and no other to provide a fund to pay the burial expenses of the insured.

The contract being naked insurance and nothing else, it is subject to regulation by the insurance department. State v. Wichita Mut. Burial Ass'n, 73 Kan. 181, 84 Pac. 757; Fikes v. State, 87 Miss. 251, 39 So. 783; State v. Willett, 171 Ind. 296, 86 N. E. 68, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 197; Guenther on Insurance, section 191; I May on Insurance (4th ed.) section 27; Robbins v. Hennessey, 86 Ohio St. 181, 99 N. E. 319.

Even if individuals, acting as purely natural persons, can carry on the business of insurance and exercise the functions of such, they must comply with all of the laws of

Ohio on the subject of life insurance, Section 670, General Code, reading: "The provisions herein relating to the superintendent of insurance shall apply to all persons, companies and associations, whether incorporated or not, engaged in the business of insurance."

It may well be questioned whether a franchise of this character, which by its very nature presupposes perpetuity, could be granted to an individual. [367] See Robbins v. Hennessey, 86 Ohio St. 181, 99 N. E. 319; State v. Ackerman, 51 Ohio St. 163, 37 N. E. 828, 24 L.R.A. 298. But if it be granted that Section 670, General Code, above quoted, would authorize the issuing of such a franchise to an individual, such individual would be bound by all the restrictions and requirements of an incorporated company.

To hold otherwise would work a far-reaching hardship on that part of our population most needful of the protection of the state and lead to a recrudescence of the old wildcat insurance days, now happily a thing of the past.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

Burial Insurance.

The reported case holds that a contract whereby one party is to be buried at the expense of the other, in consideration of a sum paid in installments during the life of the beneficiary, is a contract of insurance and that a person cannot make such a contract without complying with the restrictions imposed on insurance companies. That decision is in accord with what appears to be the only other case passing directly on the point. State v. Globe Casket, etc. Co. 82 Wash. 124, 143 Pac. 878, L.R.A. 1915B 976. In that case the facts were stated by the court as follows: "The appellant has not, in so far as the pleadings disclose, engaged in the general undertaking business, nor has it engaged in the manufacture or sale of general burial supplies, or acquired any of the named facilities therefor. Its business is confined solely to the sale of the certificates named in its articles, and the performance, through the agency of others, of the obligations assumed thereby. These certificates are in two forms. In the one, the corporation agrees, on the death of the holder, to take charge of the burial of said holder, and provide the necessary furnishing and materials therefor to the value of one hundred ($100) dollars, as follows: One black broadcloth, white or plush colored casket; one outside box for casket; one hearse; two carriages; one burial robe; necessary embalming; necessary accessories; and services of funeral director.' The other is similar in form, with the exception that it does not name the value of the furnishings, and provides that the corporation will take charge of the funeral of the holder 'on the surrender of this receipt,' and will furnish the hearse and two carriages in places only where they are obtainable. Sales of the certificates are made through the agency of solicitors, on the installment plan. An applicant is required to sign a written application according to a form provided by the corporation. In this form is given a somewhat minute description of the applicant, his age, date and cause of his last illness, and his present condition of health, which the applicant warrants and declares to be true. His application is subject to the approval of the corporation. If approved, and the first installment is paid, the applicant is given a 'contract . . . as binding on the company as the certificate, provided payments are made according to contract.' When the installments are fully paid, the contract is taken up and one or the other of the certificates before mentioned is issued him. The cost of a certificate is not shown, although it is alleged that the sum collected in each case is a certain fixed sum." Passing on the nature of the contract the court said: "The contract evidenced by the certificate has all of the elements of a life insurance contract. It is an agreement to perform a service which can become obligatory only on the death of the certificate holder. While no beneficiary of the promise is named, in reality one exists, and may be ascertained with as much certainty as if directly and specifically named. It is the person who would otherwise be obligated to pay the expenses of the burial. This may be the heir or estate of the decedent, his relatives, or the state; but whoever such person may be, he is relieved of his obligation to the extent of the value of the service agreed to be performed by the terms of the certificate. There is, therefore, a promise by one person to perform a valuable service on the death of another, a valuable consideration paid for the promise, and a person to whom the benefit of the promise will inure. Had the ordinary nomenclature been used to designate the person making the promise, the person to whom the promise is made, the person who will receive the benefit of the promise, and the consideration paid for the promise, no one would question that it was an insurance contract. But a contract is to be determined from its nature and effect, not by the terminology used to characterize it. Here there is an 'insurer,' an 'insured,' a 'premium,' and a 'beneficiary,' and we think the contract nothing else than a plan, ordinary insurance contract. Again, the contract is not one that the courts will strain the laws to uphold. It is freighted with the greatest possibilities for fraud. Since the corporation was organized under the general incorporation laws, it could enter upon its business when its capital stock was all subscribed. It is not required to have or keep any paid up capital. Its duration is limited to fifty years. The officers of the corporation may handle and dispose of the funds received in payment of the certificates in any manner they please. It is certain that many of these certificates will not be ripe for redemption for a number of years, and it is reasonably certain that some of them will survive the life of the corporation itself. If, therefore, the company were permitted to continue the business, and all, or any considerable proportion, of these certificates were ever redeemed, it would be a consummation unique in human experience."

This note does not discuss the status of mutual benefit associations formed for the purpose of providing burial for their members, or of insurance contracts whereby a sum of money is to be paid to the beneficiary for the funeral expenses of the insured.

STATE EX REL. FISHBACK

v.

UNIVERSAL SERVICE AGENCY.

Washington Supreme Court—September 25, 1915.

87 Wash. 413; 151 Pac. 748.

Insurance — What Constitutes Insurance Contract.

Where a corporation contracts with its subscribers to procure for them medical services, drugs, and merchandise, at a relatively low rate, not guaranteeing performance by the individuals who are to furnish services and goods, such corporation is not engaged in the insurance business subjecting it to the authority of the insurance commissioners, since by Laws 1911, p. 161 (the Insurance Code), "insurance" is a contract whereby one party, called the "insurer," for a consideration, undertakes to pay money or its equivalent, or to do an act valuable to another party, called the "insured," or his beneficiary, upon the happening of the hazard or peril insured against, whereby the party insured or his beneficiary suffers loss or injury, while in the instant case there is no hazard or peril whereby the purchasers of contracts may suffer a loss or injury which the corporation insures against.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yakima county: PREBLE, Judge.

Action to forfeit corporate franchise. H. O. Fishback, relator, and Universal Service Agency, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Relator appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

The Attorney General, John M. Wilson and L. L. Thompson for appellant.

Wilson & Hatfield for respondent.

[414] FULLERTON, J.—This action was instituted on the relation of the insurance commissioner of the state of Washington against the Universal Service Agency, a corporation, organized under the laws of this state, to forfeit its corporate franchise and wind up its affairs. A demurrer was interposed and sustained to the complaint, and from an adverse judgment rendered thereon, the relator appeals. The grievance specially complained of in the complaint is that the respondent corporation has been, and is now, doing an insurance business without complying with the statutes regulating the doing of such business. The nature of the business conducted by the respondent can best be illustrated by setting forth the actual transactions, and this we do, although necessitating quotations from the complaint at a somewhat tedious length.

As initiatory of its business, the respondent entered into separate contracts with a dealer in shoes, a dealer in groceries, a dealer in harness, a dealer in clothing, certain dealers in drugs, and a physician, whereby the dealers agreed to enter into a contract to sell their wares, and the physician agreed to enter into a contract to sell his services, to such persons as the corporation might direct; the dealers, at stated discounts from their regular rates, and the physician, for a consideration to be paid him by the corporation. The contract with the dealers in drugs is typical of the contracts with the other dealers, and we set the same out in full:

[415] "This memorandum of agreement made this 24th day of April, A. D. 1914, by and between the Universal Service Agency, a corporation of the state of Washington, party of the first part, and W. V. Blackwell and E. A. Isaacson, co-partners doing business under the firm name and style of Reading Drug Co. Central Drug Co. a corporation and Fred L. Janeck, as parties of the second part,

"Witnesseth: That whereas, the party of the first part proposes to act as agent of various persons in securing for them certain privileges and benefits, and

"Whereas, the parties of the second part, being each engaged in business as retail druggists in the city of North Yakima, and the custom of said persons will be of benefit to them, and will reduce their advertising expenses.

"Now Therefore, the said second parties, in consideration of the premises, agree that they and each of them will contract direct with all persons complying with the stipulations required by the first party, to fill for said persons and the members of their families dependent on them, any and all prescriptions of physicians that may be presented by the holder or any member of his family dependent on him, at a flat and uniform rate of thirty-five cents ($.35) per prescription, for a period of one year from and after the date of said contract, provided, it be delivered in the year 1914; said contract to be evidenced by a printed form delivered to the holder by the party of the first part as follows, to-wit:

"We, the Reading Drug Co. a co-partnership, Central Drug Co. a corporation, and Fred L. Janek, do hereby agree that we and each of us will fill for the holder and the members of his family dependent on him, any and all prescriptions of physicians that may be presented by the holder or any member of his family dependent on him, at a flat and uniform rate of thirty-five cents ($.35) per prescription, for a period of one year from and after the date and delivery of this contract No. dated and delivered this day of, A. D. 1914.

"The delivery of this contract and continuing compliance with the stipulations required by the Universal Service Agency, hereto attached and made a part hereof, shall constitute an acceptance of this offer by the holder, the sufficiency of the consideration therefor being admitted. . . .

[416] "It being understood and agreed that a printed copy of the foregoing form, when delivered by the party of the first part and accepted by the holder, shall constitute an irrevocable offer to the holder thereof, provided that he has complied with the stipulations required of him by the party of the first part, and compliance with such stipulations shall constitute an acceptance of the terms thereof by the holder. The said second parties hereby admit the sufficiency of the consideration therefor and their liability to the holder for any breach thereof."

The contract with the physician was in the following form:

"This Memorandum of Agreement made this 15th day of April, 1914, by and between the Universal Service Agency, a corporation of the state of Washington, party of the first part, and Dr. H. B. Pratt, a licensed physician and surgeon as party of the second part,

"Witnesseth: That Whereas, the party of the first part proposes to act as agent of various persons in securing for them certain privileges and benefits and among other things, desires to procure to said various persons, reduced rates for medical services and to act as agent for certain physicians in collecting their fees,

"Now Therefore, in consideration of the premises and the mutual covenants herein-after contained, the said party of the first part agrees that he will contract directly with all persons complying with the stipulations required by the first party and will render to them and to the members of their families dependent on them, as their names shall appear upon the card furnished by the party of the first part, certain limited professional services hereinafter defined, for a period of one year beginning two weeks from and after the date of said contract, provided it be delivered in the year 1914; said contract to be evidenced by a printed form and delivered to the holder by the party of the first part as follows, to-wit:

"Dr. H. B. Pratt, a licensed physician and surgeon, does hereby agree that he will furnish to the holder and to the members of his family dependent on him as their names shall appear upon the card furnished by the Universal Service Agency, and that the holder and his said family shall be entitled to all reasonable physician's services falling within the scope of duties of a physician and surgeon, including treatment of all physical diseases and ailments of every kind, nature [417] and description, excepting: first, venereal diseases; second, chronic and incurable diseases; third, major surgery. Provided, however, that the holder must at all times come to the office of the physician for treatment if physically able so to do. That the holder shall pay to the physician one-half the regular professional fee in obstetrical cases. That the holder shall pay one-half the usual mileage for necessary trips outside the limits of the city of North Yakima. That the holder shall at all times be entitled to call in other physicians for consultation or assistance and pay therefor such fees as such consulting or assisting physicians may demand. Provided, further, that the expense of all medicines and appliances shall be at the expense of the holder; said services to be rendered for a period of one year beginning two weeks from and after the date and delivery of this contract number dated and delivered this day of A. D. 1914."

"The delivery of this contract and the continued compliance with the stipulations required by the Universal Service Agency hereto attached and made a part hereof, and the strict payment of all sums required by the Universal Service Agency at the time and in the manner in said contract required, shall constitute an acceptance of this offer by the holder; the consideration for the services above enumerated being limited to the payment made by the holder to the said Universal Service Agency. The receipt of said sums by the said Universal Service Agency in my behalf being sufficient consideration for the services herein offered and not otherwise provided for.

"Witness my hand and seal this day of April, 1914.

"Dr. H. B. Pratt."

"It being understood and agreed that a printed copy of the foregoing form when delivered to the party of the first part and accepted by the holder, shall constitute an irrevocable offer to the holder thereof provided, that he has complied with the stipulations required of him by the party of the first part; that compliance with such stipulations shall constitute an acceptance of the terms thereof by the holder. In full consideration of the services rendered as above provided and not otherwise provided for, the said party of the first part agrees with the party of the second part that it [418] will collect from and of each person to whom said policy is delivered, the sum of $3 and the further sum of $1 for each child of the holder whose name shall appear on the card issued by the party of the first part, the said dollar for each child to be collected from the holder by the party of the first part when this contract is delivered; the further sum of $3 to be collected as follows: $1.25 within two months after delivery; $1.25 within three months after delivery; $0.50 within four months after delivery, provided that in cases where the holder shall pay the party of the first part the full amount of his premium when the policy is delivered, then the said sum of $3 shall be forthwith due and payable to the party of the second part. And provided further that if the holder shall drop his contract after the first payment of five dollars, then the party of the second part shall be entitled to the sum of $0.50 of the sum received from the said holder.

"It is further understood and agreed that the party of the first part shall make and render to the party of the second part, on or before the 10th day of each and every month, a statement of the contracts issued, the dates thereof, and the amounts due thereon, to the party of the second part, and shall thereupon pay the amounts so found due the said party of the second part; it being understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the party of the second part hereby agrees to contract directly with the holder to furnish the services herein specified. That the party of the first part has no interest therein except to secure acceptances of the offer herein made by the party of the second part and to collect from such persons the fees herein specified for the use and benefit of the party of the second part. And the party of the first part assumes no liability for any negligence, lack of professional skill, or failure of attention to any or all persons accepting the offer herein contained, and that the party of the second part does hereby assume all liability that may be incurred by any negligence or lack of professional skill to the holder of the contract herein offered.

"It is further understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the payment to the party of the first part by the holder, of the sums herein specified, shall be in full compensation of the services herein offered, except such as in said offer are excepted. That when said sums are [419] paid to the party of the first part, the party of the second part shall be bound to render to the holder, the services herein enumerated for the period of one year beginning two weeks from and after the date and delivery of said contract. And in the event of the failure of the party of the first part to pay said sum to the party of the second part, then the said party of the second part shall look only to the party of the first part for said sums; and that receipts of the party of the first part for the payment of said sums by the holder, shall be binding upon the party of the second part hereto."

After procuring the contracts mentioned, the corporation proceeded to sell, for a fixed consideration, the privileges therein acquired to any person or family of persons whom it could induce to purchase the same, taking from such person an application as follows:

"The Universal Service Agency

302 Miller Building

"North Yakima, Washington.

"I hereby apply for the service furnished by the Universal Service Agency for the period of one year, and agree that if a contract is issued to me that I will abide by the rules and regulations in said contract contained, and will pay therefor the sum of fifteen dollars ($15) and one dollar ($1) for each of my children, as follows: Five dollars ($5) and one dollar ($1) for each of my children cash and the balance in not more than four equal payments, beginning on or before the 10th of the month after my contract is issued; and I hereby consent that my contract may be cancelled upon default of any payment or upon my breach of any of the rules and regulations in said contract specified. [Names and ages of the family of the applicant.]

"A fee of .. dollars accompanies this application. . . ."

On receipt of the application and the payments specified, it delivered to the purchaser, the following instrument:

"Application No Contract No.
 "Medical, Pharmaceutical and Mercantile Benefits Offered by The Universal Service Agency, a Corporation, of North Yakima, Washington.

"In consideration of the compensation hereinafter provided and upon compliance with the stipulations hereinafter [420] contained, the Universal Service Agency, hereinafter called the Agency, hereby offers the Holder and the members of his family dependent upon him, whose name is [Naming applicant's wife and children] the special contracts with their privileges and benefits which are hereto attached and enumerated as contracts A, B, C, D, E, F, ..., the enjoyment of the privileges and benefits in said contracts offered, subject always to the conditions following, to-wit:

"I. That it is agreed and understood that the agency is acting as the agent of the holder in securing the propositions contained in riders 'A,' 'B,' 'C,' 'D,' 'E,' and 'F,' that said propositions are contingent offers which become contracts upon their acceptance by the holder and his continued compliance with the conditions herein stipulated and that acceptance thereof shall at all times be evidenced by the payment to the agency of the compensation hereinafter provided and the delivery of these presents to the holder.

"II. The life of said contracts and each of them shall continue for a period of one year after the date of these presents, it being agreed that delivery and acceptance shall be considered made as of the date of said contracts.

"III. The holder shall not be entitled to the privileges or benefits in said contracts offered unless he is in possession of, and exhibits to the persons or firms, from whom said privileges and benefits are claimed, evidence of his right thereto.

"IV. The agency will furnish to each holder a card showing the persons and firms offering privileges and benefits to him, the names of his family dependent on him and the time for which he has paid the compensation due the agency. Said cards shall be sufficient evidence of the holder's acceptance of the offers herein contained and when exhibited will entitle the holder to all the privileges and benefits herein offered. The agency reserves the right to change the list of persons or firms appearing thereon without notice. Said card shall be non-negotiable and non-transferable.

"V. In presenting the various offers herein contained the agency acts only as the agent of the parties and assumes no liability for the breach of any one or all of said contracts. The agency agrees, however, that in the event of a breach, it will use its best efforts to procure other persons or firms to offer the same or similar service.

[421] "VI. The agency shall use its discretion in selecting the physicians and pharmacists, but in no case is it an insurer against the negligence of any physician or pharmacist offering services or benefits herein.

"VII. The contracts herein contained offering reduced rates on merchandise or for the performance of service are made contingent upon cash payments by the holder.

"VIII. The privileges and benefits in these presents offered are contingent upon the holder paying to the agency its compensation at the time and in the manner following: that is to say, fifteen dollars ($15) per year, and one dollar ($1) additional for each child which the holder may have dependent upon him, five dollars and one dollar for each child, payable cash in advance, and the balance in not more than four equal monthly payments on or before the 10th day of each and every month until paid.

"Said amounts to be in full compensation to the agency in securing the contracts herein offered and in payment of the services of physicians not otherwise provided for.

"The agency grants to the holder without charge the privilege of consulting with and the advice and services of its attorneys on all legal matters in which he is personally interested, including conveyancing and all matters within the scope of service usually rendered by attorneys and counsellors at law, excepting: (1) Matters involving his domestic relations, (2) Matters requiring an appearance in any court, (3) Matters in which the agency's attorneys represent opposite parties, (4) Collections will be taken by the agency's attorneys for a fee of fifteen (15) per cent. of the amount collected, provided it be collected without suit."

The attached contract of the shoe dealer mentioned in the instrument is as follows:

"SHOES.

"Allen & Mackie do hereby agree that they will sell to the holder and members of his family dependent on him any of their merchandise in the regular course of trade at ten per cent discount from the current retail prices on cash sales of one dollar or more or on such credit sales as they may at their option make, except special sales, for a period of one year from and after the date and delivery of this contract No., dated and delivered this day of, [422] 1914. The delivery of this contract and the continuing compliance with the stipulations required by the Universal Service Agency hereto attached and made a part hereof shall constitute an acceptance of this offer by the holder, the sufficiency of the consideration therefor being admitted.

"Allen & Mackie

"Per J. H. Allen."

That of the dealers in drugs and medicines:

"DRUGS.

"We, the Reading Drug Co., a co-partnership, Central Drug Co., a corporation, and Fred L. Janeck, do hereby agree that we and each of us will fill for the holder and the members of his family dependent on him any and all prescriptions of physicians that may be presented by the holder or any member of his family dependent on him, at a flat and uniform rate of thirty-five cents ($0.35) for a period of one year from and after the date and delivery of this contract No., dated and delivered this day of, 1914. The delivery of this contract and the continuing compliance with the stipulations required my the Universal Service Agency hereto attached and made a part hereof, shall constitute an acceptance of this offer by the holder, the sufficiency of the consideration therefor being admitted.

Section 1 of the insurance code (Laws 1911, ch. 49, p. 161; 3 Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6059-1), defines insurance as follows:

"Insurance is a contract whereby one party called the 'insurer,' for a consideration, undertakes to pay money or its equivalent, or to do an act valuable to another party called the 'insured,' or to his 'beneficiary,' upon the happening of the hazard or peril insured against, whereby the party insured or his beneficiary suffers loss or injury."

The question therefore is, does the business of the corporation constitute an insurance business within the meaning of that term as defined by the statute. If it does, then the corporation is subject to restraint at the suit of the insurance [424] commissioner, otherwise it is not. The essential elements of an insurance contract, it will be observed from the definition given, are (1) an insurer, (2) a consideration, (3) a person insured or his beneficiary, (4) a hazard or peril insured against whereby the insured or his beneficiary may suffer loss or injury.

Testing the business of the respondent by these essentials, it seems to be wanting in the principal essential necessary to make it an insurance contract. Clearly there is no hazard or peril whereby the purchasers of these contracts may suffer loss or injury, which the respondent insures against. It does not guarantee that any of the contracting parties, even the physician, will perform the services agreed upon. On the contrary, in the paragraph lettered V of its offer of benefits, it expressly declares that it "assumes no liability for the breach of any one or all of such contracts." It is true that it does say in the same paragraph that, in the event of a breach of the agreement by the dealers or physician, it will use its best efforts to procure other persons or firms to offer the same or similar service. But this, while it may require the respondent to use reasonable diligence to procure another person to perform the services in case the contracting party for any reason fails therein, and may render it liable to the contract holder in damages if it should fail to exercise such diligence, it is in no sense a guarantor or an insurer that the service will be performed. There is, therefore, as we see it, no hazard or peril insured against, and the transaction being lacking in this essential element, it is not an engaging in the insurance business.

As authority for his position, the insurance commissioner relies principally upon the so-called Physicians' Defense Co. Cases, found in 199 Fed. 576, 118 C. C. A. 50, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 290, and in 100 Minn. 490, 111 N. W. 396, and perhaps somewhat upon the case from this court of State v. Globe Casket, etc. Co. 82 Wash. 124, 143 Pac. [425] 878, L.R.A. 1915B 976. But the contracts in these cases which were held to be contracts of insurance differ widely from the contract in the case at bar. In the Physicians' Defense Co. Cases, the company agreed, for a stated consideration paid to it by a physician, to defend the physician against "all civil suits for damages for malpractice, based on professional services rendered by himself or his agent during the time of the contract at its own expense, not exceeding five thousand dollars," subject to certain defined conditions. There was in those cases a contract for indemnity against a hazard which might cause the physician loss, but, as we have attempted to show, no hazard or peril is insured against by the contract in the case at bar. So with the case cited from this court. There was an insurance against loss to the beneficiary of the insured. We cannot, therefore, think them conclusive, or even in point in the case at bar.

Our conclusion requires the affirmance of the judgment below. It is so ordered.

NOTE.

What Is an "Insurance Company" or "Contract of Insurance."

Generally, 1022.

Contracts Held to be of Insurance, 1022.

Contracts Held Not to be of Insurance, 1023.

Generally.

The earlier cases discussing what constitutes an "insurance company" or a "contract of insurance" are reviewed in the note to American Surety Co. v. Folk, Ann. Cas. 1912D 1024. This note presents the recent cases on that point.

The elements of a contract of insurance were stated in Physicians' Defense Co. v.

Cooper, 199 Fed. 576, 118 C. C. A. 50, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 290, as follows: "The principal ingredients of such a contract are the consideration, the risk, and the indemnity. The consideration is the premium for the insurer's undertaking; the risk may be said to be the perils or contingencies against which the assured is protected; and the indemnity is the stipulated desideratum to be paid to the assured in case he has suffered loss or damage through the perils and contingencies specified." In People v. May, 162 App. Div. 215, 147 N. Y. S. 487, affirmed 212 N. Y. 561, 106 N. E. 1039, it was said: "Insurance, in its most general and comprehensive signification, is a system of business by which one party, for an agreed consideration, proportionate to the risk involved undertakes to a specified extent and under stipulated conditions to indemnify another against pecuniary loss arising from the destruction of or injury to property from certain perils," says the American & English Encyclopedia of Law (volume 16, p. 838), and this is in substance stated by the court in Imperial Fire Ins. Co. v. Coos County, 151 U. S. 452, 462, 14 S. Ct. 379, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 231. The contract of insurance has been termed an aleatory contract, for the reason that it is one involving risk or hazard. It is, however, very different in its nature from a mere wager. In the latter the risk of loss is created by the contract itself; in the former the risk exists independently of the contract, and the insurance merely shifts the liability from the one party to the other."

For a discussion of burial contracts as insurance see the note to Rensachler v. State, reported ante, this volume, at page 1014.

Contracts Held to Be of Insurance.

A contract in consideration of a stated annual fee to assume the defense of any action which may be brought against the payor for malpractice as a physician is an insurance contract. Physicians' Defense Co. v. Cooper, 199 Fed. 576, 118 C. C. A. 50, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 290, affirming 188 Fed. 832. In that case it was said: "Now we may look to the contract in question, and determine whether it falls within the category of insurance, and whether a continuance of the issuance of such contracts does or does not constitute insurance business. In case the holder of the contract is sued for damages for civil malpractice, the Defense Company engages to employ a local attorney, in whose selection the holder of the contract shall have a voice, who, together with the company's attorney, will defend the case without expense to the holder, and this to the extent of the exhaustion of the sum named in the policy, which for the defense of one suit is five thousand dollars; if others in one year, ten thousand dollars. It seems plain that when the holder is sued for civil malpractice, which he deems is wrongful, and the necessity of making defense is thrust upon him, he must suffer loss, damage, or liability within the meaning of the contract to the extent that he is obliged to employ attorneys and meet the expenses of the trial in regular course. He must pay his attorneys for their services in his behalf, and he must pay his costs on the trial. These are the contingencies which the Defense Company agrees to meet. True, the company does not agree to pay the holder of the contract the amount of such expenses incurred up to the sum of five thousand dollars; but it does agree to lift them from the burden or liability of the holder, so that he will not be required to use his own money to meet them. The contingency of paying the expenses of attorneys and cost of defense in case of suit for civil malpractice is the risk or peril which the company agrees that it will meet, and it can make no difference whether it pays the amount of the expenses and costs incurred to the parties doing the service or to the holder of the contract, so that he may himself meet such expenses and costs. The indemnity is the amount of such expenses and costs to be paid. Or, to put it another way, the Defense Company agrees to hold the holder of the contract harmless in that respect to the extent of five thousand dollars in the event of the happening of the contingency specified. Such a contract, in our opinion, cannot be classed as a contract for personal services. The company is not itself an attorney, and does not undertake the defense as such. What it does undertake is, in case of suit, to employ a local attorney, in whose selection the holder shall have a voice, who, with the company's attorney, will defend the case, and to relieve the holder from the expense thereof, an expense which must follow the happening of the very contingency provided against. Not only this, but the company must relieve the holder of paying the costs of suit. Suppose the contract had been to repay to the holder whatever sums, not exceeding five thousand dollars, he should be required to pay out for attorneys and costs in case of such litigation. Could there be any question that there would be a contract of insurance? We think not. Can it change the character of the contract in this respect that it purports to hold the holder harmless against the payment of such expenses and costs? The contract, reduced to its simplest idea, is but an agreement to pay the expenses and costs that the holder would have to pay in the contingency specified. This is the indemnity pure and simple, and with whatever verbiage the contract may be clothed it does not serve to cover its real purpose, which is one to indemnify the holder against damage and liability for attorney's expenses and costs of defense, in the event he is sued for malpractice."

So in People v. Standard Plate Glass etc. Co. 156 N. Y. S. 1012, it was held that an agreement to care for and replace plate glass was an insurance contract, the court saying: "Defendant's proposed contract provides for the care for a fixed term, for a certain consideration, of plate glass, and in the event that the glass is broken within the period of the running of the contract the defendant agrees to replace the broken glass. A plate glass insurance policy issued by a company authorized to do plate glass insurance provides for the replacing of glass in the event of its being broken or for the payment of a given sum of money, either one or the other. The fact that the defendant's contract provides, in addition to the replacing of a broken glass to keep the glass puttied in the frame during the period of the contract is quite beside the mark. This provision of the contract is simply in the nature of an inspection, and is really for the protection of the company insuring the glass. Because the company agrees to inspect and to putty does not alter in any way the nature of the contract. No plate glass owner enters into one of these contracts, agreeing to pay a stipulated sum for the purpose of having his window glass puttied, he takes it for the purpose of insuring himself against loss by reason of the breakage of the glass. It looks like an attempt to evade the provisions of the insurance law."

Contracts Held Not to Be of Insurance.

In Curtis v. New York Life Ins. Co. 217 Mass. 47, 104 N. E. 553, a contract in consideration of a single payment to pay a specified endowment if the promisee was living at the end of five years was held not to be an insurance contract. The court said: "The contract in question does not provide for payment upon the 'destruction, loss or injury' of anything. Under it the defendant assumed the obligation of payment, not upon the destruction or loss during the period named, but upon the continuance of the life of Jenness during that period. It is not what ordinarily is known as an endowment insurance policy, under which the sum named in the policy is payable to the insured himself, if he lives a certain length of time, and in the event of his prior death is payable to his beneficiaries, as in the ordinary life policy." In Colaizzi v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 208 N. Y. 275, 101 N. E. 859, affirming 143 App. Div. 638, 128 N. L. S. 312, . . . a railroad relief department was held not to be engaged in the business of insurance. In People v. May, 162

App. Div. 215, 147 N. Y. S. 487, affirmed 212 N. Y. 561, 106 N. E. 1039, an agreement by a mercantile agency to guarantee the accuracy of its reports was held not to be an insurance contract. Referring to the contract, the court said: "It does not guarantee the solvency of any one; it merely guarantees that the report which it makes is at the date of such report a true statement of the facts which it sets forth, and limits its responsibility to such report, stipulating that in no event shall the damages exceed the amount of the credit which may be extended upon the basis of such report. This does not assume to pay any damages where the report is truthful and accurate; it does not assume any liability whatever for the credit extended, unless the credit was extended upon the basis of a report which was in fact inaccurate and false in material respects; and then it merely seeks to have the amount of the damages fixed by contract rather than by actions at law. It is one thing to guarantee the accuracy of one's own work, and quite another to assume the risk of future insolvency. We apprehend that any individual could make a contract with a merchant that he would investigate the financial condition of the customers of such merchant, guaranteeing the accuracy of his statements in material respects and provide for liquidated damages, and that no one would ever suggest that he was violating the Insurance Law, or that the contract amounted to insurance; and, as the Business Corporation Law contemplates a system of corporate business such as individuals may properly carry on, we see no reason why the relator should not be permitted to amend its certificate of incorporation in the manner suggested." In Isaac H. Blanchard Co. v. Hamblin, 162 Mo. App. 242, 144 S. W. 880, an agreement of several persons to indemnify each other in case of a loss of property by fire was held not to be an insurance contract the court saying: "It is argued by counsel for defendant that the association was unlawful and its policies void for the reason that the purpose of its members was to do an insurance business without complying with the statutes of this state relating to such business. [Arts. 5 and 6, Ch. 119, Rev. Stat. 1899.] This contention is not without support in the authorities. The most apposite case to which we are referred is State v. Alley [96 Miss. 720] 51 So. 467, decided by the Supreme Court of Mississippi. We are much impressed by the reasoning of that decision but have concluded that a proper construction of our statutory law relating to insurance discloses the inapplicability of the rules announced in that and similar cases. A contract between a limited number of individuals, partnerships, and corporations engaged in the same line of business by which they merely undertake to indemnify each other against loss by fire, and do not purpose to issue policies to others not parties to the contract is not a contract for the creation of an insurance business within the meaning of that term expressed in our statutes. It is to be classified as an interindemnity contract and, therefore, as a contract outside the purview of the insurance law in force at the time the contract was made." In John Church Co. v. Aetna Indemnity Co. 13 Ga. App. 826, 80 S. E. 1093, the question whether a contract was one of suretyship or of fidelity insurance was discussed but not decided. In Hampton v. Toxteth Co-operative Society [1915] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 721, in holding a contract of an industrial society not to be one of insurance it was said: "It is now necessary to consider the nature of the defendant society and what it is that they are doing which is said to amount to a carrying on of life assurance business. The defendant society is an industrial and provident society duly registered under the Act of 1876. Its objects as defined by the rules are to carry on the trades of general dealers, both wholesale and retail, and it appears to be a highly prosperous company. By rule 14 the net profits are to be applied in paying or providing for (1.) expenses of management; (2.) and (3.) interest on paid up capital and loan capital; (4.) depreciations; (5.) 'such other sums as any quarterly meeting may vote for the objects of the society;' (6.) a reserved fund for any purpose whether charitable, philanthropic, of public utility, or any other purposes whether within the objects for which the society is formed or not; (7.) any other sums the committee consider necessary for contingencies; and (8.) 1½ per cent. to the educational fund and the remainder to be divided amongst members and non-members in proportion to their purchases from the society, but non-members are only to receive half the rate which is allocated to members. The society for some years affected what is described as a collective policy with the Co-operative Insurance Society, Limited, to provide for each member who should die during the currency of the policy 4s. in respect of each £l. of his average purchases. No question arises on this policy. It occurred, however, to the managers that it might be advantageous to drop this policy and to arrange for equivalent benefits to be given to members out of the profits of the company, and on October 31, 1911, new rules were passed by adding to rule 1 the words 'and to carry on the business of insurance as provided in rule 14a,' and by adding to rule after '(6.) reserve fund' the words 'to an insurance fund, by such appropriation as the general meetings may from time to time determine.' Rule 14a was a new rule headed 'Insurance Fund.' It authorized the committee of management to form a fund (inter alia) for providing a sum to be paid on the death of a member or the wife or husband of a member, to be proportioned to one year's average purchases of the member from the society during the three years immediately preceding death. On June 8 it was resolved that the benefits of the collective assurance scheme be extended so as to provide for the payment of 2s. in the pound on purchases on the death of married women members or the wives of male members. All these new rules have been registered under the Act. The defendant society is not subject to the statutory restriction imposed by the Companies Acts; the members can apply both income and capital to any purpose they think fit. A person desiring to become a member applies to the committee, pays 1l. for a share, and receives a membership card in which his or her name is inserted and a registered number, together with a member's purchase book in which the amount of purchases is entered. There is no other document of any kind except so far as the rules may be considered a document. These being the admitted facts, I think there is no carrying on life assurance business within the meaning of the Act. No policy has been issued, no premium has been paid, there is no obligation upon the society to appropriate any further sum to the insurance fund. It seems to me that it is an abuse of language to call the membership card a policy or an instrument evidencing a contract."

In the reported case a corporation which contracts for the sale of various commodities and the services of professional men at stated discounts from their regular rates and sells to subscribers the benefit of those contracts, is held not to be engaging in the insurance business.

BABER ET AL.

CAPLES.

Oregon Supreme Court—February 3, 1914.

71 Oregon 212; 133 Pac. 472.

Gifts — Causa Mortis — Evidence Sufficient.

Evidence held to show that decedent gave the promissory notes in controversy to defendant; that she indorsed each of them with her own hand, and delivered them to the defendant with intent to vest title in him, and that he accepted them as a gift causa mortis.

Ann. Cas. 1916C.—65.

Requisites of Gift Causa Mortis — Delivery.

A "gift causa mortis," like a gift inter vivos, must be completely executed and go into immediate effect, and be accompanied by an actual and complete delivery.

[See 99 Am. St. Rep. 895.]

Sufficiency of Delivery — Gift of Note.

Whether a gift of a promissory note or other chose in action is causa mortis or inter vivos, the actual delivery of the written evidence of the debt is sufficient, without any assignment or indorsement.

Validity of Gift Causa Mortis.

Gifts causa mortis, if made by competent persons, and fully executed, are valid, in the absence of fraud or undue influence, if the rights of creditors are not affected.

Same.

While gifts causa mortis are sustained only on clear proof of the essential facts, there is no presumption of law against them.

Evidence — Opinion Evidence — As to Handwriting — Weight.

Opinion evidence in relation to handwriting is generally viewed with caution by the courts.

Undue Influence — Persons Engaged to Be Married — Presumption.

Where a relation of confidence exists, as between a man and woman engaged to be married, it is incumbent upon the donee causa mortis to show that the gift was not obtained by fraud or undue influence.

[See note at end of this case.]

Laches — Setting Aside Gift.

Where plaintiffs, in a suit to set aside a gift causa mortis, knew as much about the facts 12 years before as when suit was commenced, their acquiescence in the gift for that time was laches.

Gifts — Fraud and Undue Influence.

Evidence held to show that a gift causa mortis was not induced by fraud or undue influence of the donee.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah county: McGINN, Judge.

Action to set aside gift causa mortis, for accounting, etc. Minnie Baber, et al., plaintiffs, and C. C. Caples, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

John T. McKee and Cake & Cake, for appellant.

Muncho I. Langley and King & Saxon for respondents.

[213] RAMSEY, J.—On July 3, 1912, the plaintiffs began this suit to set aside a gift causa mortis made by Liverne H. Baber, to the defendant, in March, 1900, and for an accounting, etc.

The complaint is lengthy, and, as no questions arise as to its sufficiency, it is unnecessary to set it forth in this opinion.

Granville H. Baber, the father of Liverne H. Baber and the plaintiff Josephine Baber MacLeod, and husband of the plaintiff Minnie Baber, died testate in Washington County on August 1, 1898, leaving an [274] estate of the value of $33,000. Said Liverne H. and Josephine were his sole heirs, and Minnie Baber, his widow. At the time of his death Josephine was 12 years old and Liverne was about 22. The decedent in his will appointed the defendant executor thereof, and trustee. The will was admitted to probate by the County Court of Washington County, and letters testamentary were duly issued to the defendant. By the terms of said will the defendant, as executor, was directed to pay to Liverne a legacy of $5,000 upon the death of the testator, or as soon thereafter as he could collect the same out of the assets of the estate, and she was given also one third of the residue of the estate when she should reach the age of 23 years. The defendant paid said sums to Liverne in accordance with the terms of the will, and took her receipts therefor. The last payment amounted to $6,203.25 in money, notes, mortgages, and land, and was made in November, 1899. The defendant resigned the trusteeship of said estate, created by said will, before this suit was commenced. A few weeks after the death of Granville H. Baber, the defendant and Liverne became engaged to be married, and this engagement continued until the death of Liverne. She died on March 22, 1900, intestate. Prior to the death of her father, the defendant "went with" her, but there was no engagement until shortly after his death. This engagement was known to the plaintiffs prior to the death of Liverne. Liverne went to Stanford University in December, 1898 (after her father's death; and after the engagement to the defendant), and remained there as a student until the close of the college year in May, 1899, and then she went to Pacific Grove for awhile. She returned home in the summer of 1899, and resided at home with her mother, at Forest Grove, until her [275] death on March 22, 1900. She died of consumption, but she was not known to be dangerously ill until a short time before her death. She was not a robust person, but no one knew that she had consumption until a short time before her decease.

The complaint alleges, in substance, that the defendant, at the time of the death of Liverne, had possession of about $8,000 in notes belonging to her, and falsely and fraudulently represented to the plaintiffs that Liverne had given him said notes, and it alleges, also, as a separate cause of suit, that the defendant induced Liverne, by fraud and undue influence, to give him said notes. These matters were put in issue by the answer. The defendant asserts that Liverne told him several times before her death that she was likely to die soon, and asked him to have someone prepare for her a will, giving all of her property to him, and saying that she wanted to give all of her property to him. He testified that he told her that she was not going to die, and urged her not to think of such a thing. He testified that he was in her room at her mother's house about two weeks before her death, and that she then asked him whether he had had her will prepared as she had requested, and that he told her he had not, and that he remonstrated against her saying that she was going to die. He says that she then asked if she could dispose of her property without making a will, and he told her she could transfer the real estate by making a deed, and that she could transfer the notes and mortgages by indorsing them. He testifies that she then said, "Can I indorse the notes over, and, if so, would that be legal?" and that he told her it would be legal, and that she then went and got her notes and indorsed them. He testified that she wrote her name on the backs of the notes, and then gave and [216] delivered them to him. He says that she had the notes in her room, and got them and indorsed them by writing her name on the backs of each of them, in his presence, and delivered them to him. He says that she was reclining on the couch when she indorsed the notes and gave them to him, and that she placed the notes on a book when she indorsed them. Shortly after the death of Liverne, the defendant told Mrs. Minnie Baber that Liverne had given him those notes, and he told others of it, and, a little later, he showed to Minnie Baber all of the notes that Liverne had given him and her signature on the back of each note. The defendant testified that when Liverne gave him the notes, he put them in his pocket, and took them away. The evidence of the defendant shows, if it is true, a gift of causa mortis. The defendant testified that Liverne told him that she wanted him to have the property, and that she did not want her mother to have it. The defendant says that when he told Mrs. Baber that Liverne had given him the notes, she protested a little against it, and asked him to show them to her, which he did. Mrs. Baber says that defendant told her that Liverne had given him the notes, and that, when he showed her the notes and the indorsements on them, she remarked that the writing did not look like Liverne's.

About two weeks after Liverne's death, the plaintiffs signed a petition, asking the County Court of Washington County, to appoint the defendant administrator to Liverne's estate, and in this petition, signed by the plaintiffs, is the following statement:

"Your petitioners desire to show unto your honor that, the estate of the above deceased originally consisted of more personal property than the amount above stated, but that said personal property was given to O. C. Caples by the deceased a considerable time [217] before her death; and your petitioners wish to state that the gift as above stated is in accordance with the wish of your petitioners, and entirely satisfactory to them in every respect."

This petition seems to have been written by the defendant's brother.

In her evidence (page 59), Mrs. Minnie Baber says that, if her daughter gave the notes to the defendant, she wanted him to have them; and that she had no disposition to break what her daughter had done. The plaintiffs testified that Liverne never told them that she had given any property to the defendant; nor did she say anything to either of them about disposing of her property, and the defendant did not tell either of them, until after Liverne's death, that she had given him any property. No person was present when the gift was made but Liverne and the defendant.

Shortly after Liverne's death, Mrs. Baber employed S. B. Huston, Esq., to investigate the gift of the notes to the defendant, with the intention of instituting legal proceedings to recover the notes from him if grounds therefor should be found; and Mr. Huston made the examination. The plaintiffs produced him as a witness, and examined him in relation to that matter. Mr. Huston said this examination was made within a few months after the death of Liverne, and hence it must have been in 1900.

Mrs. Baber furnished Mr. Huston with genuine signatures of Liverne's for comparison with the indorsements on the notes, and Mr. Huston called on the defendant and informed him what he was doing. The defendant delivered the notes in question to Mr. Huston for examination; and he permitted Mr. Huston to retain the notes for quite awhile. Mr. Huston says that he went over the matter carefully, and compared [218] the signatures of Liverne's which her mother had furnished him with her name on the notes, and he says that the indorsements on the notes seemed to him to be genuine and all right, and he so informed Mrs. Baber. He asked Mrs. Baber, if she had any reason to doubt the genuineness of the signatures on the indorsements, and, according to his recollection, she said "No."

The defendant settled the estate of Liverne and turned over to the plaintiffs, as her heirs, the real estate, appraised in 1900, at $2,700, and there are receipts in evidence showing that, on January 26, 1902, Minnie Baber received of the defendant, as administrator of the estate of Liverne H. Baber, deceased, in full of her interest in the personal property of said estate, the sum of $1,029.31, and another receipt of the same date, showing that she, as guardian of Josephine Baber, received from the defendant the further sum of $1,029.31 in full of Josephine's interest in the personal estate of Liverne. This indicates that the plaintiffs received at least $4,758.62 from the estate of Liverne. On page 60 of the evidence Minnie Baber, in answer to the question whether the defendant told her how much Liverne had given him, answered, "He gave us $3,000 and said the rest was his." We are not certain just how much the plaintiffs received of the estate of Liverne, but it seems certain that they received at least $4,758.62.

The plaintiffs produced a handwriting expert, named W. W. Williams, who was not acquainted with Liverne H. Baber, and did not know her handwriting. Two of the promissory notes that Liverne gave to the defendant, and several signatures of Liverne's that were shown to be genuine, were submitted to this witness for examination and comparison. He compared the [219] signatures that were shown and admitted to be genuine with her name on the indorsements on the notes. He testified that the name of "Liverne H. Baber" written on the backs of the said two notes was a "simulated forgery," and not written by her, and gave his reasons for his opinion.

That is all of the evidence that was produced to show that the said indorsements were not genuine. The defendant testified that these signatures were genuine, and that he saw Liverne write them. His testimony is the same as to the indorsements on the other notes.

There was no evidence tending to show that the gift of the said notes to the defendant was the result of fraud or any undue or improper influence, excepting the evidence showing the relations between the defendant and Liverne. The evidence of the defendant was positive that he exerted no persuasion or other influence to induce Liverne to give him the property.

There was considerable said in the evidence about his accounts as executor and trustee of the estate of Granville H. Baber, and as administrator of the estate of Liverne H. Baber; but these accounts were approved and settled in the probate court, and there was no evidence showing that they were incorrect. However, they had little bearing on the issues of this case.

1. The first point for consideration is whether Liverne H. Baber gave these notes to the defendant, or whether the indorsements on the notes were genuine or forgeries.

2. If the indorsements on the notes were forgeries, it would be probable that the defendant's contention that the notes were given to him was false, although the indorsements of promissory notes is not necessary to the validity of a gift of promissory note, causa mortis. A gift causa mortis, like a gift inter vivos, [220] must be completely executed, and go into immediate effect.

A gift causa mortis, to be valid, must be accompanied by an actual and complete delivery of the property by the donor to the donee. In this respect there is no difference between a gift causa mortis and a gift inter vivos: 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 1066.

3. However, whether the gift is causa mortis or inter vivos, if the subject of the gift is a promissory note or other chose in action, the actual delivery of the written evidence of the debt is valid, without any assignment or indorsement: 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) p. 1069.

4. The disposition of personal property by gift causa mortis has been recognized and upheld by the courts from an early period, and is a fixed principle of jurisprudence in all civilized countries, and such gifts, if made by competent persons, and fully executed, are perfectly valid, in the absence of fraud or undue influence, provided the rights of creditors are not affected.

5. The common law does not encourage gifts of this nature, and they are sustained only upon clear proof of all the essential facts necessary to constitute such a gift. The rule, however, is not carried to the extent of holding that the presumption of law is against such gifts. Notwithstanding the fact that gifts of this nature are watched with jealousy on account of the opportunity they afford for fraud, there is no presumption, either in favor of or against such gifts, and the quantity of evidence necessary to sustain them is no greater than that required in other civil causes. Such gifts may be supported by a fair preponderance of the evidence: 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 1067.

[221] 6. Mr. Williams, the handwriting expert, testifies that he is positive that the name of Liverne H. Baber on the backs of the two notes shown him are forgeries. These papers and others were submitted to him for his opinion by one of the plaintiffs' attorneys, several months before he gave his evidence, and before the suit was commenced. Opinion evidence in relation to handwriting is generally viewed with caution by the courts. Such experts are usually very ardent supporters of the side that calls them.

Taylor, in Volume 1 of his work on Evidence (8 ed.) Section 58, speaking of skilled witnesses generally, says:

"Perhaps the testimony which least deserves credit with a jury is that of skilled witnesses. These gentlemen are usually required to speak, not to facts, but to opinions; and, when this is the case, it is often quite surprising to see with what facility and to what an extent their views can be made to correspond with the wishes or the interests of the parties who call them. They do not, indeed, willfully misrepresent what they think; but their judgments become so warped by regarding the subject in one point of view that, even when conscientiously disposed, they are incapable of expressing a candid opinion."

This author in the same section, appositely, but reverently, adds:

"Being zealous partisans, their belief becomes synonymous with faith as defined by the apostle; and it too often is 'but the substance of things hoped for—the evidence of things not seen.'"

In the case of The Tracy Peerage, 10 Cl. & F. (Eng.) 191, Lord Campbell says:

"Hardly any weight is to be given to the evidence of what are called scientific witnesses. They come, with a bias on their minds, to support the cause in which they are embarked."

[222] In Wend v. Fuerst, 68 Ore. 283, 136 Pac. 1, this court held:

"We believe the rule stated by Rogers, supra, is the correct one, and that the evidence of experts in all cases should be received and weighed with caution."

We find from the evidence that Liverne H. Baber did give the promissory notes in controversy to the defendant; that she indorsed each of them with her own hand, and delivered them to the defendant with the intention to vest the title of these notes in him, and that he received and accepted said notes as a gift causa mortis. The gift was complete in every respect.

The other question for our determination is, was the gift of the promissory notes by Liverne H. Baber to the defendant the result of fraud or undue influence, exerted upon her by the defendant? It is admitted that the defendant was executor and trustee of her father's estate, and that, after the defendant turned over to her her portion of said estate, he assisted her in managing her estate to some extent, and that he attended to business for the plaintiff, Minnie Baber. It is also admitted that he was engaged to marry Liverne, and that he called upon her often. Apart from these facts, there is no evidence before the court tending to prove that the plaintiffs' contention that said gift was obtained by fraud or undue influence. The plaintiffs testified to nothing tending to show undue influence. No witness gave evidence tending to prove fraud. The defendant swears fully and positively that he was not guilty of any fraud or of any undue influence, and that he did nothing to induce her to make said gift.

Liverne was about 24 years of age when she died, and she had had advantages of education. It is not claimed that she was a person of weak mind; or that [223] she was not a person of at least average intelligence and ability.

7. A relation of confidence exists between a man and a woman that are engaged to be married.

Bigelow, in his work on Fraud (1 ed.) page 271, says:

"Undue influence may be exercised under the intimate relation created by an engagement to marry. Thus if a woman gives a man land upon a promise of marriage, and he then refused to marry her and continues to hold the land, this is a fraud for which the law will give the woman proper relief. So, on the other hand, if a man should, after such solicitation and hesitancy, convey land, without adequate pecuniary consideration to a woman who had promised to marry him, and who had thereby gained great influence over him, her refusal to marry him would afford him ground for rescinding the conveyance."

In the case of Rockafellow v. Newcomb, 57 Ill. 194, the facts were that the plaintiff and the defendant were engaged to be married, and the plaintiff, at the persistent solicitations of the defendant, conveyed to her certain lands in Chicago, and the defendant, at the same time, conveyed to him lands in Iowa. The woman refused to marry the man, and he brought suit to rescind the conveyance on the ground of fraud. Passing on the case, the court says, inter alia:

"The relation of the parties [who are engaged to be married] was of the most confidential character. . . . She [the defendant] had an undue influence over him; and took advantage of the relation between them. That this influence existed, and was exercised to the great benefit of one, and to the great disadvantage of the other, there can be no doubt. There could be no relation between persons where a greater influence could be exerted and an undue purpose more easily achieved. The situation of the parties; the close intimacy; the loving correspondence; the threat to [224] annul the marriage contract; the great difference in the value of the two pieces of property—all raise the presumption of undue influence. She worked upon his passions, excited his fears, and alarmed him by the dread of separation. The relief to be granted in such cases stands upon a general principle, which applies to all the variety of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one over another."

In cases like this, where a confidential relation exists, and there is great opportunity for fraud, it is incumbent on the donee to show that the gift was not obtained by fraud or undue influence: Gilmore v. Burch, 7 Ore. 374, 33 Am. Rep. 710; Baldoek v. Johnson, 14 Ore. 542, 13 Pac. 434; Wade v. Pulsifer, 54 Vt. 45; Gilmore v. Lee, 237 Ill. 402, 86 N. E. 568, 127 Am. St. Rep. 330; Caspari v. New Jerusalem First German Church, 12 Mo. App. 293; Jenkins v. Jenkins, 66 Ore. 12, 132 Pac. 542; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (13 ed.) § 312; Page v. Horne, 11 Beav. (Eng.) 236; Huguenin v. Baseley, L. C. in Equity, note pp. 119, 120.

In Page v. Horne, 11 Beav. (Eng.) 235, the master of the rolls, says:

"It is true that no influence is proved to have been used; but no one can say what may be the extent of the influence of a man over a woman whose consent to marriage he has obtained. Here, the husband having mortgaged the property, we are told by the report of the master that no undue influence was used. The court, however, will look with great vigilance at the circumstances and situation of the parties in such cases as the present, and will not only consider the influence which the intended husband, either by soothing or violence, may have used, but require satisfactory evidence that it has not been used."

In the note of Huguenin v. Baseley, L. C. in Equity, note page 119, it is said:

"The influence of a man over a woman to whom he is engaged to be married is presumed to be so great [225] that the court will look with great vigilance at the circumstances and situation of the parties, and will consider, not only the influence which the intended husband, either by soothing or violence, may have used, but require satisfactory evidence that it has not been used."

In Gilmore v. Burch, 7 Ore. 374, 33 Am. Rep. 710, the court says:

"The law seems to be well settled that when one accepts a confidential or fiduciary relation to another, . . . where the donee or grantee is supposed to exercise an unusual and commanding influence over the grantor, the courts will set aside the conveyance, unless the grantee can show that the transaction was fair, and without fraud or undue influence."

The rule is well settled in this state and elsewhere that where a confidential relation is shown to have existed between a donor and a donee, and a gift was made by the former to the latter during the existence of this relation, courts of equity will annul the gift, unless the donee shows that the gift was made without fraud or undue influence. This principle applies to a gift causa mortis made by a young woman to a young man to whom she was engaged to be married.

It appears that the plaintiffs were informed by the defendant, in March, 1900, a few days after the death of Liverne, as stated supra, that she had given the promissory notes in dispute to him, and that he exhibited the notes to Minnie Baber, shortly after he informed her of the gift. Soon after that, the latter caused an attorney to investigate the gift with a view of recovering the notes, if possible. This attorney, as stated supra, obtained from the defendant the notes in question, and compared the indorsements on the notes with the handwriting of Liverne, and informed Mrs. Baber that he believed the indorsements to be genuine, [226] and he asked her at that time whether she had any reason to doubt the genuineness of the indorsements on the notes, and she answered in the negative. Mr. Huston made this investigation in 1900, about 12 years before this suit was begun. Minnie Baber knew the facts concerning said gift then as fully as she knew them in 1912, when she instituted this suit. The evidence given by her and Josephine shows that they knew as much about the case in 1900 as they did when they testified. They had the opinion of the handwriting expert to the effect that he believed the indorsements to be forgeries, but that opinion was of no value to them. They acquiesced in this gift for the period of more than 12 years after they knew as much about it as they did when they commenced this suit, and this acquiescence is laches. It is one of the principal maxims of equity jurisprudence that equity aids the vigilant and not those who slumber on their rights.

16 Cyc. page 152, says:

"No arbitrary rule exists for determining when a demand becomes stale or what delay will be excused, and the question of laches is to be decided upon the particular circumstances of each case. No greater certainty of treatment is therefore practicable than to indicate the elements generally considered. While some delay in the assertion of a right is always an essential element of laches, unreasonable delay alone, independently of any statute of limitations will often operate as a bar to relief."

The same volume, on page 158, says:

"The border land between laches proper and mere staleness of demand is found in those cases where mere lapse of time is added to an element of assent to or acquiescence in the adverse claim. Starting with the doctrine that one who has affirmatively, by words or conduct, indicated his assent to the claims of another is guilty of laches, if he thereafter, for a long time, [227] makes no assertion of his own conflicting claim, the courts apply the same rule where there has been acquiescence alone, and presume assent from lapse of time, and failure to assert their right. Particularly is this so where the plaintiff attempts to assert an interest in land after long acquiescence in defendant's possession under claim of right, or when he attempts to enforce a covenant or a condition after considerable acquiescence in continuing breaches."

In Sullivan v. Portland, etc. R. Co. 94 U. S. 807, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 324, the court says:

"To let in the defense that the claim is stale, and that the bill cannot therefore be supported, it is not necessary that a foundation be laid by any averment in the answer of the defendants. If the case, as it appears at the hearing, is liable to the objection by reason of the laches of the complainant, the court will, upon that ground, be passive and refuse relief. Every case is governed chiefly by its own circumstances; sometimes the analogy of the statute of limitations is applied; sometimes a longer period than that prescribed by statute is required; in some cases a shorter period is sufficient; sometimes the rule is applied when there is no statutable bar. It is competent for the court to apply the inherent principles of its own system of jurisprudence, and decide accordingly."

In Smith v. Clay, Ambl. (Eng.) 647, Lord Camden says:

"Nothing can demand the assistance of the court (of chancery) but conscience and reasonable diligence. Laches and neglect are discountenanced here."

In Hayward v. Eliot Nat. Bank, 96 U. S. 617, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 855, the court says:

"Courts of equity often treat a lapse of time, less than prescribed by the statute of limitations, as a presumptive bar, on the ground 'of discouraging stale claims, or gross laches, or unexplained acquiescence in the assertion of an adverse right.'"

[228] In Sedlak v. Sedlak, 14 Ore. 541, 13 Pac. 452, the court says:

"The general rule, without doubt, is that no lapse of time or delay in bringing the suit will be a bar to the remedy in equity, providing the injured party, during the interval, was ignorant of the fraud. But the ignorance of such party must not have been negligent: for if, by reasonable diligence, the fraud could have been discovered, or ought to have been known, he will be deemed guilty of laches, or of acquiescence, and equity will refuse to interfere. In many cases courts of equity act upon the analogy of the statute of limitations. But independent of this, it is a favorite doctrine of equity to allow a defense to be based on a mere lapse of time, and staleness of the claim, denominated laches; when the delay has been passive and acquiesced in for a great length of time."

If the plaintiffs had a right of suit, they should have instituted the suit a long time before they did. By delaying to commence their suit for about 12 years, they very likely made it more difficult than it otherwise would have been for the defendant to obtain evidence for his defense. After the lapse of a dozen years, facts are more or less forgotten, and proof becomes difficult.

We think that the plaintiffs have been guilty of laches sufficient to bar their right of suit.

The notes in question were the absolute property of the donor, Liverne H. Baber, and she had a legal right to dispose of them in any manner that she desired. There may be a difference of opinion as to whether she acted wisely in giving them to the man to whom she was engaged to be married. But she was the person to decide that question, and we have no authority to pass on the wisdom of her act, or to annul what she did, if she was not imposed upon by fraud or undue influence. Persons have the right to give [229] away all of their property to whomsoever they wish, and, if they do so, and the gift is not induced by fraud or undue influence, no one can legally impeach it but the creditors of the donor. Gifts are void as to creditors, as donors are required to be just before they are generous. Liverne gave the defendant about 61 per cent of her property and left the residue for the plaintiffs.

If the defendant's evidence is true, he was not guilty of any fraud or undue influence, and the property in question was given to him by Liverne as her free act, without persuasion or any influence from him. His evidence is the only testimony on the subject, and he is not impeached or discredited to any extent. His interest, however, in the result of the suit has to be considered in weighing his evidence. We cannot know what the truth is in relation to this gift. When the facts are in dispute, courts are constrained to act on probabilities, as indicated by the evidence before them.

We find that the promissory notes in question were given to the defendant by Liverne H. Baber as her free act, and that said gift was not induced by any fraud or undue influence on the part of the defendant, and that the decree of the court below is erroneous, and should be reversed.

The decree of the court below is reversed, and this suit is dismissed; but neither party shall be allowed costs or disbursements, either in this court or in the court below.

Reversed and Suit Dismissed.

NOTE.

Presumption of Undue Influence Arising from Relation of Man and Woman Engaged to Be Married.

The relation of a man and a woman who are engaged to be married, is a confidential one, and the courts will scrutinize closely any business dealing between them which operates to the disadvantage of the woman, presuming that she acts therein under the influence of the man and in reliance on his good faith. Page v. Horne, 11 Beav. (Eng.) 227; Lovesey v. Smith, 15 Ch. D. (Eng.) 656; In re Kline, 84 Pa. St. 182; Ellis v. Ellis, 1 Tenn. Ch. App. 198. See also Landes v. Landes, 206 Ill. 11, 108 N. E. 681. And see the reported case. "The rule is well established that after a marriage engagement is entered into, the relationship between the parties is a confidential or fiduciary one, and the woman is supposed to confide in the man to whom she is betrothed to deal with her fairly and justly." Martin v. Collison, 266 Ill. 172, 107 N. E. 257. "There is perhaps no relation of life in which more unbounded confidence is reposed than in that existing between parties who are betrothed to each other. Especially does the woman place the most implicit trust in the truth and affection of him in whose keeping she is about to deposit the happiness of her future life. From him she has no secrets; she believes he has none from her." Kline v. Kline, 57 Pa. St. 120, 28 Am. Dec. 206. "The relationship of parties who are about to enter into the married state, is one of mutual confidence, and far different from that of those who are dealing with each other 'at arms length.'" Pierce v. Pierce, 71 N. Y. 154, 27 Am. Rep. 22. In Gilmore v. Burch, 7 Ore. 374, 33 Am. Rep. 710, it was said obiter: "It is laid down as a rule that the influence of a man over a woman to whom he is engaged to be married is presumed to be so great that the court will look with great vigilance at the circumstances and situation of the parties, and will not only consider the influence which the intended husband, either by soothing or violence, may have used, but require satisfactory evidence that it has not been used to sustain such a conveyance."

However in Atkins v. Withers, 94 N. C. 581, the foregoing view was repudiated. "After stating various relations wherein a presumption of undue influence arises the court said: "But the learned counsel for the defendant insists, that there should be added to these classes, the relation subsisting between a lover and his affianced, and has permitted his wonted zeal, in behalf of his client, to lead him to the unchivalrous conclusion that, in that relation, the man holds the superior position, and the affianced is so much under his influence, that the law looks with suspicion upon any contract made between them, and will throw the burden of showing its fairness upon him. We know of no such principle of law, and the counsel has failed to furnish us with any authority to support his position. Fraud in such a contract, like all others not falling within one of the above-mentioned clauses, where undue influence is alleged, presents a question of fact for the jury, and the onus is on the plaintiff."

In Rockafellow v. Newcomb, 57 Ill. 186, stated at length in the reported case, a conveyance was set aside for undue influence exercised by the woman over the man, the court saying: "This man, with his fervid passion and strong love, was not well matched against an accomplished woman, in the incipient stage of their engagement. She requests, he demurs; she urges, he yields."

Corporations — Mortgage — Consent of Stockholders — Effect of Failure to Obtain.

Notwithstanding Rev. St. 1908, § 365, providing that the directors of a manufacturing corporation shall have no power to mortgage the corporation's plant until the question shall have been submitted to the stockholders, and the majority of all the shares of stock shall have been voted in favor of the proposition, a mortgage given by the directors of a manufacturing corporation, without the consent of the stockholders, is not void but voidable only at the suit of the stockholders. [See note at end of this case.]

Ultra Vires Mortgage — Enforcement.

A corporate mortgage, though ultra vires, will be enforced where the corporation received the proceeds, and the mortgagee entered into the contract, which was fully executed, in good faith.

Effect of Failure to Obtain Consent of Stockholders.

A subsequent judgment creditor of a manufacturing corporation cannot question the validity of a prior mortgage given by the directors of the corporation without the concurrence of the stockholders, where the stockholders, who could have questioned the mortgage, did not attack it; the transaction having been in good faith at least on the part of the mortgagee, and the corporation having received the proceeds of the loan.

[See note at end of this case.]

Ultra Vires Contract — Annulment — Return of Consideration.

Where the contract was fully executed on both sides, a court of equity will not set aside, as ultra vires, a mortgage given by the directors of a manufacturing corporation, which received and enjoyed the proceeds of the loan, without first ordering a return of the consideration.

Error to District Court, El Paso county: SHEAFOR, Judge.

Action for cancellation and annulment of trust deed. Helen T. Myers et al., plaintiffs, and Florence A. Dillon, administratrix, substituted for John K. Dillon, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Robert Kerr for plaintiff in error.

Franklin E. Brooks and Michael B. Hurley for defendants in error.

[493] SCOTT, J.—The Rocky Mountain Can Company, a Colorado corporation, on the 5th day of March, 1908, borrowed from John K. Dillon the sum of $4,000, and thereupon executed and delivered to said Dillon its promissory note in that amount, and to secure the payment thereof, executed and delivered to the Public Trustee of El Paso county, its trust deed covering certain of its property, which trust deed was immediately filed for public record.

The note was payable two years after date. Interest payments were made for one year, but the corporation thereafter made default in its interest payments, and taxes, and as provided in the trust deed, and on the 19th day of October, 1909, the premises were sold at Public Trustee's sale. Dillon purchased the property at such sale for the sum of $4,291.91, being the amount due on the note, with interest and costs. Thereafter the Public Trustee issued his trustee's deed conveying the premises to Dillon. The proceedings in the foreclosure sale, [494] and in the issuance of the deed, were in all respects regular. The contention of the defendants in error, is that the trust deed, so executed, was not only void, but wholly without effect, as against all persons, and that there can be no relief in equity to innocent injured persons, in such a case.

Before the execution and delivery of the trustee's deed, but after the expiration of the period for redemption, this action was instituted.

The complaint alleged in substance that the name of the corporation was changed, after the transaction with Dillon, to "The Rocky Mountain Manufacturing Company," and that on September 29, 1909, the plaintiffs, Myers and McDonald, obtained a judgment against the corporation in the sum of $2,186.03, and that a transcript thereof was on the following day, filed with the County Clerk and Recorder.

It is then alleged that the corporation executed and delivered the said trust deed unlawfully and without authority, in that such corporation was a manufacturing corporation, and the trust deed was made without the consent of the stockholders. The prayer was for the cancellation and annulment of the trust deed and all proceedings under it. Dillon died during the pendency of the action, and his widow, Florence A. Dillon, as administratrix, was substituted as party defendant.

It clearly appears that the transaction between the company and Dillon was in perfect good faith upon the part of Dillon at least. The sum of money which the trust deed was given to secure was received by the company and used by it in the conduct of its business, and in the improvement of its property. Neither the loan, nor the trust deed to secure it, was authorized at any meeting of the stockholders of the company. It appears that the officers of the company believed at the time, that [495] the corporation had power under its charter to execute the trust deed, without the consent of the stockholders. Neither the corporation nor any stockholder thereof, has ever questioned, and does not now question, or object to the validity of the transaction.

The plaintiffs below, defendants in error, rely upon that portion of Section 865 Rev. Stat. 1908, as follows:

"The board of directors or trustees of a mining or manufacturing corporation shall not have power to encumber the mines or plant of such corporation, or the principal machinery incident to the production from such mine or plant until the question shall have been submitted at a proper and legal meeting of the stockholders and a majority of all the shares of stock shall have been voted in favor of such proposition; and any mortgaging or incumbering of such property, without such consent shall be absolutely void, and the vote upon such proposition shall be entered on the minutes of the corporation."

The trust deed covered the building of the company erected for a proposed manufacturing plant.

1. The plaintiff in error, contends that the corporation was not a manufacturing corporation within the meaning of the statute; but on the contrary that its real purpose was to conduct a general real estate business, and with express power conferred by its charter, to do the very thing it did do in this instance.

The purposes for which the corporation was organized as recited in the articles of incorporation, are:

First:—To buy, sell, exchange, hold, own, acquire, and encumber real estate and personal property, to buy, sell, exchange, hold, own, acquire and encumber a certain invention for improvement in oil and gasoline cans under Latest Patent dated January 10, 1905, No. 779, 983, and any and all improvements that may be made to or upon said invention within the states of Colorado and Wyoming and the territory of New Mexico.

[496] Second:—To erect and operate manufacturing for the purpose of manufacturing oil and gasoline cans, to sell and deal in said cans after the same are manufactured, to manufacture and sell said cans according to any improvements that may be made upon the invention hereinbefore mentioned.

Third:—To mortgage, encumber and pledge the real estate and personal property and privileges or franchises belonging to the said company, or any part thereof, for the funds with which to purchase real estate, erect buildings and manufacture and deal in said cans, and also for the purpose of acquiring other property.

Fourth:—To pay cash or issue full-paid and non-assessable stock for and in exchange for real and personal property, to manufacture and deal in other articles than the said cans hereinbefore mentioned, and to do a general manufacturing business, in other articles similar to said cans, and generally to prosecute, do and perform any and all business and to do any and all things that may in any wise be necessary, convenient, incidental and appurtenant, or either, to the powers, purposes or objects for which this company is organized; and to do and perform any and all other acts and things in connection therewith which a natural person might or could do; and which a corporation is not prohibited by law from doing, as the Directors of our said Company may deem expedient and proper.

The good faith purpose of the incorporators to engage in a legitimate manufacturing enterprise may be seriously questioned. The corporation was organized by a firm of real estate dealers. Its original capital stock authorized by the charter was $6,000, but before it transacted any business, this was increased to $300,000. The conduct of the corporation makes it appear to have been a promotion scheme pure and simple. Its first and principle [497] operations were to trade its corporation stock for real estate of any kind, and located in no particular state or locality.

It manufactured none of the cans mentioned in the charter. Its manufacturing operations were confined to the plating of certain wares, for use in hotels and similar places; and the making of lamps, trays, etc., and this in a limited way. It contracted with the plaintiffs below for the right to manufacture iceless refrigerators, upon the basis of a royalty, and upon which plaintiffs seem to have had a patent, or some rights under a patent, and it is upon this contract that the plaintiffs obtained the default judgment upon which they rely, and which judgment was rendered after the company had failed, and its officers had left the county. But it did not manufacture any such refrigerators in its building, though it had some samples made by others. It constructed a large building and installed certain machinery, which latter seems to have been removed afterward, by those who sold it to the company, because of non-payment, and which machinery was never in operation. The whole scheme was plainly either in fraud, or it was an iridescent dream.

It may be assumed for the purposes of the case, but not decided, that the corporation was technically a manufacturing corporation, and that the building so encumbered was its plant. What has been said is for the purpose of throwing light upon the equities of the parties rather than to determine this question:

It will be seen that the trust deed was executed and recorded on the 5th day of March, 1909, and that plaintiff's judgment was rendered September 29, 1909, or about eighteen months afterward.

2. The question remaining to be considered is as to what are the rights of the parties under the state of facts presented, conceding the company to have been a manufacturing [498] corporation. The case of Beecher v. Marquette, etc. Rolling Mill Co. 45 Mich. 193, 7 N. W. 695, involved a similar statute to ours. That was an action to foreclose a mortgage executed by a corporation without the consent of the stockholders, and the provision of the statute considered, was as follows:

"That no alienation, diversion, sale or mortgage of any or any part of the mine works, real estate or franchise of any corporation mentioned in the first section of this act shall have any force or effect, or pass any title thereto, or interest therein, unless expressly authorized by the vote of three-fifths in interest of the entire stock of said company actually present or legally represented at some meeting of stockholders called and notified."

Judge Cooley, the writer of the opinion, there said:

"Courts often speak of acts and contracts as void when they mean no more than that some party concerned has a right to avoid them. Legislators sometimes use language with equal want of exact accuracy; and when they say that some act or contract shall not be of any force or effect, mean perhaps no more than this: That at the option of those for whose benefit the provision was made it shall be voidable, and have no force or effect as against his interests. This was found to be the meaning in the mind of the legislature in enacting the Massachusetts usury law. It was declared in most positive terms that mortgages on usurious considerations should be utterly void; but a consideration of its purpose, which was to protect debtors against the enforcement of unconscionable demands, made it clear that it never was intended that strangers to the title should be at liberty to question such a mortgage.—Green v. Kemp, 13 Mass. 515, 7 Am. Dec. 169. Mr. Justice Bayley in one case intimated that the word void in a statute might be construed voidable where the provision is introduced for the [499] benefit of parties only, but not where it is introduced for public purposes and to protect those who are incapable of protecting themselves (Rex v. Hipswell, 8 B. & C. 466, 470 [15 E. C. L. 267]), and though this distinction has been questioned (Rex v. St. Gregory, 2 Ad. & El. 99, 107 [29 E. C. L. 42]), much good reason lies at the foundation of it. If it is apparent that an act is prohibited and declared void on grounds of general policy, we must suppose the legislative intent to be that it shall be void to all intents; while if the manifest intent is to give protection to determine individuals who are sui juris, the purpose is sufficiently accomplished if they are given the liberty of avoiding it. A statute would strike blindly if the letter alone were to be regarded, not the spirit. A statute declares that certain indentures not made as by the statute provided should be clearly void in law to all intents and purposes; and it was nevertheless held that, if acted upon, the apprentice gained a settlement thereby.—St. Nicholas v. St. Peter, Stra. (Eng.) 1086. And in Ohio a purchase at a judicial sale by one who acted as appraiser of the property, though the statute declared it should be considered fraudulent and void, was held to be voidable only on an interposition or proceeding by a party in interest, directly for the purpose of avoiding it.—Terrill v. Auchauer, 14 Ohio St. 80. This subject is considered at length and many authorities examined in State v. Richmond, 26 N. H. 232, to which we refer.

The statute now under consideration was passed to protect the interests of stockholders in mining companies. It intends that their mining property shall not be conveyed away or mortgaged except by their deliberate action after they have been notified of a proposal to do so, and have had time to deliberate upon and fully consider it. But the matter does not concern the public at large; no principle of public policy is at stake; no wrong [500] direct or indirect, is done to any human being, if conveyance is made or mortgage given without the exact notice required unless it be a wrong to the stockholders themselves. And as others are not concerned, why should the statute give them the right to raise questions of regularity which the stockholders elect to waive? We are satisfied such was not its purpose."

The doctrine thus announced, has been adopted and the reasoning approved by text writers and by the courts, now in all jurisdictions, though the contrary has been held in some instance, notably in the earlier cases in Pekin Mining, etc. Co. v. Kennedy, 81 Cal. 356, 22 Pac. 679; McShane v. Carter, 80 Cal. 310, 22 Pac. 178.

Counsel for defendants in error, cite Williams v. Gaylord, 186 U. S. 157, 46 U. S. (L. ed.) 1102, 22 S. Ct. 798. This was not the independent judgment of that court. The case arose in California and the decision was based upon the rule of plenary power of the state court, to construe a statute of the state, and it was therefore held that the case of McShane v. Carter, supra, was controlling in that case.

The Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of Louisville Trust Co. v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 75 Fed. 433, 43 U. S. App. 550, 22 C. C. A. 378, Judge Taft speaking for the court said:

"Referring to the same proviso as that considered in the Zabriske Case, the supreme court of New York, in Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. 41 Barb. 9-24, said that 'these provisos were intended for the protection of the shareholders, and relate rather, to the mode or manner of the execution of the power.' This view of the purpose and effect of such a provision is enforced by the construction put by the Supreme Court of the United States on a statute of Illinois much more emphatic and prohibitory in form than [501] that here in controversy, in St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Terre Haute, etc. R. Co. 145 U. S. 393, 12 S. Ct. 953, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 748. The act there provided that it should not be lawful for a railroad company of Illinois to lease a railroad in another state without having first obtained the written consent of all the stockholders of said roads residing in the state of Illinois, and any contract for such lease made without having first obtained said written consent should be null and void. Of this, the supreme court, speaking by Mr. Justice Gray, said: 'Although this statute in terms, declares that any such lease made without the written consent of the Illinois stockholders, 'shall be null and void,' it would seem to have been enacted for the protection of such stockholders alone, and intended to be availed of by them only. It did not limit the scope of the powers conferred upon the corporation by law, and excess of which could not be satisfied by estoppel, but only prescribed regulations as to the manner of exercising corporate powers, compliance with which the stockholders might waive, or the corporation might be estopped, by lapse of time or otherwise, to deny.' Mr. Justice Harland, at the circuit, took the same view of a similar statute in Hervey v. Illinois Midland R. Co. 28 Fed. 169, 174."

The court then quotes with approval the language of Judge Cooley in Beecher v. Marquette, etc. Rolling Mill Co. supra, here-fore cited. The principle announced in these cases has been recognized by this court. In Denver Fire Ins. Co. v. McClelland, 9 Colo. 11, 9 Pac. 771, 39 Am. Rep. 134, the court said:

"Corporations have the capacity to do wrong, and may overstep the limits placed by the law to their powers, and when they violate their charters in this respect their acts are illegal, but not necessarily void.—Bissell v. Michigan Southern, etc. R. Co. 22 N. Y. 258. The plea of ultra vires is not to be understood as an absolute and peremptory defense in all cases of excess of power without regard to other circumstances and considerations. The plea is not to be entertained where its allowance will do great wrong to innocent third persons.

Bissell v. Michigan, Southern, etc. R. Co. 22 N. Y. 258. Where a certain act is prohibited by statute, its performance is to be held void because such is the legislative will. So where the consideration of a contract is by law illegal, as where the cause of action arises ex turpi. But where the act is not wrong per se, where the contract is for a lawful purpose in itself, has been entered into with good faith, and fairly executed by the party who seeks to enforce it, we must assent to the doctrine of those authorities which hold that the excess of the corporate powers of the contracting party which has received the benefit of the contract is an unconscionable defense, which may not be set up to exempt from liability the party so pleading it. And such, we think, is the case before us."

The principle which would seem to control in the case at bar is admirably stated in the joint concurring opinion of Beck, C. J., and Melm, J., in that case.

It will be observed that there is a distinction usually made by the authorities, as between executory, and fully executed contracts, as applicable to the doctrine of ultra vires. It was said in Denver Fire Ins. Co. v. McClelland, supra, that "he executed dealings of corporations must be allowed to stand when the plainest rules of good faith require."

It is said by Thompson in his work on corporations:

"It is a principle of universal application that whenever an illegal, immoral, or prohibited contract has been fully executed on both sides, the law will not lend its aid to either of the parties for the purpose of unraveling it and enabling him to recover what he may have lost [503] through it. In such cases the governing maxim is, in pari delicto, potior est conditio defendentis. When therefore, a contract with a corporation, the making of which is beyond its granted powers, has been fully executed by both parties, neither of them can assert its invalidity as a ground of relief against it."—Thompson on Corp. Secs. 6023-6024.

It is said by Bouvier, vol. 2, 1152, under the title of ultra vires;

"There is said to be a tendency of the courts based upon the strongest principles of justice, to enforce contracts against corporations, although in entering into them they have exceeded their chartered powers, where they have received the consideration and the benefit of the contract; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Howard, 7 Wall. 392, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 117; National Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 188. See Campbell v. Argenta Gold, etc. Min. Co. 51 Fed. 1; Sherman Center Town Co. v. Fletcher, 46 Kan. 524, 26 Pac. 951; and the rule that the charter of a corporation is to be construed strictly against the grantee does not apply to a case where the corporation seeks to repudiate contracts whereof it has enjoyed the benefits, or where such contracts are attacked by creditors after the corporation became insolvent; Tod v. Kentucky Union Land Co. 57 Fed. 47; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Union Pac. Co. 47 Fed. 22. The doctrine of ultra vires, when invoked for or against a corporation, should not be allowed to prevail where it would defeat the ends of justice or work a legal wrong; Ohio, etc. R. Co. v. McCarthy, 98 U. S. 258, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 693. The executed dealings of corporations should be allowed to stand for and against both parties, when good faith so requires; Bissell v. Michigan Southern, etc. R. Co. 22 N. Y. 258, 494; Whitney Arms Co. v. Barlow, 63 N. Y. 62. Where a corporation has entered into a contract which has been fully executed on the other part, and nothing remains but the payment by the corporation [504] of the consideration, it will not be allowed to set up that the contract was ultra vires; Oil Creek, etc. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Transp. Co. 83 Pa. St. 160. Corporations should be restricted so far as courts can, in the exercise of their powers, limit them; but the plea is not a gracious one, that a contract which they have deliberately made, and of which they have received the full benefit, is void for want of power in them to make it."

The contract in the present case, between the company and Dillon, was fully executed. Clearly then under the rule thus stated, the company cannot raise the question of ultra vires. The plaintiffs below had knowledge of the transaction involved, at the time of their dealings with the corporation and upon which their judgment was obtained. They became creditors subsequent to the delivery and recording of the trust deed.

It is also held that where a corporation has waived or omitted to exercise the right to institute proceedings to recover lands, even in case of fraud, such right does not inure to the benefit of subsequent creditors or purchasers, clearly not in case of a good faith transaction.—Graham v. La Crosse, etc. R. Co. 102 U. S. 148, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 106. It has been held also, that one holding a valid second mortgage, not made expressly subject to an invalid mortgage, cannot maintain an action for the cancellation of the void mortgage, and thus to remove a cloud upon the title.—Com. v. Smith, 10 Allen (Mass.) 448, 87 Am. Dec. 672.

In Gordon v. Preston, 1 Watts (Pa.) 385, 26 Am. Dec. 75, it was said:

"Now the validity of this mortgage is unquestioned by the corporation, even at this day, though its existence has all along been known to the corporate officers whose duty it was to disavow it, had there been an intent to contest it. The corporation then being satisfied with [505] it, who has a right to object? . . . Then, granting the defendant as a judgment creditor, to have succeeded to the rights and capacity of the corporation, his succession did not occur till after more than eight months from the performance of the act, during all which time the corporation was silent, though the absent members had notice of the mortgage by the minutes. At the period of the defendant's succession, then the time for objection had gone by, and if it had not, still even he was quiescent till about the time of awarding the issue in which the validity of the mortgage is drawn into question. To disaffirm it now, when every opportunity of obtaining any other security is lost, would be unconscionable: and the act, therefore, though originally unauthorized, must be taken to have been subsequently ratified."—Campbell v. Argenta Gold, etc. Min. Co. (C. C.) 51 Fed. 1; Head v. Horn, 18 Cal. 211; Boston, etc. Copper, etc. Min. Co. v. Montana Ore-Purchasing Co. (C. C.) 89 Fed. 529; Beach v. Wakefield, 107 Ia. 567, 76 N. W. 688, 78 N. W. 197; Tyrell v. Cairo, etc. R. Co. 7 Mo. App. 294; De Kay v. Voorhis, 36 N. J. Eq. 37; Com. v. Smith, 10 Allen (Mass.) 448, 87 Am. Dec. 672; Boyce v. Montauk Gas Coal Co. 37 W. Va. 73, 16 S. E. 501; Jones on the Law of Real Property in Conveyancing, § 153; Beach on Private Corporations, § 744.

We must hold therefore that the plaintiffs below have no right to maintain this suit in equity. In the comparatively recent case of Westerlund v. Black Bear Min. Co. 203 Fed. 599, 121 C. C. A. 627, will be found a most careful and exhaustive review of the authorities upon this subject. This case had under consideration the Colorado statute. Two distinct propositions are there laid down, which seem irrefutable, either in reason or upon authority, and which we quote. The first of these is;

[506] "Another principle of law so firmly established as to be no longer debatable, is that an act or contract of a corporation, which is beyond the scope of its corporate powers, an act that it cannot lawfully do in any way or manner under any circumstances, is incapable of ratification by estoppel or otherwise, and the corporation itself may challenge it. But an act or contract of a corporation which is within its general corporate powers, which is neither wrong in itself nor against public policy, but which is defective from a failure to observe in its execution a requirement of law enacted for the benefit or protection of a third party or parties, is avoidable only. Such an act or contract is valid, until avoided, not void until validated, and it is subject to ratification and estoppel.—Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 139 U. S. 24, 60, 11 S. Ct. 478, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 55; Campbell v. Argenta Gold, etc. Min. Co. (C. C.) 51 Fed. 1, 8; Zabriskie v. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. 28 How. 391, 308, 16 U. S. (L. ed.) 468; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Terre Haute, etc. R. Co. 145 U. S. 393, 402, 408, 12 S. Ct. 953, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 748; Boston, etc. Copper, etc. Min. Co. v. Montana Ore-Purchasing Co. (C. C.) 89 Fed. 529, 530; Miners' Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 543, 578, 99 Am. Dec. 369; Bishop v. Kent, etc. Co. 20 R. I. 680, 684, 41 Atl. 255; Beecher v. Marquette, etc. Rolling Mill Co. 45 Mich. 103, 105, 108, 109, 7 N. W. 695; Eastman v. Parkinson, 133 Wis. 375, 113 N. W. 649, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 921, 928, 929, 930; Campbell v. Argenta Gold, etc. Min. Co. (C. C.) 51 Fed. 1, 8; Zabriskie v. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. 28 How. 391, 308, 16 U. S. (L. ed.) 468; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Terre Haute, etc. R. Co. 145 U. S. 393, 402, 408, 12 S. Ct. 953, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 748; Boston, etc. Copper, etc. Min. Co. v. Montana Ore-Purchasing Co. (C. C.) 89 Fed. 529, 530; Miners' Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 543, 578, 99 Am. Dec. 369; Bishop v. Kent, etc. Co. 20 R. I. 680, 684, 41 Atl. 255; Beecher v. Marquette, etc. Rolling Mill Co. 45 Mich. 103, 105, 108, 109, 7 N. W. 695; Eastman v. Parkinson, 133 Wis. 375, 113 N. W. 649, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 921, 928, 929, 930; State v. Richmond, 26 N. H. 232; Rochester Sav. Bank v. Averell, 96 N. Phalen*, 128 Pa. St. 110, 118, 18 Atl. 428; Thomas v. Citizens' Horse R. Co. 104 Ill. 462, 467."

The second proposition is as follows:

[507] "But a corporation which has executed and accepted the benefits of a contract within the scope of its powers, that is neither wrong in itself nor against public policy, and that is defective only because in its execution the corporation has failed to comply with some legal requirement enacted for the sole benefit of third persons, is estopped to assail it, and the beneficiaries of the requirement alone may avoid it. Hence the stockholders of this corporation, and they alone, have the right to avoid this lease because they alone had any interest in a compliance with the legal requirement that they should assent to its execution.—Hervey v. Illinois Midland R. Co. (C. C.) 28 Fed. 169, 174; In re New York Economical Printing Co. 110 Fed. 514, 519, 49 U. S. A. 133; Rogers v. Nashville, etc. R. Co. 91 Fed. 299, 304, 307, 314, 315, Parkinson*, 133 Wis. 375, 113 N. W. 649, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 921, 928, 929, 930; Campbell v. Argenta Gold, etc. Min. Co. (C. C.) 51 Fed. 1, 8; Wood v. Waterwoods Co. (C. C.) 44 Fed. 146, 150, 12 L.R.A. 148; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Terre Haute, R. Co. 145 U. S. 393, 402, 408, 12 S. Ct. 953, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 748; Antietam Paper Co. v. Chronicle-Pub. Co. 115 N. C. 143, 145, 20 S. E. 366; Alabama Iron, etc. Co. v. McKeever, 112 Ala. 134, 145, 20 So. 84; Bishop v. Kent, etc. Co. 20 R. I. 680, 684, 686, 41 Atl. 255; McKee v. Title Ins. etc. Co. 159 Cal. 206, 113 Pac. 140; Nelson v. Hubbard, 96 Ala. 238, 11 So. 428, 433, 17 L.R.A. 375; Barrett v. Pollak Co. 108 Ala. 390, 18 So. 615, 620, 54 Am. St. Rep. 172; Jones on Real Property, § 153; 2 Beach on Private Corporations, p. 1165, § 744."

It is contended by defendants that in the Carlsbad Water Co. v. New, 33 Colo. 389, 81 Pac. 34, this [508] court intended to and did adopt the doctrine of the early California cases. A consideration of that case discloses that the principal question was as to whether or not the Carlsbad Water Company, was a manufacturing corporation within the meaning of the statute. There are but two sentences contained in the opinion that may be said to have bearing upon the question here. These are:

"It was competent for appellant trustee to question the validity of the mortgage.—In re Antigo Screen Door Co. 123 Fed. 249, 254, 59 C. C. A. 248; McShane v. Carter, 80 Cal. 310, 22 Pac. 178; Pekin Mining, etc. Co. v. Kennedy, 81 Cal. 356, 22 Pac. 679. . . . For the reason above assigned—want of proper authority from the corporation for the execution of the mortgage—the same was void, and the following authorities sustain this conclusion.—Duke v. Markham, 105 N. C. 131, 10 S. E. 1017; Mannhardt v. Illinois Staats Zeitung Co. 90 Ill. App. 315; McShane v. Carter, supra; Vail v. Hamilton, 85 N. Y. 453."

There was no attempt to support either of these statements by reason, and with the exception of the now overruled California cases, the authorities cited do not in any sense support the contention of the defendant in error here.

The now uniform holding of the courts of this country, that the provisions of the statute were for the benefit of stockholders only, and that they alone, may question the validity of a transfer or encumbrance made in violation of the statute, was not raised nor argued in that case. The court of appeals in Firestone Coal Co. v. McKissick, 24 Colo.

App. 294, 134 Pac. 147, in distinguishing that case, speaking through Presiding Judge Cunningham, said:

"But it does not appear from the opinion that the point raised by Judge Sanborn in the Westerlund case, [509] viz: that only the stockholders of the corporation, for whose benefit the section of the statute was passed, could invoke its provisions, was in any manner called to the attention of or considered by our supreme court in connection with the Carlsbad Water Company case. We have examined the briefs filed in the Carlsbad case, both the original briefs and those filed on rehearing, without being able to discover that this matter was even mooted in that case."

A further examination of the record and briefs in the Water Company case, fully justifies such statement. The sole question presented to the court was that of ultra vires because of the prohibition of the statute, and not as to whom may be entitled to raise that question. Clearly these statements of the law were made without sufficient consideration and without being properly before the court. While the bare statement by the court, that a trustee in bankruptcy may question the validity of the mortgage, was then sustained by the California case cited, that doctrine has since been repudiated by the supreme court of that state. In McKee v. Title Ins. etc. Co. 159 Cal. 206, 113 Pac. 140, the court said:

"He is not suing in behalf of the stockholders, or in their interest, and, there being no fraud, he stands in the shoes of the corporation with regard to the bonds. The corporation has received the money obtained by means of the bonds, and has applied it to the payment of its debts and the completion of the hotel. The money has thus inured to the benefit of the corporation and its stockholders, and of the general creditors also, since it has unquestionably given a substantial value to a structure which would otherwise be comparatively worthless. The corporation is therefore estopped to dispute the validity of the bonds and the creditors are likewise bound thereby. The real point of the objection is that the manner [510] of issuing the bonds was so defective that the transaction was ultra vires, and void notwithstanding that the corporation received and holds the benefits thereof. In regard to a similar claim the New York court of appeals said: 'That kind of plunder which holds on to the property, but pleads ultra vires against the obligation to pay for it, has no recognition or support in the laws of this state.' (Seymour v. Spring Forest Cemetery Ass'n, 144 N. Y. 333, 39 N. E. 366, 26 L.R.A. 859.) The following cases declare that neither the corporation nor its creditors can, under like circumstances to those here existing and under similar provisions of the law, maintain such an attack on bonds irregularly issued, and that the provisions of such laws are for the protection of stockholders only.—Anderson v. Bullock County Bank, 123 Ala. 275, 25 So. 523; Bishop v. Kent, etc. Co. 20 R. I. 685, 41 Atl. 257; Rochester Sav. Bank v. Averell, 86 N. Y. 475; Paulding v. Chrome Steel Co. 94 N. Y. 384; In re New York Economical Printing Co. 110 Fed. 519, 40 C. C. A. 133; Hervey v. Illinois Midland R. Co. (C. C.) 28 Fed. 174; Manhattan Hardware Co. v. Phalen, 128 Pa. St. 110, 18 Atl. 428; Wood v. Corry Water Works Co. 44 Fed. 150, 12 L.R.A. 169; Nelson v. Hubbard, 96 Ala. 252, 11 So. 428, 17 L.R.A. 375; Eastman v. Parkinson, 138 Wis. 375, 113 N. W. 640, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 921. In Boyd v. Heron, 125 Cal. 453, 58 Pac. 64, it was a stockholder who made the objection and it was in defense to a suit to enforce his individual liability as such stockholder. It comes clearly within the rule that the provision is for the benefit of stockholders and it does not conflict with the cases just cited."

The action in the Carlsbad case was to foreclose a mortgage executed by New, as vice-president of the company to Young as an individual, but who was at the time its president, and who transferred the mortgage to Maud New, wife of the vice-president, who instituted the suit. [511] Both New and Young as the chief executive officers of the company and constituting a majority of its board of directors, must have conclusively presumed to know of the absence of authority by the stockholders. Equity does not look with favor upon such a transaction.

One of the strongest claims for the interposition of equity in the case at bar, and others cited to sustain it, is that the mortgagee was an innocent party, acting in good faith and without knowledge of the failure of the corporation to comply with the term of the charter or statute. But a careful examination of the additional authorities cited by the court in the Carlsbad case, makes it plain that these do not support the conclusion contended for by defendants.

In re Antigo Screen Door Co. supra, the question whether or not a corporation, its creditors or assignee, had the right to question the validity of an incumbrance for its lack of the requisite assent of the stockholders, was neither presented nor considered. The question there was whether or not a trustee in bankruptcy could assail a chattel mortgage which was fraudulent as to creditors, and the court held that he could.

In Duke v. Markham, supra, and in Mannhardt v. Illinois Staats Zeitung Co. supra, the question here was neither raised, considered nor decided. In the Westerlund case the court considers the Carlsbad case as contrary to the conclusion there stated, but says of it:

"The result is that, laying aside the overruled California cases, but one opinion in Carlsbad Water Co. v. New, 33 Colo. 389, 81 Pac. 34, in which the question here at issue was presented, considered, and decided, has come to our attention in which it has been held that a corporation has the right to challenge its otherwise valid contract, on the ground that it was made without the required assent of its stockholders. That decision is fortified [512] by no argument or reason and by no authorities that have not been overruled."

It is inconceivable that the court in Carlsbad Water Co. v. New, 33 Colo. 389, 81 Pac. 34, intended to squarely overrule the doctrine of Denver Fire Ins. Co. v. McClelland, 9 Colo. 11, 9 Pac. 771, 59 Am. Rep. 134, without so much as offering a reason for so doing. The latter case is not cited in the briefs filed, and presumably not otherwise called to the attention of the court. It is even more to be doubted that with the question fairly presented, the court would have ignored entirely the vast array of decisions of our courts, both State and Federal, including the Supreme Court of the United States holding to the contrary.

By reason of the state of facts presented in the Carlsbad case, upon which the decision was rendered, and because of the overwhelming weight of authority against the conclusion there stated upon the question here considered, we cannot consider that case as controlling.

It is an unquestioned rule that a court of equity in the absence of fraud, will not set aside a contract that has been fully executed and closed on both sides, where each party has received and holds the proceeds and consideration for the contract, without first ordering a return to each party of the consideration, paid by it, and thereby placing the respective parties as near as may be in status quo. The record shows that the plaintiff in error here has tendered an adjustment in accord with this principle.

Under this rule, the Dillon estate, being in possession of the real estate under the trust deed, and the Public Trustees' deed based thereon, must be held to have a prior equitable lien on the premises for the amount of the loan, even though the mortgage be regarded as void.—Madison Ave. Baptist Church v. Baptist Church, 73 N. Y. 82.

To permit the judgment creditors to recover under such circumstances would in the language of the New York court, Seymour v. Spring Forest Cemetery Ass'n, 144 N. Y. [513] 333, 39 N. E. 385, 26 L.R.A. 859, be to sanction a species of plunder which has no recognition or support in law or equity.

The judgment is reversed with instructions to enter judgment for the defendant below.

Right of Creditor to Object to Mortgage of Property of Corporation Made without Required Consent of Stockholders.

A creditor has ordinarily no right to object to a mortgage of the property of a corporation because a statutory requirement of the consent of the stockholders to a mortgage is not strictly complied with. Such a requirement is solely for the protection of the stockholders.

Thus in Firth Co. v. South Carolina Loan, etc. Co. 122 Fed. 569, 59 C. C. A. 73, it was held that the general creditors of a corporation could not impeach the validity of bonds issued by it on account of informalities at a meeting of the stockholders authorizing the issuance. The court said: "Was there such a formal and legal meeting of the stockholders as is required by law to be held, before the mortgage could be given? The court below reviewed the testimony on this point, and answered this query in the affirmative. Upon examining the testimony, we fully concur with the court below. Even were there informalities, we would not lay any stress on them. All the formalities required to be used before bonds of corporations are issued are for the protection of stockholders." In Bishop v. Kent, etc. Co., 20 R. I. 680, 41 Atl. 255, the court said: "The only remaining question which we need to consider, therefore, is whether the creditors of the corporation, who are represented by the assignee, can take advantage of the defect in the mortgage. The answer to this question depends upon the construction to be put upon the charter provision above recited. Does it include creditors, or does it apply solely to the stockholders of the corporation? We think, as already intimated, that it was enacted solely for the protection and benefit of the stockholders, and hence that creditors of the corporation cannot be heard to question the validity of the mortgage on the ground that the requisite amount of stock was not represented." So in Hervey v. Illinois Midland R. Co. 28 Fed. 169, it was said: "The provision in the act of 1872, making the assent of a given number of stockholders essential to the validity of a mortgage, is primarily, if not exclusively, for the benefit of stockholders. If it be conceded that stockholders of a railroad corporation, formed under the act of 1872, could, as against bona fide holders of bonds secured by a mortgage executed by such corporation, defeat a mortgage not executed with the expressed assent of the requisite number of stockholders, it does not follow that the creditors of the corporation could raise any such question." Likewise in Barrett v. Pollak Co. 108 Ala. 390, 18 So. 615, 54 Am. St. Rep. 372, it was held that a statute prohibiting the pledge of its property save in the manner prescribed therein, was enacted for the benefit of stockholders and could not be invoked by a creditor of the corporation. And in Beecher v. Marquette, etc. Rolling Mill Co. 45 Mich. 102, 7 N. W. 695, the court said: "The statute now under consideration was passed to protect the interests of stockholders in mining companies. It intends that their mining property shall not be conveyed away or mortgaged except by their deliberate action after they have been notified of a proposal to do so, and have had time to deliberate upon and fully consider it. But the matter does not concern the public at large; no principle of public policy is at stake; no wrong, direct or indirect, is done to any human being if conveyance is made or mortgage given without the exact notice required, unless it be a wrong to the stockholders themselves. And as others are not concerned, why should the statute give them the right to raise questions of regularity which the stockholders elect to waive? We are satisfied such was not its purpose."

MURPHY

V.

VILLAGE OF FORT EDWARD.

New York Court of Appeals—January 12, 1915.

213 N. Y. 397; 107 N. E. 716.

Municipal Corporations — Failure to File Claim — Infancy as Excuse.

General Village Law (Consol. Laws, c. 64) § 341, provides that no action shall be maintained against a village for injuries by reason of the negligence, etc., unless commenced within one year after the cause of action accrued, nor unless, within 60 days thereafter, a written verified statement, etc., shall be filed with the village clerk. Held that, where a child of five was injured by the alleged negligence of a village, the fact of infancy did not incapacitate the infant from bringing a suit at once under Code Civ. Proc. § 468, providing that an infant's right of action shall not be deferred on account of infancy; and hence the cause of action accrued at the time of the injury, and not from the date of the subsequent appointment of a guardian ad litem.

[See note at end of this case.]

Summary.

Where an infant five years of age was injured by the alleged negligence of a village on September 28, 1910, its right of action is not barred because it did not file the notice required by General Village Law, § 341, within the 60 days required by such section, nor until August 5, 1912, under the rule that the law does not seek to compel a man to do that which he cannot possibly perform; the failure of the father or mother to file the notice not being chargeable to the infant.

[See note at end of this case.]

Murphy v. Fort Edward, 159 N. Y. App. Div. 471, affirmed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Third Judicial Department.

Action for damages. Celia Murphy, infant, by Mary Ann Murphy, her guardian ad litem, plaintiff, and Village of Fort Edward, defendant. Judgment for defendant at Trial Term of Supreme Court. Judgment reversed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Dependant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Wyman S. Boston for appellant.
Erskine C. Rogers for respondent.

[399] COLLIN, J.—The action is for negligence. The infant plaintiff was, when injured on September 28, 1910, five years old. The question presented arises from a failure of the plaintiff to comply with section 341 of the General Village Law (Laws of 1909, chap. 64; Cons. Laws, ch. 64). The language of the section is:

"No action shall be maintained against the village for damages for a personal injury or an injury to property alleged to have been sustained by reason of the negligence of the village or of any officer, agent or employee thereof, unless the same shall be commenced within one year after the cause of action therefor shall have accrued nor unless a written verified statement of the nature of the claim and of the time and place at which such injury is alleged to have been received shall have been filed with the village clerk within sixty days after the cause of action shall have accrued. An action on such a claim shall not be commenced until the expiration of thirty days after it is presented."

A written verified statement under and complying with the requirements of the section, except the requirement that it be filed within sixty days after the cause of action shall have accrued, was filed August 5, 1912; that is, about twenty-three months after the injury. The appellant presents the sole question (duly preserved by an [400] exception to the admission of the statement in evidence) whether or not the failure to file the statement within sixty days after the injury is a bar to the maintenance of the action.

The plaintiff was defeated in a former action against the Delaware and Hudson Company to recover for this injury. (See 151 App. Div. 351.) Her mother, her guardian ad litem in this action, was appointed her guardian ad litem for the purposes of that action, October 20, 1910. That action was commenced November 18, 1910. Her mother was appointed guardian ad litem for the purposes of this action August 8, 1912. This action was commenced October 14th, 1912.

In Winter v. Niagara Falls, 190 N. Y. 198, 202, 13 Ann. Cas. 486, 82 N. E. 1101, 123 Am. St. Rep. 540, the statutory provision under consideration was: "All claims for damages founded upon alleged negligence of the city shall be presented to the common council, in writing, within thirty days after the occurrence causing such damages; and the omission to present any claim in the manner, or within the time, in this section provided shall be a bar to an action against the city therefor." Judge Gray, writing for the court, said: "The provision, therefore, became an essential part of a complainant's cause of action and compliance with its requirement was a fact to be alleged and proved, like any other condition precedent to the existence of an obligation. (Reining v. Buffalo, 102 N. Y. 308; Curry v. Buffalo, 185 N. Y. 366; MacMullen v. Middletown, 187 N. Y. 37.) Municipal liability for injuries is a matter that is within the control of the legislature and when it is enacted what that liability shall be, and the conditions upon which it may be enforced are prescribed, the statutory provisions are controlling upon the subject. To require the presentation of a claim within a specified time is quite a reasonable provision; inasmuch as thereby the municipality is afforded a measure of protection against stale claims, or the possible [401] connivance of corrupt officials." It permitted an investigation into the occurrence to be had at a time when the evidence relating to it might more readily be collected. The provision is not so rigid as to be beyond a construction, which admits of a substantial compliance with its requirement, or of an excuse for delay in performance, when caused by the inability of the injured person to comply. (Walsh v. Jamestown, 178 N. Y. 213.)" The language of section 341, "No action shall be maintained . . . unless a written verified statement . . . shall have been filed with the village clerk within sixty days after the cause of action shall have accrued," is the equivalent of the statutory language considered by Judge Gray, and such conclusion the respondent here does not oppose. The respondent does, however, asserting an analogy between an infant and an administrator of an estate, urge that the plaintiff's cause of action did not accrue until the appointment of her guardian ad litem for the purpose of bringing this action, even as an administrator's cause of action does not accrue until his appointment. (Crao v. Syracuse, 183 N. Y. 395.) It seems to me the distinction between the two cases is quite clear and certain. The right of action of an infant at its origination is and remains in the infant, who is of course in being. Infancy does not incapacitate the infant from bringing the action. The infant is the real party although he sues by the guardian ad litem. Such fact is recognized and declared in the Code of Civil Procedure, section 469: "Where an infant has a right of action, he is entitled to maintain an action thereon; and the same shall not be deferred or delayed, on account of his infancy." The guardian ad litem manages the suit for the infant and protects his interests, but is not, and the infant is, the real party to the action. The decision in Winter v. Niagara Falls, 190 N. Y. 198, 13 Ann. Cas. 486, 82 N. E. 1101, 123 Am. St. Rep. 540, above cited, may be deemed an authority overruling the respondent's assertion in that it [402] held, in effect, that infancy, in and of itself, did not prevent the operation of the requirement that the notice or statement be filed.

The requirement of the statute, however, as Judge Gray wrote, is not absolute and unyielding. Judge Gray further said: "The question was well discussed below and I think it needs no further discussion here." The court below said: "No rigid rule can be established. If an infant of ten years is injured, with no one capable of presenting a claim to the common council, the strict limitation of the statute should not be raised against him. If twenty years of age and mature, and not disabled unduly by his injuries, then the statutory requirements should be applicable. Each case must be a law unto itself within reasonable limits." The Appellate Division held in the case at bar "that a child five years of age is not precluded from bringing an action against a village by failure to file, within the time prescribed by law, the notice specified in section 341 of the Village Law, and, further, that a child of that age should not be prejudiced by the failure of its father or mother to file the same."

In this state the maxim that the law does not seek to compel a man to do that which he cannot possibly perform has been made the basis for the principle that physical and mental inability to comply with a statutory provision of the kind under consideration excuses the non-compliance. (Walden v. Jamestown, 178 N. H. 213, 70 N. E. 466; Whiteside v. North American Acc. Ins. Co. 200 N. Y. 320, 323, 93 N. E. 948, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 696; Forayth v. Oswego, 191 N. Y. 441, 444, 84 N. E. 392, 123 Am. St. Rep. 605.)

This court has not declared that infancy creates or is a condition of mental or physical inability. There are two suggestive judicial utterances. The one of Judge Gray in the Winter case: "The plaintiff was eighteen years of age and, so far as the complaint shows, presumably, was able to cause a claim to be filed, and the statute makes [403] no exception as to persons." The other of Judge Spring in the opinion of the Appellate Division in the Winter case: "If an infant of ten years is injured, with no one capable of presenting a claim to the common council, the strict limitation of the statute should not be raised against him. If twenty years of age and mature, and not disabled unduly by his injuries, then the statutory requirements should be applicable." There are cases holding that a parent is the natural guardian and protector of the rights of his infant child. It cannot, however, be justly held, we think, that rights accorded by the law to infants are forfeited because a parent did not perform for an infant where performance was excused because of the infancy.

We are of the opinion that immature infancy, which includes the age of five years, is, as a matter of law, a condition of physical and mental inability excusing compliance with the requirement of section 341. It is reasonable to conclude that inability is attributable to a final period, as a matter of law, and through a period lying between those two the question of ability is a question of fact to be submitted to and determined by the jury. (See Forayth v. Oswego, 191 N. Y. 441, 444, 84 N. E. 392, 123 Am. St. Rep. 605; Cogan v. Burnham, 175 Mass. 391, 56 N. E. 585; Barclay v. Boston, 167 Mass. 506, 46 N. E. 113; Barclay v. Boston, 173 Mass. 310, 53 N. E. 822.) It is not necessary now to determine the age at which the first period ends and that at which the final period begins; indeed they might differ with the facts of different cases. Certainly any child only five years old has not reached such maturity and capacity either physical or mental that he would seek to know his rights or could understand them if stated or apprehend the need of searching out or enforcing any legal remedies because of their invasion.

Our conclusion is not in accord with the rule enforced in some jurisdictions that infants are not excepted from the operation of the statutory requirement and that the [404] mere fact that the injured person is an infant is not sufficient to excuse failure to give the statutory notice. (Peoples v. Valparaiso, 178 Ind. 673, 100 N. E. 70; Hoffmann v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Co. 127 Wis. 76, 106 N. W. 808; Morgan v. Des Moines, 60 Fed. 208, 19 U. S. App. 593, 8 C. C. A. 569; Davidson v. Muskegon, 111 Mich. 454, 69 N. W. 670.) In certain of these jurisdictions, if not in all, the rule that mental and physical inability excuses non-compliance with the statute does not obtain. The conclusion here reached is, as appears from our prior decisions already cited, within the legislative intention and is just.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

NOTE

Infancy or Other Disability of Claimant as Suspending Limitation of Time for Filing Claim against Municipality.

The reported case conforms to the rule laid down in Winter v. Niagara Falls, 190 N. Y.

198, 13 Ann. Cas. 486, that infancy in and of itself does not suspend the time prescribed by statute for the filing of a claim against a municipality for damages resulting from the happening of an accident, where the filing of such claim is a condition precedent to the right to maintain an action. To substantially the same effect see Morgan v. Des Moines, 60 Fed. 209, 19 U. S. App. 593, 8 C. C. A. 569; Davidson v. Muskegon, 111 Mich. 454, 69 Nev. 670. The reported case, however, holds that an infant of five years of age who has not filed his claim in time is excused because of his extreme minority and distinguishes its decision from the rule laid down in Winter v. Niagara Falls, supra, on the basis that an infant of five is hardly obliged to display the prudence and caution of an infant of eighteen, which was the age of the infant in Winter v. Niagara Falls. The reported case goes so far as to assert that the earlier period of infancy is as a matter of law a condition of mental inability which excuses compliance with a requirement of this nature, while later infancy should as a matter of law be considered a period of ability from which an infant should not be excused for failure to observe the requirement, and that between these periods ability or inability of an infant is a question of fact to be determined by a jury, taking into consideration all the circumstances involved in each case.

It has been held that the statutory requirement regulating the filing of claims, against a municipality does not apply to a statutory action for death by wrongful act brought by the representative of the deceased. Prouty v. Chicago, 250 Ill. 222, 95 N. E. 147, reversing 159 Ill. App. 82; Devine v. Chicago, 166 Ill. App. 17, following Prouty v. Chicago, supra; Nesbit v. Topeka, 87 Kan. 394, 124 Pac. 166, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 749.

As to the effect of the disability of a claimant in some respect other than infancy as suspending the period of time prescribed by statute for the filing of a claim against a municipality, the recent cases have adopted different views. Some courts have held that disability either mental or physical or both is not sufficient to excuse the failure to file a notice of claim within the prescribed time. Peoples v. Valparaiso, 178 Ind. 673, 100 N. E. 70; McCollum v. South Omaha, 84 Neb. 413, 121 N. W. 438 (strong dissenting opinion); Ransom v. South Bend, 78 Wash. 396, 136 Pac. 365; Hall v. Spokane, 79 Wash. 303, 140 Pac. 348. Thus in Peoples v. Valparaiso, supra, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff was under two disabilities, sickness and infancy, the court held that the failure to file a claim against a city within the statutory period was fatal to the plaintiff's cause of action, saying: "Section 8962 [Burns' 1908], supra, does not contravene article 1, section

23, of the Indiana Constitution. Touhey v. Decatur, 175 Ind. 98, 93 N. E. 540, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 350. The liability of the city in the first instance was statutory, and section 8962, supra, is simply a limitation on that liability. One seeking the benefit of the statute must show that he is within its provisions, including that requiring the notice; and the fact that such person was unable to give notice, or cause it to be given, affords no excuse for a failure to comply with the terms of the statute. Touhey v. Decatur, supra. No exception as to persons is made in the statute, and none can be engrafted on it by the courts. It imposes on all persons, including minors, the obligation to serve such notice in order to maintain an action. Hoffmann v. Milwaukee Electric R. etc. Co., 127 Wis. 76, 106 N. W. 806; Winter v. Niagara Falls, 190 N. Y. 198, 13 Ann. Cas. 486 and note, 82 N. E. 1101, 123 Am. St. Rep. 540; Davidson v. Muskegon, 111 Mich. 454, 69 N. W. 670; 28 Cyc. 1450. That the ends of justice might be better subserved by making exceptions in cases such as this, and possibly others, appears scarcely open to controversy; but the making of such exceptions is a duty solely devolving on the legislative department of our government, and courts cannot rightfully modify the terms of a statute, however meritorious such modification may appear." In Hall v. Spokane, 79 Wash. 303, 140 Pac. 348 (following Benson v. Seattle, 78 Wash. 641, 139 Pac. 501) it was held that a person who, intending to commence an action against a city, failed to file the requisite notice of claim within the thirty days allowed by statute, during twenty-nine days of which the plaintiff was capable of filing her claim, was not excused by disability, on the thirtieth. The court said: "In the Born case [Born v. Spokane, 27 Wash. 719] the court said: 'We think the general rule is that it must be shown that there is such physical or mental incapacity as to make it impossible for the injured person to procure the notice to be served, and, if there is an actual incapacity, it makes very little difference in reason whether the incapacity is mental or physical.' No claim is made in the instant case that the appellant was unable to present her claim within the first twenty-nine days following the injury. Indeed, her own evidence shows that she frequently visited her physician during this time, that she was able to go about, and that she could have presented her claim in person. It is not contended that the charter provision is either unreasonable or invalid. The contention is that the appellant brought herself within its provisions. Under the authorities cited, the court was right in withdrawing the case from the jury. The statute makes a compliance with the charter provisions mandatory." In Ransom

v. South Bend, 76 Wash. 396, 136 Pac. 365, the court said that incapacity or disability would not excuse the failure to file a notice of claim and, criticizing the holding in Walden v. Jamestown, 178 N. Y. 213, 70 N. E. 466, said: "The New York courts have held that a failure to serve a preliminary notice required by a legislative charter (within forty-eight hours after the happening of the accident) is not a bar to an action where the injured party was unable to transact business during the time fixed in the charter for the service of the notice. Walden v. Jamestown, 178 N. Y. 213, 70 N. E. 466. This holding was rested upon two maxims of the law: (a) 'That a thing which is in the letter of a statute is not within the statute itself unless it is within the intention of the statute makers,' and (b) that the law does not seek 'to compel a man to do that which he cannot possibly perform.' These are sound maxims when soundly applied. There is another maxim, however, which we apprehend is even more potent, viz., that the legislature is presumed to have meant what it said. The notice in that case was served seventy-two hours after the accident occurred. The court said that this 'was a substantial compliance with the statute.' We feel constrained to adopt the view that the legislature thought it best not to except either incapacity or disability." And in reference to the rule laid down in Born v. Spokane, 27 Wash. 719, 68 Pac. 386, the court said: "The appellant invites us to apply this rule of interpretation to the statute. This we cannot do without trenching upon powers vested exclusively in a co-ordinate branch of the state government. When the law-making branch of the government has spoken, the courts may interpret, but cannot add to or take from, the clear and unambiguous meaning of the law. To do so would be legislation rather than interpretation. The policy, expediency, and wisdom of a statute are legislative and not judicial questions."

Other jurisdictions have maintained that physical or mental incapacity is sufficient to excuse a failure to file the prescribed notice of claim. Stoliker v. Boston, 204 Mass. 522, 90 N. E. 927; Terrell v. Washington, 158 N. C. 281, 73 S. E. 388; Hartsell v. Asheville, 166 N. C. 323, 82 S. E. 946 (reconsidering 164 N. C. 193, 80 S. E. 226); O'Connor v. Hamilton, 8 Ont. L. Rep. 391, 3 Ont. W. Rep. 918; Morrison v. Toronto, 12 Ont. L. Rep. 363, 7 Ont. W. Rep. 547, 607. Thus in Terrell v. Washington, supra, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff was both mentally and physically incapable of filing a notice within the requisite statutory period the court said: "The defendant alleged that the claim of the plaintiff had not been presented within the time fixed by its charter. But the jury have found, under proper instructions, that by reason of his injuries, which affected him both mentally and physically, the plaintiff was unable, during that period, to transact ordinary business or to present his claim, and that he did so within a reasonable time after he was restored sufficiently to do so. This, we think, excused the delay. The general rule in such cases seems to be that in order to excuse a strict compliance with the provision, it must be shown that there is such physical or mental incapacity as to make it impossible for the injured person, by any ordinary means at his command, to procure service of the notice or a filing of the claim, whichever is required, and if there is an actual incapacity, it can make no practical difference in reason whether it is mental or physical in its nature. Born v. Spokane, 27 Wash. 719; Barclay v. Boston, 167 Mass. 597. It may very properly be said that it would, in truth, shock the sense of justice and right if this provision was construed so as to hold the notice of the plaintiff's claim insufficient under the circumstances. It is an accepted maxim that the law does not seek to compel that to be done which is impossible. It cannot reasonably be presumed that the intention of the legislature in enacting this charter would lead to any such unjust conclusion, and it is a fundamental canon of interpretation that a thing which is within the letter of a statute is not within the statute itself, unless it is within the intention of the makers." And in Hartsell v. Asheville, 166 N. C. 323, 82 S. E. 946 (considering 164 N. C. 193, 80 S. E. 226), under a charter requirement providing that a claimant must file a notice of claim within ninety days after the accident it was held that a person who had been practically disabled during that period would not lose his right of action against the city. The court followed Terrell v. Washington, supra. In Egan v. Saltfleet, 29 Ont. L. Rep. 116, 4 Ont. W. N. 1384, incapacity continuing for two weeks, but leaving more than two weeks within which to serve a notice of claim was held not to be a sufficient excuse for a failure to file the prescribed notice. But in Morrison v. Toronto, 12 Ont. L. Rep. 333, 7 Ont. W. Rep. 547, 607, it was held that a person who, being required to file a claim within seven days after being injured, was incapacitated for three weeks, was excused from failure to file a notice of claim.

CHARING CROSS ELECTRICITY SUPPLY COMPANY

HYDRAULIC SUPPLY COMPANY.

England—Court of Appeal—April 3, 1914.

[1914] 3 K. B. 772.

Waterworks and Water Companies — Underground Water Pipes — Liability for Injuries.

A person conveying water in underground pipes, by virtue of a license to use a public street for that purpose, is liable irrespective of negligence for injuries caused by the bursting of a pipe.

[See note at end of this case.]

[773] Appeal from a decision of Scrutton, J.; reported [1913] 3 K. B. 442.

The plaintiffs were a company supplying electricity in the city of London under a provisional order under the authority of which they had placed their cables under certain of the public streets. The defendants were the owners of hydraulic mains containing water at a high pressure used to supply hydraulic power, which mains had been laid under the same streets also under statutory authority. The action was brought to recover damages for injury to the plaintiffs' cables in four different streets, Water Lane, Upper Thames Street, Cannon Street, and St. Swithin's Lane, caused by the bursting of the defendants' mains. Two of the mains which so burst, those in Upper Thames Street and Cannon Street, were laid under a private Act passed in 1871—34 & 35 Vict. c. cxxi.—which did not contain the usual clause, now found in Gasworks Acts and other similar Acts, providing that nothing in the Act should exempt the company from liability for a nuisance. The other two mains were laid under the London Hydraulic Power Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. lxxii.), which in s. 17 provided that "Nothing in this Act shall exempt the company from any indictment suit action or other proceeding at law or in equity in respect of any nuisance caused by them." And by s. 1 of that Act, "This Act may be cited for all purposes as the London Hydraulic Power Act, 1884, and this Act and the Act of 1871 as amended and extended by this Act shall be read and construed together as one Act." The plaintiffs alleged that the water had escaped from the mains by reason of the defendants' negligence, or alternatively that the defendants were liable as for a nuisance. The defendants denied the negligence, and contended that in the absence of negligence they were not liable, especially as they contended that the fractures of their mains were caused by subsidence due to the laying of the plaintiffs' cables. The judge found the following facts:—

[774] A. On February 4, 1912, the defendants' main in Water Lane burst and did damage to the plaintiffs' cable, thereby necessitating repairs which cost 533l. 10s. 10d. The defendants' main was laid in 1895, the plaintiffs' cable in 1901-2. The soil in Water Lane was not very sound, and when the plaintiffs laid their cable in 1902, and the excavations were filled up, the settling down of the soil did damage to the defendants' mains for which the plaintiffs paid. This was put right in a manner satisfactory to all parties at the time, and nothing happened from June, 1902, till February, 1912, when the defendants' main was fractured in a way which was due to subsidence or shifting of the soil, leaving the main unsupported in places, when the weight and pressure of the pipes and the water within, probably assisted by the vibration of the heavy traffic and a sharp frost at the time, caused the fracture. The effective cause was the subsidence. This was due to the nature of the soil and the traffic over it. The judge was not satisfied that the plaintiffs' work in 1902 or anything that had happened to it since had anything to do with the subsidence in 1912. The defendants suggested in this and the other cases that the subsidence was caused by the perishing of the wood surrounding the plaintiffs' cables which were laid in bitumen in a wooden mould, which perishing let the soil down. The judge was not satisfied that this was so.

B. On February 5, 1912, during the same sharp frost, the defendants' main burst in Upper Thames Street and did damage amounting to 41l. 0s. 10d. to the plaintiffs' cables. The defendants' main was laid in 1883, the plaintiffs' cables in 1901. There was a large inspection chamber of the plaintiffs built near the point where the burst occurred. Nothing happened from 1901 to 1912, when the defendants' flange broke transversely near the inspection chamber. The fracture was due to subsidence of the soil leaving the pipe unsupported, and to vibration by heavy traffic in a hard frost. The judge was not satisfied that the plaintiffs' works in 1901, or anything that had happened to them since, had anything to do with the burst in 1912.

C. On February 10, 1912, a burst in the defendants' main in Cannon Street caused damage to the plaintiffs' cables amounting to 3l. 8s. 7d. This amount was so small that very little was said [775] about it. The burst was due to subsidence of soil and vibration caused by the underground railway and traffic above, and the cables of the plaintiffs had nothing to do with it.

D. On August 27, 1912, a burst of the defendants' main in St. Swithin's Lane caused damage to the plaintiffs' cables amounting to 891. 3s. 10d. The defendants' main was laid in 1892, the plaintiffs' cables in 1901. The fracture was due to subsidence of the soil leaving the main unsupported and subject to the vibrations of heavy traffic. The judge was not satisfied that any work of the plaintiffs in 1901 or any changes in its condition since had anything to do with the burst in 1912. He found that the defendants were not guilty of any negligence either in the manner of laying their mains or in respect of the materials of which the mains were constructed, and that they could not by any reasonable care have detected the subsidences before the bursts occurred.

Scrutton, J., held (1.) that the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330, applied not only to cases in which the dangerous thing had escaped from the defendant's land on to the plaintiff's land and done damage there, but also to cases in which the site of the plaintiff's injury was occupied by him only under a licence and not under any right of property in the soil, and that in the absence of statutory authorization of the nuisance the defendants were liable for the damage caused by the bursts in their mains, notwithstanding that they had been guilty of no negligence; and (2.) that the effect of the two Acts being read together as one Act was to take away the privilege which, down to the passing of the later Act, the defendants had enjoyed, in respect of the two first-mentioned mains, of not being liable for damage done by their bursting in the absence of negligence, and that consequently in the case of all four of the mains the defendants were liable as for a nuisance.

The defendants appealed.

[777] LORD SUMNER.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Scrutton, J., in favour of the plaintiffs' claim for damage done to their underground electric cables by the escape of water from the defendants' underground mains. Both parties carry on undertakings for profit, and have certain statutory permissions and powers under private Acts of Parliament. The damage was actually done in four places in the City, where the mains of the defendants and the cables of the plaintiffs were underneath the surface of the street. In two of them, the mains were put in [778] under the defendants' earlier Act, the other two after they obtained their later Act. In 1912 there were subsidences of the surrounding soil, and the mains were left unsupported in consequence, whereupon the weight and pressure of the pipes and the water within, probably assisted by the vibration of the heavy traffic and a sharp frost at the time, caused the fracture. The effective cause was the subsidence. This was due to the nature of the soil and the traffic over it. The learned judge finds substantially the same events in all the cases.

The defendants by their Acts of Parliament are incorporated for the purpose of supplying power by hydraulic pressure for cranes and similar uses, and are not allowed to supply water for any purposes which would come into competition with the ordinary water supply. Accordingly they keep their mains charged at very high pressure, and, as soon as the breaks occurred, the water escaped under a very high head. No doubt there would be a complete wash-out of the earth, and injury to the cables and penetration of the insulation would follow comparatively soon with serious results. Negligence was alleged, but was negatived by the learned judge.

The first question is whether, under those circumstances, the plaintiffs sustained particular injury by a nuisance or an invasion of their rights in the nature of a nuisance caused by the defendants; and without wishing to treat the argument with any disrespect, I can answer that briefly, if curtly, by quoting Collins, M.R., in Midwood v. Manchester [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 605: "If that was not a nuisance, I do not know what would be one." Indeed I might dispose of this case by saying that, as Midwood v. Manchester [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 597, is a decision of this Court, unless it can be effectively distinguished, nothing more need be said. In that case the plaintiffs had premises and stock in trade adjoining a street in Manchester. The Manchester Corporation—the undertakers of the electricity supply—had their mains in the streets. Negligence was not relied upon. Somehow the insulation of the conductors failed; a short circuit took place, and the heat so generated volatilized the bitumen in which the main was laid, which gave off an inflammable gas. The gas accumulated [779] and presently found its way into the house adjoining the plaintiff's, where it exploded and caused the fire by which the plaintiff's property was damaged, and for this the defendants were held liable.

I think that this present case is also indistinguishable from Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330. Two grounds of distinction have been suggested. It is said that the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330, is applicable between the owners of adjacent closes, which are adjacent whether there be any intermediate property or not; and that it is a doctrine depending upon the ownership of land and the rights attaching to the ownership of land, under which violations of that species of right can be prevented or punished. In the present case, instead of having two adjacent owners of real property, you have only two neighbouring owners, not strictly adjacent, of chattels, whose chattels are there under a permission which might have been obtained by the private licence of the owners of the soil, though in fact obtained under parliamentary powers; hence the two companies are in the position of co-users of a highway, or at any rate of co-users of different rooms in one house, and Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330, does not apply. The case depends on doctrines applicable to the highways, or to houses let out in tenements. I am unable to agree with any of these distinctions, though they have been pressed upon us by both learned counsel with great resource and command of the authorities. Midwood v. Manchester [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 597, is not decided as a case of a dispute arising between the owners of two adjacent closes. The case is treated as one between a corporation, whose business under the roadway is exactly similar to that of the defendant corporation here, and injured occupiers of the premises. If the distinction drawn between the present case and that of adjacent landowners in Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330, be a good one, it either was not taken in Midwood v. Manchester [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 597, or was taken and treated as of no importance. Further I am satisfied that Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330, is not limited to the case of adjacent freeholders. I shall not attempt to shew how far it extends. It extends as far as this case, and that is enough for the present [780] purpose. It is quite true that the parties were adjacent freeholders, of whom one made a reservoir on his land, and the other excavated old mining workings. Hence in the judgments both of the Exchequer Chamber and of the House of Lords attention is drawn to the use of the close and the natural user of the land, and the rule of law is laid down that one who for his own purposes brings on his land and keeps there anything likely to do damage if it escapes must keep it at his peril. Both Courts, however, shew that they have no intention of confining the principle to the case of adjacent freeholders. It is enough if I refer to the report of Fletcher v. Rylands in the Exchequer Chamber (1865) L. R. 1 Exch. (Eng.) 265, in which Blackburn, J., delivered the judgment of the Court. He illustrated by cases upon the liability in trespass of the owner of an animal. Again, Lord Cranworth in the House of Lords, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 341, speaks of the principle not as confined to the case of landlords, but in very broad terms: "For when one person, in managing his own affairs, causes, however innocently, damage to another, it is obviously only just that he should be the party to suffer." That is not a precise proposition of law, but it is inconsistent with there being any idea in his Lordship's mind that Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330, was confined to the invasion of a right of property in soil.

Counsel then argued that Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, is at most a case of adjacent owners, or occupiers, or licensees, of separate premises. This is a case of joint and successive user by two parties of one highway common to them both. I think the same idea is involved in the other class of cases cited, namely, cases of joint occupiers of one house.

Upon this part of his judgment, and upon this only, I differ from Scrutton, J., because he clearly [1913] 3 K. B. (Eng.) at pp. 449, 450, was disposed to think that this was a case of joint user of highways. These cables and mains were laid under the highway, but the laying and using of them are no part of the use of the highway. How thick a highway is, I do not know. I suppose practically it has a certain thickness, but I should think it quite clear that where you find cables and mains laid, there the highway ceases. At [781] that depth they are not in the highway but underneath it, and it seems to me, therefore, that this is a simple case of two independent persons licensed to pass their apparatus through soil—the ownership of which is not material here—with additional rights of breaking up the superincumbent surface of the highway, but the enjoyment of their licenses is no joint user of the highway at all. If that is so, the analogy of cases on nuisance and on co-occupation of a house fails. It was said by the defendants, "We got there first and the plaintiffs came with their cables afterwards, and they must therefore take the place as they find it; one of the ways in which that place may be dangerous is the presence of our mains, and, unless there is negligence, they cannot recover." Of course there are cases of nuisance where a person is held not to be entitled to complain of what is only the accustomed way of dealing with property on the ground that he has gone to the nuisance instead of the nuisance coming to him. No doubt similar cases can be put in connection with licensees who go upon premises that are in a more or less hazardous condition, but no analogy is made out here. If it had been the normal condition of these mains to squirt out water under high pressure from time to time, there might be some substance in the argument, but, assuming that the mains were sound and contained the water instead of releasing it, as they have done for years, the argument founded upon the sequence of dates is illusory.

Another argument is based upon the language of the defendants' Acts of Parliament. The Act of 1871 incorporated the undertakers and recited that they proposed to carry on an undertaking that was beneficial to the public. They are not incorporated as water-works supply companies with an obligation to supply water to the public, but they are given powers of taking water and of laying mains without being under obligation to keep their mains charged with water at high pressure, or at all. This serves at once to distinguish the class of cases of which Green v. Chelsea Waterworks Co. 70 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 547, was an illustration, where the principle is that if the Legislature has directed and required the undertaker to do that which caused the damage, his liability must rest upon [782] negligence in his way of doing it, and not upon the act itself. In the Act of 1871 there was no clause in pari materia with clause 17 of the Act of 1884, which is: "Nothing in this Act shall exempt the company from any indictment, suit, action, or other proceeding at law or in equity in respect of any nuisance caused by them." It is said that, in so far as that section applies, the plaintiffs have to prove that if there was a nuisance the nuisance was caused by the defendants, and it is suggested that it was not caused by the defendants, but by unknown passers-by on the surface of the highway or what not. I do not agree that "nuisance caused by them" is to be read in any restricted sense which would save the defendants, even although there were other jointly operating causes as well as their own acts which led to the breakdown, but on the facts as found by the learned judge it is plain that this nuisance was caused by the defendants. It is not having water in the pipes that is the legal wrong; it is not even subjecting water in the pipes to the very high pressure necessary for the defendants' undertaking that is the legal wrong; it is letting the water escape: Nichols v. Marsland (1875) L. R. 10 Exch. (Eng.) 255; (1876) 2 Ex. D. 1. The question is: What caused the nuisance which consisted in streams of water suddenly issuing from a fracture in the pipe under a very high head? The fracture was only caused by the traffic and the vibrations caused by the traffic. The immediate cause of the fracture of the pipe was its own weight, when charged with water and suspended between two points instead of being continuously supported by the subjacent soil which had subsided; but the thing which actually caused the water to squirt out was the working of the defendants' engines, and if at the time of the fracture the engines had not been working, or it had been possible to cut off the pressure instantly, the damage would have been done in a very different way and to a very different extent, and much of the damage would have been of a very different kind. On any reading of the words "nuisance caused by them," this escape of water constituting a nuisance was caused by the defendants.

There is another point. By s. 1 of the Act of 1884 it is provided: "This Act may be cited for all purposes as the London [783] Hydraulic Power Act, 1884, and this Act and the Act of 1871, as amended and extended by this Act, shall be read and construed together as one Act and may be cited as the London Hydraulic Power Acts, 1871 and 1884." The suggestion is that in the two cases where the mains were laid before 1884, these provisions, including s. 17, do not apply, and that they are governed only by the Act of 1871, which, as it does not keep alive liability for nuisances caused by them, must be deemed to authorize nuisances caused by them. That is an assumption that I should not be prepared to make, but it does not arise because, on the construction of the two Acts, as regards all occurrences after 1884, although happening to a main laid before 1884, the two Acts must be read and construed together as one Act, and therefore, in the language of Lord Coleridge, C.J., in Read v. Joannon (1890) 25 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 300, s. 17 of the later Act should be read thus: "Nothing in this Act"—meaning thereby nothing in this combined Act of 1871 and 1884—"shall exempt the company from any suit . . . in respect of any nuisance caused by them." If that is so, there is nothing in that defence.

I think the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

KENNEDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have very little which I must add, because I entirely agree with the reasoning which has been expressed in the judgment just delivered. I will only, in fact, add this, that in my view this case would be sufficiently decided by saying that it is indistinguishable in any material point from Midwood v. Manchester Corp. [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 597, and the judgment in that case is a judgment which places the right of the plaintiffs to succeed, so far as this Court is concerned, beyond all doubt. It was attempted, as a suggestion merely, to say that in Midwood v. Manchester [1905] 2 K. B. 597, in addition to clause 70, which corresponds with s. 17 of the later of the two Acts in the present case, there was another clause, cl. 67, but on looking through the judgment it is quite clear that the fact that there was also a clause 67 in that case had no effect as materially governing the decision. It was clause 70 of the Order in that case which was relied upon, and the only [784] reference, I think, in all the three judgments to the existence of clause 67 is in the judgment of Mathew, L.J., in which he says, not that clause 70 is to be read by the light of clause 67, but that "clause 70 of the Order seems to me to be decisive. I think the provisions of clause 67 of the Order in this case must be read by the light of clause 70." Clause 70 is substantially identical as it seems to me; with s. 17 in the 1884 Act, and, as my Lord has said, that Act by its terms is applicable and governs the case, although some portion of the present defendants' mains were brought into being under earlier legislation, which, by the Act of 1884, is incorporated with the Act of 1884, and therefore, in my view, according to the true construction, s. 17 of the later Act applies to all the mains in question. It has been said in the course of the argument, the substance of which has been dealt with by my Lord, that the plaintiffs in the present case came upon the ground, if I may use that expression, after the defendants' mains had been placed there and, so to speak, were obliged to take the position for their works subject to risks which might arise from the earlier works. I think that is fallacious. They did in fact go there, it is true, at later dates. I think the earliest of the works that they put in was somewhere about 1801. They went there, if you look at it, as it appears to me, according to the true light to be got from the facts, with the knowledge that they were persons whose works would be protected from injury arising from the existing works. They went there, in fact, after the Act of 1884 had come into force, and, therefore, apart from any implication from the general law which would give them protection from nuisance, they went there entitled to assume that whatever was there already was there under the condition of its owners having to pay damages if nuisance arose from it. Did nuisance arise? In my opinion it clearly did in this case. As I have said, I am not going to repeat the reasoning which has been already expressed by Lord Sumner. I concur in his opinion that Midwood v. Manchester [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 597, is a case which governs us, and that the principle applicable in Midwood v. Manchester [1905] 2 K. B. 597, and in the present case is the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330; and that this cannot be [786] distinguished on any of the grounds that have been suggested by the argument for the defendants. I agree that this judgment should be as my Lord has stated.

BEAR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Treating this case, first of all, without regard to the statutory authority which the defendants have, it seems to me quite clear that it comes within the principles of Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330. It was said that it was not within those principles because Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330, is the case of the owners of adjoining closes of land, but, in my opinion, that is not so. The headnote of Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330, as reported in the House of Lords, is this, and I may say that I have looked through the speeches of the Lord Chancellor and the other learned Lords and it is abundantly justified by what is said there: "Where the owner of land, without wilfulness or negligence, uses his land in the ordinary manner of its use, though mischief should thereby be occasioned to his neighbour, he will not be liable in damages. But if he brings upon his land anything which would not naturally come upon it, and which is in itself dangerous, and may become mischievous if not kept under proper control, though in so doing he may act without personal wilfulness or negligence, he will be liable in damages for any mischief thereby occasioned." "For any mischief thereby occasioned," that is to say, not mischief necessarily occasioned to the owner of the adjoining land, but any mischief thereby occasioned. Now in the earlier part of that, it deals with the case where he brings it upon his land. It seems to me it does not matter whether it is upon his land; if he has a right, as the defendants have here, to occupy this land for a certain purpose, namely, for these pipes, it is equally his for the purpose of testing this principle. Therefore I think that Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330, applies, and, if it applies, then the defendants undoubtedly have brought upon their land, or land which they are permitted to occupy, something which would not have naturally come upon it and which is in itself dangerous and probably mischievous if not kept under proper control.

Now, if it is within Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330, the next point [786] is to see whether the statutory power which is given them gives them any protection, and undoubtedly the cases shew that if statutory power is given without any limitation, that does not protect them, except it be shewn that they have acted negligently. Then comes s. 17, which has been read and which I will not read again. What is the effect of that section? In my opinion the effect of it is, paraphrasing the language somewhat:—You may put your pipes on this land, but you are not to be entitled by reason thereof to any protection against claims by other persons who have sustained injuries arising from any actionable nuisance which you may commit, and, therefore, if it be shewn that the plaintiffs have sustained an injury by an actionable nuisance committed by the defendants, then they have no protection.

Then the next point which is taken is that the defendants have not committed any nuisance; the injuries have not been caused by them. In my opinion the findings of the learned judge shew that the injuries were caused by them. Lord Sumner has explained this, and I need not refer to it further.

The next point is that s. 17 does not apply to injuries caused by the water in the pipes which have been laid before the passing of the Act of 1884. Now the Act of 1884 is to be read with the preceding Act, and it imposes, in my opinion, a limitation upon the exercise of their powers. Now they were exercising their powers at the time they caused this nuisance, which was after the passing of the Act of 1884, and therefore it seems to me that s. 17 imposed that limitation on the exercise of the defendants' powers.

The last point taken was this: We got there first. Now, in order to make that good, it seems to me that it must be shewn that, by virtue of the powers given to the defendants, they were given some right to interfere with the beneficial use of the land by the adjoining owner. In my opinion they were given no such right at all. If this Act did not deprive the owner of the surrounding land of any beneficial use of his land and if he might use his land in this way, he would be entitled to exactly the same remedies as he could otherwise have got; so that there is no protection, in my opinion, to be given because of the [787] defendants coming there first. It does not matter to whom the surrounding land belongs. When the Legislature gave them these authorities, they did not take away from this right of the owner of that surrounding land any of the rights which he otherwise had, and therefore, in my opinion, the judgment must be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE.

Liability for Injuries Caused by Underground Water Pipes.

Water in an underground pipe is not such a dangerous instrumentality as to require a person so conveying it to confine it at his peril, and no recovery can be had for an injury to property caused by the leakage or bursting of an underground water pipe unless negligence in the construction or maintenance of the pipe is shown. Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks, 11 Exch. (Eng.) 781, 2 Jur. N. S. 333; Green v. Chelsea Waterworks, 70 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 547; Mam v. Henderson, 154 Ky. 154, 156 S. W. 1063; Littlefield v. Newport Water Co. 110 Me. 129, 85 Atl. 482; McCord Rubber Co. v. St. Joseph Water Co. 181 Mo. 678, 81 S. W. 189; Terry v. New York, 8 Bosw. (N. Y.) 504; Cincinnati v. Renner, 33 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 189; Esberg Cigar Co. v. Portland, 34 Ore. 282, 55 Pac. 961, 75 Am. St. Rep. 651, 43 L.R.A. 436; Morgan v. Duquesne, 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 100; Paris v. Tucker (Tex.) 93 S. W. 233. See also Cattle v. Stockton Waterworks Co. L. R. 10 Q. B. (Eng.) 453; Rice v. St. Louis, 165 Mo. 636, 65 S. W. 1902. Compare the reported case. In McCord Rubber Co. v. St. Joseph Water Co. supra, it was said: "The plaintiff contends, however, that the defendants are liable regardless of whether they were guilty of any negligence directly causing the accident. This contention rests in the theory that one who brings into his premises anything that is liable to escape, and liable to inflict injury on his neighbors if it should escape, brings it there at his peril, and is responsible for any injury that it may cause. That contention rests for its authority on the decision in Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. (Eng.) 330. . . . There is a wide difference between a great volume of water collected in a reservoir in dangerous proximity to the premises of another and water brought into a house through pipes in the manner usual in all cities, for the ordinary use of the occupants of the house. Whilst water so brought into a house cannot literally be said to have come in in the course of what might be called in the language above quoted of the Lord Chancellor 'natural user' of the premises, yet it is brought in by the method universally in use in cities and is not to be treated as an unnatural gathering of a dangerous agent. The law applicable to the caging of ferocious animals is not applicable to water brought into a house by pipes in the usual manner." So in Terry v. New York, supra, it was said: "The use of the Croton water by pipes was legal. No one is responsible for injury committed by their breaking unless caused by negligence or design. If all due diligence is used in making or maintaining the pipes, the injury becomes an unavoidable accident, for which no one is responsible. There was no evidence in this case that the pipes were originally defective. On the contrary, as they were in long before the damage in this particular case, they must have been originally strong. If originally sound, there was no proof of want of care in repairing any known defects or discovering them; on the contrary, it took six months of close investigation to discover where the leak was, and then they were repaired. Mere results are not proof of want of care."

If the leakage or bursting of an underground water pipe is due to the negligence of the water company, that company is liable for the resultant damage. Yik Hon v. Spring Valley Water Works, 65 Cal. 619, 4 Pac. 666; Kelly v. Winthrop, 219 Mass. 471, 107 N. E. 414. And see Leonhardt v. New York, 109 N. Y. S. 24; Woodie v. North Wilkesboro, 159 N. C. 353, 74 S. E. 924. Thus in Birmingham Water Works v. Martini, 2 Ala. App. 652, 56 So. 320, a water company was held liable for continuing to furnish water through leaky mains, whereby pools of water formed creating a nuisance. In Emerson v. General Central Water Co. [1874-1884] New-foundland L. Rep. 11, it appeared that a public water company failed, after proper notice, to shut off the water from the premises of a patron, by reason of which the freezing of the water burst the pipes. It was held that the company was liable.

A water company failing to repair a break in an underground pipe within a reasonable time after receiving notice thereof is liable for all damage thereafter ensuing. Monomoy Co. v. New York, 132 N. Y. S. 438; Zimmer v. Philadelphia, 57 Pa. Super. Ct. 20; French v. West Seattle Light, etc. Co. 50 Wash. 257, 97 Pac. 60. And see State Journal Printing Co. v. Madison, 149 Wis. 396, 134 N. W. 909.

In most of the cases it is clearly implied that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is not applicable to the bursting of an underground water pipe, and in a few cases it is directly held that the doctrine is not applicable. McCord Rubber Co. v. St. Joseph Water Co. 181 Mo. 678, 81 S. W. 189; Morgan v. Duquesne, 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 100. However, in Esborg Cigar Co. v. Portland, 34 Ore. 282, 55 Pac. 961, 75 Am. St. Rep. 651, 43 L.R.A. 435, it was said: "And this brings us to the question as to whether there was sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the servants or employees of the committee to carry the case to the jury. The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff was to the effect that the pipe in question was laid in 1892, by The Water Committee, and connected with the general water system of the city; that it burst twice, prior to the time of the accident which caused the injury to plaintiff's goods, under an ordinary pressure; that at the time of the accident, there was no unusual or extraordinary pressure upon the pipe, or reason why it should have burst at that time. The evidence further shows that a water pipe of its size and dimensions, when properly constructed and laid, will not ordinarily burst under such a pressure; and these circumstances, in our opinion, were sufficient to carry the case to the jury. As a general proposition, a party who alleges negligence as a cause of action must, of course, prove it; but under some circumstances the accident itself and the consequent injury may be of such a nature as to raise a presumption of negligence, and thus cast upon the defendant the duty of showing that he was free from fault. The rule seems to be that whenever a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of an explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care."

HUNT

HELD.

Ohio Supreme Court—June 23, 1914

90 Ohio St. 280; 107 N. E. 763.

Restrictive Covenants — Construction against Restriction.

Where the right to enforce a restriction contained in the conveyance as to the use of the property conveyed is doubtful, all doubt should be resolved in favor of the free use thereof for lawful purposes by the owner of the fee.

Covenant to Use for Residence Purposes — Double House

A clause in a conveyance restricting the use of the property conveyed "for residence purposes only" does not prohibit the erection of a double or two-family house on the premises.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The word "residence," as used in a covenant restricting the use of property to residence purposes, is equivalent to "residential" in contradistinction to "business," and has reference to the use or mode of occupancy to which the property may be put. A building used as a place of abode, and in which no business is carried on, is used for "residence purposes," whether occupied by one family or a number of families.

[See note at end of this case.]

Error to Court of Appeals, Cuyahoga county.

Action for injunction. Francis Held, plaintiff, and Carrie E. Hunt et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants in court of common pleas. Judgment for plaintiff on appeal to court of appeals. Defendant Hunt brings error. REVERSED.

[280] This was an action for an injunction brought by defendant in error on the 28th day of July, 1913, in the court of common pleas of Cuyahoga county. He sought to enjoin the plaintiff in error, Carrie E. Hunt, and one A. T. Sebek, a contractor, from any and all further work toward the construction of a two-family or double house on the real estate of said Carrie E. Hunt. He based his right of action on a certain clause of restriction contained in the deed of purchase of the real estate owned by said Carrie E. Hunt.

The matter was heard in the court of common pleas on the motion of Carrie E. Hunt to dissolve a restraining order theretofore allowed and was submitted to the court upon the petition, the answer of Carrie E. Hunt, the reply thereto and an agreed statement of facts. The motion to dissolve was sustained, an injunction denied and the petition dismissed at the costs of defendant in error.

[281] Defendant in error thereupon appealed the case to the court of appeals and it was there heard upon the pleadings, the evidence and agreed statement of facts.

It appears from the agreed statement of facts that the defendant in error, Francis Held, was the owner of the easterly twenty-five feet of subplot 160 and the westerly ten feet of subplot 161 in John W. Taylor & Company's Douglas Park subdivision and that plaintiff in error, Carrie E. Hunt, was the owner of the easterly thirty feet of subplot 161 and the westerly five feet of subplot 162 in said subdivision, that both Francis Held and Carrie E. Hunt received their conveyances directly from the allotment company and in each of the deeds there was the following covenant of restriction: "This property is sold for residence purposes only."

It further appears that said plaintiff in error, Carrie E. Hunt, would construct on her property, unless enjoined, a two-family or double house, and that at the time the restraining order was allowed the excavation for said house had been made and a part of the easterly foundation constructed.

The court of appeals found in favor of the defendant in error, and Carrie E. Hunt was perpetually enjoined from constructing or continuing the erection of any two-family or double house on her property and judgment was rendered against her for costs.

Thompson, Hine & Flory for plaintiff in error.

A. C. Waide for defendant in error.

[282] NEWMAN, J.—In addition to the claim that the erection of a double or two-family house is not in violation of the clause of restriction contained in her deed, plaintiff in error contends that, if the erection of such a house did violate the restriction, the right to enforce it has been lost to defendant in error through his own acts or those of the common grantor. These acts are pleaded in the answer and are referred to at length in the agreed statement of facts. In arriving at a decision of this case, however, we have found it necessary to consider only the meaning of the clause of restriction contained in the deed.

It is the claim of counsel for defendant in error that in the erection of a double or two-family house on her property plaintiff in error would violate the restriction clause in her deed and that when the words "this property is sold for residence purposes only" were inserted in the deeds the sellers of the property clearly intended that single houses only should be built thereon and that the language used excluded the idea of a number of residences under the same roof or in the same house. They concede that the use of a double or two-family house is a use for residence purposes in one sense, but that it is not a use for residence purposes only, and say that therein lies the distinction. We are unable to see the distinction they would make. The word "only" in our opinion does not change the meaning of the words "residence purposes."

If there is any doubt as to the meaning of the words employed the doubt should be resolved in favor of the free use of the property by plaintiff [283] in error for any lawful purpose and against restrictions, for it is a well-settled rule that in construing deeds and instruments containing restrictions and prohibitions as to the use of property conveyed all doubts should be resolved in favor of the free use thereof for lawful purposes in the hands of the owners of the fee. Ewertson v. Gerstenberg, 186 Ill. 344, 57 N. E. 1051, 51 L.R.A. 310. And again defendant in error acquired no greater rights under the restriction clause than his grantor had, and the rule that a deed is to be construed most strongly against the grantor applies here.

But is there any doubt as to the meaning of the words? The word "residence" as we view it, is equivalent to "residential" and was used in contradistinction to "business." If a building is used as a place of abode and no business carried on it would be used for residence purposes only whether occupied by one family or a number of families. Counsel say that the words were intended to describe a type of building. We think not. The word "residence" has reference to the use or mode of occupancy to which the building may be put. If it had been intended that the building was to be for the use of one family only, words indicating such an intention would have been used, as is frequently done, such as "a single residence," "a private residence," "a single dwelling house." And it is to be noted that the common grantor here, in his deed to another lot owner in the subdivision, used the expression: "This property is sold for single residence purposes only."

Counsel have cited a number of cases decided by courts in other jurisdictions, but an examination of [284] them will disclose the fact that in those cases there was under consideration language in restriction clauses materially different from that in the case at bar.

In Round Lake Assoc. v. Kellogg, 141 N. Y. 348, 36 N. E. 828, there was a restriction against the use of the property for business purposes and "residence purposes" does not appear. In Skillman v. Smathest, 57 N. J. Eq. 1, 40 Atl. 858, this language was used:

"Any building other than for the use or purpose of a private dwelling." In Schadt v. Brill, 173 Mich. 647, 139 N. W. 878, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 726, "other than a dwelling house with the usual appurtenances" was under consideration. But the supreme court of Michigan in Tillotson v. Gregory, 151 Mich. 132, 114 N. W. 1025, had made a distinction between the words "residence purposes" and "dwelling house," and held that while the latter words meant a single dwelling house the words "residence purposes" would not bear such construction.

But it is claimed that the question has been clearly decided in this state. In support of this they cite Rose v. King, 48 Ohio St. 213, 20 N. E. 267, 15 L.R.A. 160, and Linwood Park Co. v. Van Dusen, 63 Ohio St. 182, 58 N. E. 576. In the former case the question was not before the court, and in the latter the court was interpreting a provision in a lease that required the lessee to use the premises "for the purpose of a private dwelling or residence." On page 206, the court say: "The plain provision of the covenant is that the leased premises shall be used for the purposes of a dwelling or residence only, not for a number of dwellings. More than that, they are restricted to the use of it for a private dwelling or residence; and that is not a private [285] dwelling or residence which is used in the business of renting rooms to lodgers or tenants." The court seems to have laid stress on the use of the words "a" and "private," these words appearing in the report italicized.

The only reported case to which our attention has been called where the language "for residence purposes only" is given the meaning claimed for it by defendant in error is Burton v. Stapely, 4 Ohio N. P. N. S. 65, and the case is discussed at length by counsel here. The common pleas judge, it seems, based his ruling on the language used by this court in Linwood Park Co. v. Van Dusen, quoted above. The language under consideration in the Van Dusen case was entirely different from that before the court in Burton v. Stapely, and the holding of the court in the former case was not, we think, an authority for the position taken by the court in the latter, nor does it sustain the opinion of the court. In the Burton case the common pleas court granted an injunction in favor of the plaintiff and the case was appealed to the circuit court. There the injunction was denied. Error was prosecuted to this court and the judgment of the circuit court was reversed and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff in error on facts found by the circuit court. Burton v. Stapely, 74 Ohio St. 461, 78 N. E. 1120. In that case plaintiff had asked for an injunction upon the grounds that there had been a violation of two restrictions in the conveyance and this court may have found that plaintiff was entitled to an injunction on account of the violation of the restriction in the conveyance other than the one restricting the use of the [286] property for residence purposes only, for the circuit court found as a fact that there had been a violation of the restriction in reference to the location of the building on the lot. The reversal of the judgment of the circuit court does not signify necessarily that this court approved the holding of the court of common pleas as to the meaning of the clause restricting the use of the property for residence purposes only.

In Brown v. Huber, 89 Ohio St. 183, 88 N. E. 322, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 705, in the covenant in the deed it was provided "that the only buildings put upon said lot shall be a residence and the necessary attachments, and that it shall be used for no other purposes than that of a family residence, and shall cost not less than $5,000 for the residence alone." The owner of the lot had constructed two dwelling houses and planned and purposed to construct two more. This the court said was prohibited by the restriction clause in the deed.

That the erection of a double or two-family house is not in violation of a restriction that the property is to be used "for residence purposes only" is the holding in Tillotson v. Gregory, 151 Mich. 132, 114 N. W. 1025; McDonald v. Spang, 55 Misc. 332, 105 N. Y. S. 617; McMurtry v. Phillips Invest. Co. 103 Ky. 308, 45 S. W. 96, 40 L.R.A. 489. In the latter case the language used was: "The property herein conveyed shall be used for residence purposes only, and that, in erecting a residence thereon, it shall be built of brick or stone." The court say: "It is contended that the language of the restriction conveys the idea of a single residence for a single family or at any rate excludes the idea of a number of residences under the same roof [287] or in the same house. We think, however, that to give the language used, this meaning, would be to extend its scope beyond the express intention of the parties. The purposes for which the houses to be erected on the court were to be used were 'residence purposes only.' And as the house in controversy is to be constructed for such purpose only and is not to be used for any other purpose, we do not think its construction is at all prohibited by the restriction clause." See also note by annotator, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 726, 728.

If the common grantor in the case before us had in mind the exclusion of a building for the abode of more than one family he should have used language that would have expressed such an intention. The court cannot read it into the covenant.

We do not think the clause under consideration bears the interpretation given it by the court of appeals. Taking the language in its ordinary and popular sense, we are forced to the conclusion that it was not the intention of the common grantor to prohibit the erection of a double or two-family house on the premises. Defendant in error was therefore not entitled to the relief he sought and his petition should have been dismissed.

Judgment of the court of appeals reversed, and judgment for plaintiff in error.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that a covenant restricting the use of property to "residence purposes only" is not violated by the erection thereon of a double or two-family house. The cases discussing the construction of a covenant in a deed restricting the building on the granted premises to use as a dwelling house are collated in the note to Sayles v. Hall, Ann. Cas. 1912D 475.

STATE

VON KLEIN.

Oregon Supreme Court—June 16, 1914.

71 Oregon 159; 142 Pac. 549.

Criminal Law — Proof of Other Crimes — As Incident to Relevant Evidence.

In a prosecution for polygamy, where a witness, having referred to the plural wife as Mrs. L., stated that she was known also as E. N., the question whether she was the same E. N. who had complained against the defendant charging him with the larceny of $3,300 worth of diamonds is admissible for the purpose of identification and is not objectionable as tending to show another offense.

[See 105 Am. St. Rep. 977.]

To Show Motive.

In a prosecution for polygamy, where the evidence showed that defendant lived with the plural wife for only a few days, evidence that he stole valuable jewelry from her while living with her is admissible to show motive for the crime charged.

[See 7 Ann. Cas. 86.]

Assignment of Error — Definiteness.

An assignment that the trial court erred in sustaining objections to questions to a witness concerning a certain person is too general to raise any question for review.

Witnesses — Cross-Examination — Irrelevant Matters.

In a prosecution for polygamy, cross-examination of a witness as to whether he had read newspaper accounts of the arrest of defendant is properly excluded.

Criminal Law — Testimony at Former Trial.

L. O. L. § 1533, makes the rules of evidence in criminal cases the same as in civil cases, except as otherwise specially provided. Section 727 authorizes the testimony of a witness deceased or out of the state or unable to testify, given in a former action, suit, or proceeding between the same parties, relating to the same matter, to be received. Const. art. 1, § 11, guarantees the accused the right to meet the witnesses face to face. Held, that testimony of witnesses out of the state given at a former trial in a prosecution for larceny, the witnesses then being face to face with accused, is admissible, so far as relevant, in a subsequent prosecution of the same defendant for polygamy.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913C 484.]

Witnesses — Husband and Wife — Competency of Wife in Bigamy Trial.

Under L. O. L. § 1535, as amended by Laws 1913, p. 351, providing that in criminal actions, where the husband is the party accused, the wife shall be a competent witness but shall not be compelled or allowed to testify unless by consent of both parties, provided that in criminal actions for polygamy the wife shall be a competent witness as to the fact of marriage, an objection to the testimony of the wife of accused in a prosecution for polygamy, before she gave any evidence except her name and place of residence, is properly overruled; her testimony as to the fact of marriage being admissible.

[See note at end of this case.]

Objection to Competency — Objection Insufficient.

In a prosecution for polygamy, after the wife of accused had testified as to their marriage, where the counsel for accused objected to further questions as they were stated only on the ground of incompetency, irrelevancy, immateriality, and no foundation laid, the objection that the witness is incompetent because she is the wife of accused is waived.

Objection to Evidence — Objection Too Broad.

When evidence would be admissible for any purpose or under any circumstances, an objection should point out specifically what the objection is, and an objection that the question is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial is insufficient, though it would be sufficient if the evidence were not admissible for any purpose.

Time for Objecting.

Objections to evidence must be made at the right time or they cannot be considered on appeal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah county: KAVANAUGH, Judge.

Criminal action: E. E. C. Von Klein convicted of polygamy and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Wilson T. Hume and Thomas B. McDevitt for appellant.

Walter H. Evans and Robert F. Maguire for appellee.

[161] RAMSEY, J.—On December 13, 1913, the grand jury of Multnomah County returned an indictment against the defendant, charging him with the commission of the crime of polygamy committed as follows:

"The said E. E. C. Von Klein, alias George B. Lewis, on the 12th day of October, A. D. 1911, in the county of Multnomah and State of Oregon, then and there being, did then and there knowingly and feloniously live and cohabit with a woman, to wit, one Ethel Newcomb, as his wife, he (the said defendant) then and there having a wife then living, to wit, Louise Ellstrup Von Klein, contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided and against peace and dignity of the State of Oregon."

The defendant was arraigned upon said indictment, and he pleaded not guilty. He was tried and found guilty by a jury on the 23d day of December, 1913. On December 27, 1913, he was sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the period of from one to four years. The defendant has brought this case here on appeal, and asks for a reversal of the judgment for several alleged errors.

1. The first point made by the defendant is that the court erred in permitting the witness E. J. Carpenter to testify as to the identity of Ethel Newcomb, as complaining witness against the appellant, charging him with the larceny of about $3,300 worth of property, for the reason that the said evidence, if it tended to prove anything, tended to prove another crime, and did not [162] tend to prove the charge contained in the indictment. The witness Carpenter, having referred to Mrs. Lewis, and having stated that she was known also as Ethel Newcomb, was asked by the state this question:

"Is that the same Ethel Newcomb who complained against the defendant, charging him with larceny of some $3,300 worth of diamonds?"

Counsel for the defendant objected to this question, alleging that it was incompetent and irrelevant and tended to prove another crime. The attorney for the state represented to the court that he was asking said question for the purpose of proving the identity of the woman. The court overruled the objection, and the witness answered that it was the same woman. We think that said evidence was admissible for the purpose of identification. We do not think that to say a person is the same person that accused another of larceny tends to prove that the person so accused was guilty of larceny, especially when the statement was made for the purpose of identification.

2. There was some evidence given in this case that tended to show that the defendant stole some valuable jewelry from Miss Newcomb at the Portland Hotel at the time that he was living and cohabiting with her as his wife, as charged in the indictment. The defendant contends that the admission of said evidence was error. On the other hand, the state contends that such evidence was admissible to show the motive that prompted the defendant to marry Miss Newcomb and take her to the Portland Hotel, and there cohabit with her as his wife. The evidence showed that the defendant had a lawful wife in Minnesota; that, only a few days before he was living with Miss Newcomb as his wife at the Portland Hotel, he illegally married her in San Francisco, and took her to Portland, and went to [163] the Portland Hotel and registered as "Mr. and Mrs. Geo. B. Lewis," and they were assigned to room 637 of that hotel; that the defendant remained there only two or three days, and during that time lived with Miss Newcomb as his wife and called her his wife, and introduced her to persons about the hotel as his wife; that Miss Newcomb had jewelry valued at $3,300 which she wore at the hotel and at a theater; that, after they had been at the hotel about two days, the defendant exhibited a lot of jewelry, wrapped in a lady's handkerchief, to some persons in the hotel barber-shop and told them that it belonged to his wife, and that he was going to have it cleaned; that he went down town ostensibly to have the jewelry cleaned and disappeared, leaving Miss Newcomb and taking her jewelry with him, and leaving the hotel bill unpaid; and that he was arrested in Chicago and brought back to Portland.

The state contends, and the evidence tends strongly to prove, that the defendant planned to steal Miss Newcomb's jewelry, and that, to obtain an opportunity to steal said property, he illegally married her, took her to the Portland Hotel, and lived with her as her husband two or three days, obtained possession of her jewelry on a pretense that he would have it cleaned, and immediately absconded, taking the jewelry with him.

The state contends that the motive for marrying and living with Miss Newcomb was to obtain an opportunity to steal her said property, and the evidence tends to support that contention. The state contends also that the marrying of Miss Newcomb, the living with her at the Portland Hotel, and stealing of her jewelry were so closely connected as to form one transaction.

[164] In State v. Roberts, 15 Ore. 195, 13 Pac. 899, the court says:

"All of the acts of the parties, done in furtherance of the common design, though separated by time, and not continuous, constitute one entire transaction, and may be shown upon the trial."

In State v. O'Donnell, 36 Ore. 225, 61 Pac. 892, the court says:

"If the facts and circumstances tend to show that the prisoner committed an independent dissimilar crime, to enable him to perpetrate or conceal an offense, such evidence is admissible against him upon an indictment charging the auxiliary crime, when the intent to perpetrate or conceal such offense furnished the motive for committing the crime for which he is put upon trial."

In State v. Start, 65 Ore. 185, 132 Pac. 514, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 268, the court says:

"Under the third exception, an illustration would be where a burglar stole tools from a foundry with which to break the safe burglarized. Evidence of one crime could in such circumstances be given to support an indictment for the other. On the trial for burglary, the stealing of the tools could be shown as preparation for the crime charged, and on an indictment for larceny of the tools, the commission of the burglary with them would supply the motive for stealing them."

In 2 Wharton's Criminal Ev. (10 ed.) 1667, the author says:

"But the evidence of other crimes is admissible to show motive, and, where relevant for this purpose, the admissibility is not affected by the fact that such evidence may prove other crimes."

We think that the evidence supports the state's contention that, when the defendant illegally married Miss Newcomb, he did so for the purpose of obtaining an [165] opportunity to steal her jewelry, and that his living with her at the Portland Hotel was a part of the same scheme, and that the state had a right to prove the larceny of her jewelry by him to show the motive for his living and cohabiting with her at the Portland Hotel as his wife. The illegal marriage, the cohabitation at the hotel, and the larceny of the jewelry formed one connected transaction or scheme.

3. The second assignment of error asserts that the trial court erred in sustaining the objections of the state to questions asked J. H. Marble concerning "Jack Lewis." This assignment is too general to raise any question for review.

4. However, we have examined the cross-examination of the witness Marble that is set out in the bill of exceptions, and we find that the questions there set out all asked whether Marble had read accounts supposed to have been published in the "Oregonian" concerning the arrest of the defendant. We cannot see the competency or relevancy of newspaper accounts of the defendant's arrest. The court properly ruled them out.

5. The fourth, fifth, sixth, and ninth assignments of error raise similar questions and can be properly considered together. The defendant was indicted for larceny of the jewelry of Miss Newcomb, and he was tried upon said charge, and the jury failed to agree upon a verdict and were discharged. On the trial of the defendant on said charge of larceny, Miss Newcomb was present and testified. At said trial the Rev. E. R. Dilley was a witness and testified. The evidence of both of these witnesses was taken down in shorthand by J. F. Wood, the official reporter of the court. When said witnesses were examined in said case, the defendant was present in person and by his attorney, W. T. [166] Hume, Esq., and the defendant had an opportunity to cross-examine said witnesses. His attorney, Mr. Hume, did cross-examine each of them at that time, and the defendant "met them face to face." These witnesses were absent from the state when this case was tried, and the evidence given by them in the larceny case, so far as it was relevant to the issues in this case, was admitted in evidence and read to the jury. When the evidence of E. R. Dilley, given in the larceny case, was offered in evidence, counsel for the defendant objected thereto for the following reasons: "Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and no foundation laid," etc.

When the evidence of Miss Newcomb, given in the larceny case, was offered, counsel for the defendant objected thereto, for the reason that said evidence was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial," etc. These objections were overruled by the court.

The first point urged against the admission of the evidence of these two witnesses is that the state did not show proper diligence to procure the personal attendance of said witnesses at the trial of this case. The evidence shows that the witness Dilley resided in San Francisco, California, and that he was not in this state at the time of the trial. A subpoena issued out of the trial court would have no validity in the state of California. It is not necessary to review the evidence tending to show diligence; but we have examined it and find that a sufficient showing was made to entitle his evidence, given in the larceny case to be read, if it was competent. Miss Newcomb, also, did not reside in the state, and the showing of diligence to procure her personal attendance was sufficient to entitle her evidence in the larceny case to be read in evidence in this case, if it was competent.

[167] The other chief objection is that the evidence of these two witnesses was not admissible in this case, because the witnesses were not personally present, and the defendant had no opportunity to meet them face to face, and the evidence that was offered and read was given in another case where the issues were different, etc.

The evidence of these witnesses was given in a case in which the State of Oregon was the plaintiff, and the defendant herein was the defendant, and in that case the defendant was charged with the crime of larceny of the jewelry of Miss Newcomb that she had at the Portland Hotel during the time that the defendant was cohabiting with her there as his wife, as stated in the indictment. The parties to said larceny case were the same as the parties to this action. The evidence shows that said witnesses were sworn and gave said evidence in the presence of the defendant and his counsel, and that the defendant had an opportunity to cross-examine them, and that he did, by his counsel, cross-examine each of said witnesses in said larceny case. The defendant met said witnesses face to face in the larceny case, and the evidence that was given by them in the larceny case and was admitted in evidence in this case related to the matters in controversy in this case and was relevant to the issues herein.

In this state the rules of evidence in criminal cases are the same as in civil cases, except as otherwise specially provided in the Criminal Code: Section 1533, L. O. L.

Section 727, L. O. L. provides as follows:

"In conformity with the preceding provisions, evidence may be given on the trial, of the following facts: (8) The testimony of a witness, deceased or out of the state, or unable to testify, given in a former action, [168] suit or proceeding, or trial thereof, between the same parties, relating to the same matter."

Constructing the foregoing provisions of our statute and the Article I, Section 11, of the Constitution, this court in State v. Meyers, 59 Ore. 541, 117 Pac. 819, says:

"The Constitution of Oregon (Article I, Section 11) provides that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right to meet the witnesses face to face, and the Constitutions of most of the states, as well as the Constitution of the United States, contain similar provisions. It is held, however, that, where the accused has once enjoyed the right to cross-examine and confront the witnesses at an earlier trial, his constitutional right to meet him face to face is not violated by the admission of the evidence, 'when absent, at a subsequent trial. If the defendant is represented by counsel at a preliminary examination, and has had an opportunity to cross-examine witnesses, he has enjoyed his right to meet his accuser face to face, and no objection exists to receiving the testimony.'"

In State v. Walton, 53 Ore. 565, 90 Pac. 434, 101 Pac. 389, 102 Pac. 173, the court says:

"The statute was intended to make a general rule, concerning the taking of depositions, inapplicable to criminal trials; but we cannot think it was designed to abrogate a doctrine so firmly established and generally applied as that of permitting the testimony of a witness, given in the manner required by statute, to be used by either the state or defense on a subsequent trial, when he has since died or is absent from the state."

In Mattox v. U. S. 156 U. S. 241, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 410, 15 S. Ct. 339, the court says:

"Upon the other hand, the authority for the admissibility of such testimony, where the defendant was present either at the examination of the deceased . . . before a . . . magistrate, or upon a former trial of the same case, is overwhelming."

[169] See, also, on this point, Summons v. State, 5 Ohio St. 325; United States v. Maccomb, 5 McLean 286, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,702; State v. Bowker, 26 Ore. 313, 38 Pac. 124; State v. Wilson, 24 Kan. 189, 36 Am. Rep. 257; McNamara v. State, 60 Ark. 406, 30 S. W. 762.

The admissibility of the evidence of a deceased witness, or of one who is absent from the state, or unable to testify, given in a former action, suit, or proceeding, between the same parties, and relating to the same matter, is settled in this and other states by an overwhelming preponderance of authority, and this rule applies to criminal as well as civil cases; but in criminal cases the defendant must have been present when the evidence was taken and have had an opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses who gave it.

The defendant in this case was present in person and by his counsel when the evidence under consideration was taken, and his counsel cross-examined the witnesses; the parties were the same as in this case; and the evidence so taken related to the matter in controversy in this cause. Said evidence was admissible, and the court did not err in admitting it.

6. The defendant contends in his seventh assignment that the trial court erred in permitting Mrs. Louise Von Klein, the admitted wife of the defendant, to testify against the defendant, over the defendant's objection as to matters other than the marriage of the defendant to said witness. This assignment is very indefinite, as it does not indicate what particular evidence of the witness is objected to. When this witness was called and sworn, and before she gave any evidence, except to state her name and place of residence, the counsel for defendant asked whether she was the lady charged in the indictment to be the wife of the [170] defendant, and counsel for the state informed him that she was. Whereupon counsel for the defendant said:

"Then I object to the witness being sworn or testifying in this case, on the ground that she is the wife of defendant."

This objection was overruled.

Section 1533, L. O. L., as amended in 1913 (Laws of 1913, p. 851), is as follows:

"In all criminal actions, where the husband is the party accused; the wife shall be a competent witness; and, when the wife is the party accused, the husband shall be a competent witness; but neither husband nor wife, in such cases, shall be compelled or allowed to testify in such cases unless by consent of both of them. Provided, that in all cases of personal violence upon either by the other, the injured party, husband or wife, shall be allowed to testify against the other. Provided further, that in all criminal actions for polygamy or adultery, the husband or wife of the accused, shall be a competent witness, and shall be allowed to testify against the other, and without the consent of the other, as to the fact of marriage."

This statute makes husband and wife competent witnesses for or against each other in criminal cases; but neither husband or wife shall be compelled or allowed to testify in such cases, unless by the consent of both parties, except that, in cases of personal violence upon either, the injured party may be a witness against the other, and in cases of polygamy or adultery the husband or wife of the accused shall be a competent witness, without the consent of the other, as to the fact of marriage. This statute means that the husband and the wife are competent witnesses for or against each other in criminal cases; but that generally they shall not be either compelled or allowed to testify unless both consent thereto.

[171] In cases of personal violence, by one upon the other, the husband or the wife (not being the party accused) may testify generally against the accused without his or her consent, but in cases of polygamy and adultery the evidence must be confined to the fact of marriage. The trial court properly overruled the defendant's objection to his wife's being sworn and to her testifying. The statute expressly provides that she may, against his objection, testify as to her marriage to the defendant.

7. After the witness had testified to her marriage to the defendant, she was asked several questions relating to his handwriting, etc. Each of those questions was objected to by counsel for the defendant, for the alleged reason that it was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and no foundation laid." Counsel, in objecting to these questions, did not object to the witness answering them, for the reason that she was the wife of the defendant, nor did he, by said objections, question her qualifications to answer them. His objections did not go to the competency of the witness. They went only to the questions and the answers sought by them.

In the eighth volume of Enc. Pl. & Pr. page 163, the rule as to objections is stated thus:

"The objection must state the grounds thereof and point out specifically the errors complained of, in order that an opportunity may be given to correct them; if not sufficiently specific, it will not afterward avail the party raising it. In examining a question as to whether the rulings of the court below are correct, the appellate court will not consider any other grounds of objection than those urged in the court below. The appellate court is not a forum in which to discuss new points, but merely a court of review, to determine whether the rulings of the court below, as presented, were correct or not."

[172] The same volume, on page 162, says: "Objections should be made at the first reasonable opportunity offered, and, in strictness, should be made when action is asked of the court or purposed by it."

In Mechanics' Sav. Bank v. Harding, 65 Kan. 659, 70 Pac. 656, the court says:

"At the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence what purported to be a transcript of the judgment obtained against the bank of Le Roy. The defendant objected to its introduction on the ground that it was 'incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.' This objection was overruled, and we think properly so. It is argued that the transcript was not properly authenticated. If that objection had been made, it should have been sustained. Objections to testimony should be sufficiently specific to direct the attention of the trial court to the exact question contended for. This is due the court as well as the opposite party. It was said in Howard v. Howard, 52 Kan. 477, 34 Pac. 1117: 'Objections to testimony should be sufficiently pointed out, in order that the court may rule intelligently upon them, and, unless this is done, they are not entitled to consideration here.' In Johnston v. Clements, 25 Kan. 876, where the objection was based 'on all the grounds ever known or heard of,' it was said: 'The court should not have entertained these objections. Objections made in that form are unfair, both to the court and to the adverse party.' In Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Cutter, 19 Kan. 83, a transcript of the record of the proceedings of a probate court of Colorado was admitted in evidence over the objection that it was 'incompetent.' It was held by this court that such objection would not raise the question of the insufficient authentication of the record. If it is admissible for any purpose or under any circumstances, it is the duty of the party objecting distinctly to call the attention of the court to such defect. A neglect to do so will deprive such party of having the question reviewed in this court."

[173] In Rice v. Waddil, 168 Mo. 120, 67 S. W. 610, the court says:

"There was no error in overruling the objection to the letters of Columbus T. Rice, as it assigned no ground other than they were 'incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant,' which we have often held amounts to no more than 'I object.'"

Under the statute of 1913, supra, the wife is a competent witness against the husband generally, if he consents thereto, and the defendant in this case, having objected to the questions asked his wife, on the ground that they were "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial," and having failed to object to her competency as a witness, for the reason that she was his wife and not permitted to testify against him, without his consent, thereby waived all objections to his wife's competency to testify against him generally, and he cannot be heard to raise that question in this court. His objections were to the competency of the evidence and not to the competency of the witness.

In 12 Enc. of Ev. page 1046, the rule is stated thus:

"Inasmuch as it is the witness, and not this evidence, which is incompetent, the objection must be directed at the former and not the latter. An objection to testimony raises no question as to the witness' competency."

The tenth volume of the same work, at page 329, says:

"Persons objecting to questions as calling for privileged communication must specify that ground in his objection, and indicate the portion objected to. It is not sufficient to state that the question is objected to as 'incompetent.'"

In McDonald v. Young, 109 Ia. 705, 81 N. W. 156, the court says:

[174] "Several questions asked, of W. W. Young were objected to as being incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant. It is argued that the questions called for personal transactions with his deceased mother, and the testimony given in response thereto should have been excluded, under Section 3639, Code 1873. The objection, in the form made here, is not sufficient to raise the point presented in argument. The objection of incompetency, without more, goes to the evidence and not to the witness. The testimony given was competent. It is the witness who is made incompetent to speak, under Section 3639, and the objection, to be good, must be made to the witness."

In Burdick v. Raymond, 107 Ia. 228, 77 N. W. 833, the syllabus is as follows:

"An objection that testimony is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, hearsay, and not the best evidence, is insufficient to raise the objection that the witness is disqualified by Code, Section 4604, prohibiting certain persons from testifying to personal transactions with decedents."

In Levering v. Langley, 8 Minn. 111, the court says:

"The defendant Langley was called, and under an objection from the plaintiff's counsel that the testimony was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, which was overruled, testified substantially to such an agreement between the parties at the time of the execution of the assignment of the lease. After this evidence had been thus elicited, the counsel for the plaintiff interposed the further objection to the evidence of this agreement that Randall was now dead. The referee overruled the objection as having been made too late. In this decision we think he was clearly right. The plaintiff's counsel could waive his right to object to the evidence of his adversary on the ground of the decease of the plaintiff's assignor, and we think he did so by delaying to assert it until after the witness had been allowed to testify, and more particularly so as he [175] made objections specifically upon other grounds, which were directed to the admissibility of the testimony offered and not to the competency of the witness by whom it was sought to be proved."

The objection made to the evidence given by the defendant's wife was that it was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and that no foundation had been laid." This objection was to the evidence given by the witness, and not to the competency of the witness to testify against the defendant. The evidence that she gave was competent, relevant, and material, and there was no necessity for laying any "foundation" for its introduction.

After the defendant's wife had given her evidence concerning her marriage to the defendant, the defendant should have objected to her giving any further evidence in the case, for the reason that she was his wife, and had no right to testify to any fact except as to her marriage, without his consent.

Had a specific objection of that character been made at the proper time, any evidence by her except as to the marriage would have been inadmissible. But the objections interposed were directed to the evidence and not to her right to give additional evidence against him, and by making said objections and omitting to object to her right to testify to any fact, except the marriage, for the reason that she was his wife, the defendant waived his right to object to her general evidence.

8. When evidence that would be admissible for any purpose, or under any circumstances, is offered, an objection thereto should point out specifically what the objection is, so that the trial court and the adverse party will be thereby advised of the real point of the objection. To say that a question is "incompetent, [176] irrelevant, and immaterial" conveys neither to the court nor to counsel any specific information as to the real point of objection. If a question calls for facts that would not be admissible for any purpose or under any circumstances, a general objection thereto is sufficient.

9. Objections to evidence must be made at the right time, or they cannot be considered on appeal.

10. We have examined all the assignments of error, but have found no error in the proceedings of the trial court. We have read all the evidence and the charge of the court, and we are satisfied that the defendant had a fair trial, and that there is abundant evidence to support the verdict and the judgment. It is not necessary to discuss, in this opinion, each of the assignments of error. We have examined them all and find no cause for reversal.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed. Affirmed.

NOTE.

Husband or Wife as Competent Witness in Prosecution for Bigamy.

The earlier cases passing on the competency of the husband or wife of the accused as a witness in a prosecution for bigamy, are reviewed in the notes to State v. Kniffen, 12 Ann. Cas. 113; and State v. Burt, 106 Am. St. Rep. 759. This note presents the recent cases on the subject.

Unless it is specifically permitted by statute, in a prosecution for bigamy, the lawful husband or wife of the accused cannot testify against him. Knapp v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. 633, 114 S. W. 836, 130 Am. St. Rep. 903; Bryan v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. 136, 114 S. W. 811. Thus in the case first cited the court said: "In cases of bigamy the first wife cannot be used as a witness against her husband. If the first marriage was void or illegal and was not in fact such a marriage as is contemplated by the statute of bigamy or by our law, or by the law of the marital contract, then a second marriage would not be illegal. There was error, therefore, in permitting the first wife to testify against appellant. This is thoroughly settled in this state.

The rule is universal and the statute is emphatic that the wife cannot testify against her husband except where the offense is directly against her person. This is so in bigamy, incest, adultery, fornication and similar offenses and the same rule applies as in bigamy cases." And in Bryan v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. 136, 114 S. W. 811, it was said: "Upon the trial of the case the court permitted the wife of the first marriage to testify for the state. This has been held error by an unbroken line of authorities of this court. Evidently the learned trial judge knowing the outrage that often goes unpunished by reason of this fact, permitted this testimony introduced in order that this court might have an opportunity of again reviewing the authorities on this question. This we have done, and although, as the court evidently did, we recognize the fact that often an appellant goes unwhipped of justice by reason of the inability of the former wife to testify, yet we are constrained to hold and adhere to the former adjudications of this court, believing that they are in consonance with the statute which inhibits the wife testifying against the husband. But we most respectfully call the legislature's attention to the fact that the statute itself should be amended, and especially in bigamy cases the wife should be permitted to testify."

In Oregon, the statute with respect to the competency of a husband or wife as a witness against the other in a prosecution for bigamy, is as follows: "In all criminal actions, where the husband is the party accused, the wife shall be a competent witness, and, when the wife is the party accused, the husband shall be a competent witness; but neither husband nor wife, in such cases, shall be compelled or allowed to testify in such cases unless by consent of both of them: Provided, that in all cases of personal violence upon either by the other, the injured party, husband or wife, shall be allowed to testify against the other: Provided further, that in all criminal actions for polygamy or adultery, the husband or wife of the accused, shall be a competent witness, and shall be allowed to testify against the other, and without the consent of the other, as to the fact of marriage." [L. O. L. § 1535, as amended by Laws of Oregon, 1913, p. 351.] Under that statute, it is held in the reported case that, in a prosecution for polygamy the lawful wife of the accused may testify to the fact of marriage and that the admission of other testimony by her will not be reviewed in the absence of a specific objection to her competency. In State v. Locke (Ore.) 151 Pac. 717, it was held that the statute does not limit the testimony of the wife to the bare fact of marriage but that she may testify to the time and place thereof.

In Maryland, a husband or wife is a competent witness against the other in a criminal prosecution (Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, art. 85, § 4). In Richardson v. State, 163 Md.

112, 63 Atl. 317, it was held that a lawful wife, in a prosecution of the husband for bigamy, is a competent witness and may testify to her marriage with the defendant, although under the statute she cannot be compelled to testify.

BOROK

v.

CITY OF BIRMINGHAM.

Alabama Supreme Court—December 17, 1914.

191 Ala. 75; 67 So. 339.

Criminal Law — Appeal from Magistrate — Objections First Made on Appeal.

Objection to the sufficiency of a complaint for violation of an ordinance cannot be made for the first time in the circuit court on appeal.

Harmless Error — Validity of Count Not Considered Below.

Where an affidavit filed in recorder's court for violation of an ordinance was treated on appeal to the criminal court as importing the charge tried, and under it guilt was determined, whether the other count of the affidavit, or the statement filed in the criminal court, both attempting to charge a like offense, were sufficient or not, is immaterial on a further appeal.

Presumption on Appeal — Verdict on Proven Acts.

It will not be assumed that the verdict was rested on any act of which there was no evidence.

Statutes — Implied Repeal.

There being no provision in the Smith and Parks Bills (Gen. Acts 1911, pp. 249-288, 26-31) defining what are unlawful drinking places, the provisions of section 5 of Act August 9, 1909, (Acts Sp. Sess. 1909, pp. 10, 11), defining unlawful drinking places, were not repealed, except in so far as regularly issued licenses to maintain drinking places afford the legal right to maintain such places.

Municipal Corporations — Ordinances — Supplementing Statute.

If is no objection to municipal ordinances, under Pol. Code 1907, § 1261, giving municipalities full power to pass ordinances, that they afford additional regulations complementary to the end state legislation would effect, if they are not in contravention of any state enactment.

[See generally Ann. Cas. 1912D 677.]

Making Facts Prima Facie Evidence.

An ordinance providing that certain circumstances, when established by evidence, should raise a prima facie presumption of guilt, which promulgates the same rule as the Fuller Bill (Acts Sp. Sess. 1909, p. 63), infracts no constitutional provision.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal — Persons Entitled to Allege Error — Irresponsive Answer by Witness.

Motion to exclude an answer merely because not responsive can only be availed of by the interrogator.

Intoxicating Liquors — Evidence — Other Offenses.

Where the issue on a prosecution for violation of a municipal ordinance was whether defendant kept at his storehouse prohibited liquors with intent to sell same contrary to law, a question to a witness, whether he bought liquor at that location recently before the offense alleged and after the passage of the ordinance, is an evidential fact, bearing on defendant's guilt.

Appeal from Jefferson Criminal Court: GREENE, Judge.

Prosecution for violation of municipal ordinance. R. A. Borok convicted and appeals. Transferred from Court of Appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion, AFFIRMED.

Samuel B. Stern for appellant.

Joseph P. Mudd for appellee.

[76] McCLELLAN, J.—(1-3.) On appeal to the criminal court, the defendant (appellant) was adjudged guilty of the violation of an ordinance of the city of Birmingham. No objection to the sufficiency of the complaint on which defendant was found guilty by the recorder having been made in the recorder's court, objection could not be made thereto in the criminal court on appeal.—Birmingham v. O'Hearn, 149 Ala. 307, 42 So. 836, 13 Ann. Cas. 1131; Aderhold v. Anniston, 99 Ala. 521, 12 So. 472; McKinstry v. Tuscaloosa, 172 Ala. 344, 54 So. 629. The affidavit filed in the recorder's court contained in its first "count" every element with respect to probable cause that could be exacted in a criminal prosecution; and that "count" was treated on the trial in the criminal court of Jefferson county, after appeal, as importing the charge there tried; and under it guilt was determined as of an offense against the municipal ordinance. So, whether the other "count" in the affidavit, or the statement filed in the criminal court—both directed to the purpose of charging a like offense to that set forth in the first "count" in the affidavit—were sufficient or not, is entirely immaterial on this appeal. There was no averment in the mentioned first "count" asserting the manufacture of forbidden liquors by the defendant, and there was no evidence tending in any degree to show [77] that defendant manufactured forbidden liquors; whereas, there was evidence supporting the allegation of infraction of the ordinance by the forbidden traffic in intoxicants. It cannot be assumed that the jury's verdict was rested upon any act of which there was not the slightest intimation or evidence, namely, the manufacture of forbidden liquors, which was not condemned or inhibited in the ordinance 58-C, but which was alleged in the statement filed in the criminal court.

(4) It has been determined here that the Smith and Parks Bills (Gen. Acts 1911, pp. 249-288, 26-31), treating the manufacture, sale, etc., of intoxicants, did not operate the repeal of the Fuller and Carmichael Bills (Acts Sp. Sess. 1909, pp. 8, 63), except in the particulars the former laws are inconsistent with the latter laws.—Western Ry. v. Capitol Brewing, etc. Co. 177 Ala. 149, 153, 50 So. 52; Allen v. State, 181 Ala. 383, 61 So. 912, 913. There being no provision in the Smith and Parks Bills defining what are unlawful drinking places, the provisions of section 5 of the act approved August 9, 1909 (Acts Sp. Sess. 1909, p. 10-11), defining unlawful drinking places were not repealed by the Smith and Parks Bills, except in so far as regularly issued licenses to maintain drinking places afford the legal right to maintain such places. Unless legally licensed under existing laws, every place defined in said section 5 as an unlawful drinking place is such and is subject to the provisions in that respect of the laws enacted at the Special Session of the Legislature held in 1909.

(5) By section 1251 of the Political Code (codifying what is known as the Municipal Code), the amplest authority was conferred on municipal governing bodies to enact ordinances to the ends therein defined. That section is as follows: "Municipal corporations [78] shall have power from time to time to adopt ordinances and resolutions not inconsistent with the laws of the state, to carry into effect or discharge the powers and duties conferred by this chapter, and to provide for the safety, preserve the health, promote the prosperity, improve the morals, order, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants of the municipality, and to enforce obedience to such ordinances by fine not exceeding one hundred dollars and by imprisonment or hard labor not exceeding six months, one or both."

There is nothing in ordinance No. 58-C which appears to be in conflict with any state law on the subject. It is no objection to municipal ordinances, in which no contravention of a state enactment is undertaken or is effected, that they afford additional regulations complementary to the end state legislation would effect.—Turner v. Lineville, 2 Ala. App. 454, 56 So. 603, 605.

(6) Section 8 of the ordinance provided that certain circumstances, when established by the evidence, should raise a prima facie presumption of guilt of defined unlawful acts. This section was admitted in evidence over defendant's objection. The substance of this section (8) of the ordinance infracts no constitutional provision.—Ex p. Woodward, 131 Ala. 97, 61 So. 295. Section 4 of the Fuller Bill (Acts Sp. Sess. 1909, p. 64), considered in Ex p. Woodward, ~~supra~~, provides a rule of evidence of general application in state and municipal prosecutions for violation of laws pertaining to the liquor traffic. That rule of evidence was applicable to the appellant's prosecution and effected to make out the prima facie case under features of section 1 of Ordinance No. 58-C. Hence no prejudice could have resulted to the appellant in the admission of section 8 of the mentioned ordinance which but reiterated the [79] substance of the pertinent rule of evidence provided in section 4 of the state statute.

(7) One of the issues on trial was whether defendant kept at his storehouse, in the city of Birmingham, prohibited liquors with the intent to sell the same contrary to law. The witness Flagg was asked whether or not he had bought any liquor from defendant on Fifteenth street near Avenue E in January, 1913. The question was not objectionable. The time referred to in the question was long after the ordinance had become effective. Motion to exclude an answer merely because not responsive can only be availed of by the interrogator.—Pope v. State, 174 Ala. 63, 76, 57 So. 245. Whether defendant had sold liquors at that location, so recently before the particular occasion under investigation, contrary to law, was an evidential circumstance bearing on one of the issues of guilt vel non as stated before.

The sentence imposed upon the defendant was within the penalty prescribed by section 1 of Ordinance No. 58-C.

There is no prejudicial error in the record. The judgment must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE.

Validity of Ordinance Providing that Certain State of Facts Shall Constitute Prima Facie Evidence of Violation Thereof.

In the few cases involving the validity of an ordinance declaring the proof of a certain state of facts to be prima facie evidence of a violation thereof, the courts have followed the rules governing statutes containing similar provisions and have held the ordinance to be valid, as merely prescribing a rule of evidence. Com. v. Price, 123 Ky. 163, 13 Ann. Cas. 499, 94 S.W. 32; Piqua v. Zimmerlin, 35 Ohio St. 507. See also Paducah v. Ragsdale, 122 Ky. 425, 92 S.W. 13; State v. Vaas, 49 La. Ann. 444, 21 So. 596, 62 Am. St. Rep. 658. And see the reported case. In Com. v. Price, supra, it was said of the power of a municipality to pass such an ordinance: "The city council has a large discretion in the enactment of ordinances and an ordinance enacted under the police power will not be declared void unless it is clearly oppressive or unreasonable. It was competent for the legislative body in making the law to provide what should be a prima facie case, and to place upon the defendant, in case a violation of the law was shown, the burden of showing that the case fell within one of the exceptions named in the ordinance. The ordinance makes it an offence for the saloon keeper to suffer an infant or female to drink in his saloon, or to be or remain there over five minutes, and when these facts are shown the prosecution has made out its case, and the burden then shifts to the defendant to show that the case falls within one of the exceptions named in the ordinance." In Rowland v. Greencastle, 157 Ind. 591, 62 N.E. 474, an ordinance prescribing the business section of a city and prohibiting the conduct of the liquor business in any other portion was held to render prima facie unlawful shops kept for the sale of liquor outside the business section as defined. This, the court held, the city had power to do. But it was held in In re Wong Hane, 108 Cal. 680, 41 Pac. 493, 49 Am. St. Rep. 138, that an ordinance providing that it should be unlawful to have in one's possession any lottery ticket unless it was shown that such possession was innocent or for a lawful purpose, was invalid because it overthrew the presumption of innocence.

DOMINION FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

NAKATA.

Canada, Supreme Court—December 29, 1915.

52 Can. Sup. Ct. 294.

Fire Insurance.—On Bawdy House—Validity.

A policy of fire insurance on a house of prostitution and the furniture therein is void as against public policy.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court of Alberta.

Action on fire insurance policy. Minnie Nakata, plaintiff, and Dominion Fire Insurance Company, defendants. Judgment for plaintiff in trial court: BECK, Judge. Judgment affirmed by Supreme Court of Alberta. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinions. APPEAL ALLOWED.

Hamilton Cassels, K. C. for appellant.

C. T. Jones, K. C. for respondent.

Cassels, Brook, Kelly & Falconbridge, solicitors for appellant.

Jones, Peacock & Adams, solicitors for respondent.

[295] THE CHIEF JUSTICE.—I have come to the conclusion, with some hesitation, that this appeal must be allowed. This is certainly not from any desire to assist the appellants, for I think, as Lord Mansfield says in Holman v. Johnson, 1 Cowp. (Eng.) 341, "the objection that a contract is immoral and illegal as between plaintiff and defendant sounds at all times very ill in the mouth of the defendant."

The objection is allowed on principles of public policy which the defendant has the advantage of contrary [296] to the real justice as between him and the plaintiff.

In the appellants' factum it is said:—"It must be clearly borne in mind in dealing with this appeal that this is not one of those too frequently occurring cases of an attempt by an insurance company to escape by means of some technicality a liability deliberately assumed by it and for the assumption of which it has received its stipulated recompense."

These are brave words, but unfortunately are not borne out by the facts. The factum proceeds:—

The plaintiff is a foreigner of bad character. I do not think it is particularly creditable for the appellants to allege, as one of the grounds for trying to escape liability that the respondent is a foreigner, and, as to the fact that she is of bad character, it appears on the face of the policy, issued under the corporate seal of the company and the signature of its president, that the premises were kept by the insured, as a disorderly house.

The law, I think, is stated in Phillips on Insurance (5 ed.) in chapter III. section 2, on the legality of the insurable interest. We read sub-section 210:—

"Insurance upon a subject is void if the interest insured is illegal or if the contract contemplates an unlawful use of it," and this is carried further in sub-section 211, "though there is no express prohibition in respect to a subject, still if insurance upon it is contrary to the spirit and general principles, or what is called 'the policy' of the law, the owner cannot make a valid insurance upon it."

Again, sub-section 231, after referring to cases partly legal and partly illegal where a valid insurance may be made for the legal part, continues:—

"In the preceding cases no illegality appeared on the face of the contract of insurance. Where such does appear, the whole contract is void, as in the case of an agreement to employ a ship in an illegal trade."

"No distinction can be made between an illegal and an immoral purpose; the rule which is applicable to the matter is, ex turpi causa non oritur actio; and whether it is an immoral or an illegal purpose in which the plaintiff has participated it comes equally within the terms of that maxim and the effect is the same; no cause of action can arise out of either the one or the other."

In the notes to the case of Collins v. Blanton (1 Smith Lead. Cas. [12 ed.] 412), in Smith's Leading Cases (ed. 1816) it is said:—

"Contracts made for immoral purposes are simply void. The illegality is equally fatal when created by statute."

Many cases are cited in support of this latter proposition. By section 228 of the Criminal Code the keeping of a disorderly house is an indictable offence and the purpose for which this house is used, being expressly stated in the policy, there can be no doubt of the illegality of the purpose for which it was used.

In Scott v. Brown (1892) 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 724, at page 728, Lindley L. J. said:—

"Ex turpi causa non oritur actio. This old and well known legal maxim is founded in good sense and expresses a clear and well-recognized legal principle which is not confined to indictable offences. No court ought to enforce an illegal contract or allow itself to be made the instrument of enforcing obligations alleged to arise out of a contract or transaction which is illegal. . . . If the evidence adduced by the plaintiff proves the illegality the court ought not to assist him."

In his judgment in the case in this court of Clark v. Hagar, 22 Can. Sup. Cas. 510, Mr. Justice Gwynne refers to a number of cases as establishing that the true test whether a demand connected with an illegal transaction is capable of being enforced at law, is whether the plaintiff requires any aid from the illegal transaction to establish [298] his case. In the present action the plaintiff, now respondent, could not, of course, succeed without proving the policy bearing on its face evidence of illegality. Such proof is offensive to the court and cannot be received.

That we find in the English reports no case exactly in point is not, I think, a matter of surprise. English insurance companies, it is well known, rarely dispute their liabilities, never except in gross cases. Further, I should think it probable that respectable companies would be unwilling to state in their policies an immoral purpose. Few people, one may suppose, are willing to advertise their own turpitude unnecessarily.

There is a case in the Circuit Court of Quebec of Bruneau v. Laliberté, 19 Quebec Sup. Ct. 425, in which Mr. Justice Andrews held that "insurance upon the furniture in a house of ill-fame is an illegal and immoral contract and will not be enforced by the courts."

I do not think it is necessary for me to dissent from anything said in the judgment above referred to of Clark v. Hagar, 22 Can. Sup. Ct. 510. It is relied on in the decision of Morin v. Anglo-American F. Ins. Co. 3 Alberta 121, 13 West. L. Rep. 667, in the court of appeal for the Province of Alberta, which the decision now under appeal professes to follow, and also in the later case of Trites Wood Co. v. Western Assur. Co. 15 British Columbia 405, 15 West. L. Rep. 475, in the Court of Appeal for British Columbia. It is, however, unnecessary to examine this judgment particularly, as I am unable to find in it anything to support the decisions in these cases in which, as in the present case, the [299] illegality appears upon the face of the contract sued upon.

For the French law on the subject, see Planiol (6 ed.) vol 2, para. 1009 et seq. and cases there cited. The modern tendency of the Cour de Cassation would appear to be, however, to maintain the validity of contracts such as the one here in question on the ground that the reciprocal obligations which the parties assume relate exclusively to the payment by the insured of the agreed premium and to the payment by the company of the stipulated indemnity in the event of the destruction of the thing insured. Vide Sirey, 1904, 1, page 509; but see S. V. 1896, 1, 289; Appert's note; S. V. 1913, 1, 497, note, and S. & P. 1909, 1, 188.

There is no provision in the Code Penal which corresponds with section 228 of the Canadian Criminal Code.

The appeal will be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants, the present appellants, but without costs.

DAVIES, J.—I think this appeal should be allowed upon the grounds submitted by Mr. Cassels.

In the first place, I think Carr was the agent of Nakata for the purpose of procuring the policy of insurance in question.

The insured was the keeper of a "sporting house" which Mr. Jones, for the respondent, candidly admitted was well understood to be a bawdy house or house of ill-fame.

The husband of the plaintiff applied to Carr, an insurance broker, to obtain the insurance and was told by him that he could not take it in the insurance [300] company for which he was agent, but would apply to other companies and was instructed to do so. He applied to the general agent in the province of the appellant company, who agreed to take it. The applicant paid to Carr a part of the insurance premium and shortly afterwards returned to Carr to obtain the policy when he was told it was subject to cancellation at any time. He then paid Carr the balance of the premium and Carr handed over to him the policy.

Carr says that at that time he asked them whether in case of cancellation he would return the money or put the insurance in some other company—and he was told to put it in some other company.

The same afternoon Carr received notice that the head-office had cancelled the policy, whereupon he wrote and sent by registered post a letter to the plaintiff telling her the policy was cancelled. Carr had received the premium from the applicant, and on receiving notice of the cancellation of the policy made, as instructed, efforts to obtain insurance elsewhere, but was unsuccessful and the premium remained in his hands.

The trial judge was of the opinion that the whole thing depended upon the question of the agency of Carr for the insured upon which there is much to be said upon both sides.

The learned judge was not satisfied that Carr was an agent to receive notice of cancellation and this view prevailed in the court of appeal.

I am of opinion, however, that Carr was such an agent and that the premium having been left with him in case of cancellation to obtain insurance in some other company, that he was the agent of the insured for receiving notice of such cancellation.

[301] On the other ground also, that the contract was one for facilitating the carrying on of an illegal and immoral object, I think the appeal should be allowed. The trial judge and the court of appeal felt themselves concluded by the case of Morin v. Anglo-American F. Ins. Co. 3 Alberta L. Rep. 121, 13 West. L. Rep. 667. I am not able to accept that authority or the reasoning upon which it was founded. I think the principle upon which the case of Pearce v. Brooks, L. R. 1 Exch. (Eng.) 213, was decided the proper one to apply in this case.

That principle is that one who makes a contract for sale or hire with the knowledge that the other party intended to apply the subject-matter of the contract to an immoral purpose cannot recover on the contract. As Pollack C. B. said in that case if an article was required and furnished "to facilitate the carrying on of the immoral purpose" that is sufficient. The courts would not lend their aid to carry it out. It seems to be that the facts of the case now before us are stronger against the enforcement of the contract than those in the case of Pearce v. Brooks, L. R. 1 Exch. (Eng.) 213, which the Exchequer Court refused their aid to enforce. In that case, the plaintiffs sued for the hire of a brougham by a woman known by them to be a prostitute and who used the brougham to their knowledge for the purpose of making a display favourable to her immoral purposes.

In the case of Johnson v. Union Marine, etc. Ins. Co. 127 Mass. 555, the court followed a previous decision of their own in Kelly v. Home Ins. Co. 97 Mass. 288, and held that if a person engaged in the unlawful business [302] of selling intoxicating liquors without a licence at the time of the making and acceptance of a policy of insurance on his stock in trade and a month afterwards, the policy does not attach, although he made application for a licence immediately after he began such business.

The grounds on which the decision was placed in Kelly v. Home Ins. Co. 97 Mass. 288, above referred to were that the object of the assured in obtaining the policy was to make their illegal business safe and profitable and that the direct and immediate purpose of the contract of insurance being to protect and encourage an unlawful traffic the contract was illegal and never attached.

The same principle was held by Andrews J. to govern in the case of Brunau v. Laliberté, 19 Quebec Super. Ct. 425.

I think this principle should apply to this case, the contractual obligation of the company, being in case of loss, either to pay the same up to the amount insured or to "replace the property damaged or lost." Could it be fairly argued that the replacement of the property would not be an aiding or facilitating of the immoral purpose for the carrying on of which the house and furniture were used? I think the courts of this land should not lend their aid to enforce contracts made to facilitate the keeping of houses of ill-fame, which, in my judgment, this insurance policy was calculated to do...

IDLINGTON, J. (dissenting).—This is an action upon a policy of insurance against fire on a house, in Calgary, owned by respondent and used as a bawdy house, [303] in modern slang phrase described, as it was in the said policy, as a "sporting house," and on furniture therein.

The chief ground of defence set up was that, pursuant to a statutory condition indorsed thereon, the policy had been cancelled long before the fire.

It is quite clearly established, indeed not seriously disputed, that the policy was duly issued by the general agents of the appellant and the premium therefor paid.

It was procured by a local broker from the said general agents. A good deal of what was, I respectfully submit, needless discussion, has taken place as to the details of how this payment and its alleged return was dealt with. I assume, upon the facts in evidence, that the general agents received the premium, but failed to return same in any way for more than six weeks after the date of the policy, although the alleged cancellation is claimed to have taken place within ten days after said date!

This alleged re-payment is only material in considering the contention set up by appellant that Mr. Carr, the broker, was the respondent's agent to receive the return of the money.

The power of cancellation relied upon is that contained in the condition, No. 19, of the statutory conditions in force in Alberta.

I think it is necessary for any company seeking to avail itself of the power therein contained to follow the very simple and clear terms of that condition.

I cannot find in what was done anything even resembling what the power requires. Nor can I find that what the respondent's husband said to Carr could [304] entitle him, as her agent, to set aside or waive that condition and all implied therein.

The details of all that have been so fully dealt with by the learned judges in the courts below that I do not think I can serve any good purpose by setting forth an additional elaboration thereof.

The appellant stoutly maintains Carr was not its agent, though appearing on the policy as agent. I accept its contention in that regard.

The doing so relieves me of the necessity for considering the possible effect of his sending her a notice. The only notice alleged to have been given the insured was one mailed to her by Carr, but never received by her, or heard of by any one acting for her as her agent for that purpose.

There never was, unless Carr was appellant's agent, anything done, I repeat, resembling what the statutory condition imposes upon the insuring company to be done by it in such cases, but not by some one else.

Again, it is contended that the policy was illegal upon the ground that the owner of a bawdy house cannot insure himself, or herself, against loss thereof by fire.

We have all heard of leases made of a house to be used for such like purposes being illegal, either because it obviously promotes the illegal purpose had in view, or because the consideration for such a lease may be tainted thereby and, hence, the contract is void.

I am unable to understand how the policy of insurance can, as of course, in itself promote the carrying on of such a traffic, or in law be held to fall within the principles upon which I suggest a lease, for example, may be illegal and be thereby void.

[305] It is urged the house had become vacant and that change of condition so increased the risk as to violate the condition. The learned trial judge upon the facts found against the appellant, and no appeal was made against that finding.

Though neither set up in the pleadings, nor urged at the trial, nor presented to the court of appeal, counsel for the appellant seeks now, for the first time, in this court to set up the further defence that there was an undisclosed encumbrance on the property and some false statement of proof of loss in that regard.

The manifest injustice of allowing such an issue of fact to be raised at this stage for the first time has always been held a sufficient answer here to permitting any such course.

The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

DUFF, J. (dissenting).—The first question is whether the policy was in force at the time of the fire and that subdivides itself into: (a) Did the appellant company receive payment of the insurance premium? and (b) Was the power of cancellation with which the insurers were invested by the terms of the policy effectively put into operation?

The answer to the former question must be in the affirmative or the negative according as the appellant company is held or not held to be precluded from disputing both that payment to Carr and that payment to Tavender & Co. would be payment to themselves. As to Carr—for some purposes he no doubt was the agent of the respondent, but it does not necessarily follow that he was not also the agent of the appellant company for the purpose of receiving payment of the premium. [306] The policy was delivered by Carr to the respondent's husband and on the policy there was a declaration to the effect that Tavender & Co. were the general agents of the company and there was also a statement that Carr was the company's agent. In the appellant's factum it is said that the designation of Carr as agent was adopted as a matter of office procedure in recognition of Carr's right to a commission for the introduction. For our present purpose we are not concerned "with the appellant's office procedure." Carr held the policy for delivery to the respondent on payment of the premium and the designation of him as agent correctly describes the character in which he had possession of the policy which he unquestionably held for the company and delivered to the respondent on their behalf; the description of him as agent and his possession of the policy for the company together constituted a representation upon which the respondent was entitled to act on paying the premium. Counsel for the respondent did not, of course, dispute, it would have been hopeless to do so, that if a loss had occurred immediately after the delivery of the policy and before the transmission of the premium by Carr and before any steps had been taken looking to cancellation; that it would have been impossible to deny that the risk had attached. As to Tavender & Co.—the premium was in fact paid by a set off of the accounts between Tavender & Co. and Carr—the repudiation of Tavender & Co.'s action by the company could have no effect upon the rights of the respondent, who, having no notice of any limitation of authority was entitled to assume that Tavender & Co. were acting within the scope of that conferred upon them.

[307] As to cancellation. It is not disputed that notice of cancellation was not received by the respondent. The appellant's contention rests upon the proposition that Carr had been constituted the respondent's agent for the receipt of such notice. The contention breaks down on the facts, there being simply no evidence to support a conclusion that the parties intended that the policy should be subject to cancellation without notice to the respondent personally. The direction alleged to have been given to Carr to retain the premium in the event of cancellation cannot fairly be held to imply authority to receive notice of cancellation. The learned trial judge found against agency in fact and I entirely agree with his view on this point.

We now come to the difficult question: Was the policy invalid as tainted with illegality by reason of the purported contract being a contract entered into for the purpose of assisting the respondent in carrying on an illegal business by securing her indemnity against loss of property by fire while the property was being employed for an illegal purpose?

The facts are that the house and personal effects, the subjects insured, were at the time of the application in the possession of the respondent who carried on in the house and used the furniture for the purpose of carrying on the business (as it is described in the application) of a "sporting house," in other words, a house of ill-fame. This fact, being stated in the application, was, of course, known to the company. At the time the fire occurred the house was not occupied by the respondent, but was in the care of a caretaker who slept there at nights. The usual premium was charged, there being no augmentation because of [308] any special hazard that might be supposed to exist by reason of the character of the occupation, and there is no suggestion that this last mentioned circumstance in itself, according to insurance practice, would be regarded as entailing any special hazard or as affecting the character of the risk from the actuarial point of view. It appears further that the appellant company was unwilling to accept the risk and directed the cancellation of the policy as soon as they became aware of the facts. The point, however, upon which the appellant company based its objection was a rather narrow one. The officials of the company appear to have had no objection to accept a risk of this character if the place was situated within what was described as a "licensed district," in other words, if the place was permitted to flourish by the openly understood sanction of the police. The house in question not being as I have said within a "licensed district" these officials decided to put an end to the risk.

The argument for the appellant is now put in this way. The respondent, it is said, sought insurance to enable her the more safely to carry on a business which is not only a violation of the law itself, but is a public trading in immorality. It is said that the performance of such contracts of indemnity by the insurer has a tendency directly to encourage illegality and immorality and such contracts are, therefore, in such circumstances, within one of those classes which the courts refuse to enforce, as being in the traditional phrase "tainted with illegality." I have come to the conclusion that this view does not furnish the governing rule for the decision of this appeal; but I am far from suggesting that there is not a great deal of force in the strict legal considerations that may be adduced [309] in support of it, however little one may be disposed to look with anything but impatience upon the posture of this company whose interest in the public morals finds adequate expression in a distinction between bawdy houses protected by the police, according to clearly understood convention, and bawdy houses whose toleration is more irregular and precarious.

This question is, of course, a dry question of law. This contract of insurance is not in itself illegal in the sense that it is a contract directly forbidden by law or in the sense that it is intended to create an obligation to do anything forbidden by law. If the appellant company had paid the respondent's claim, nothing in the making or the performance of the contract could be described as illegal. A contract, however, on the face of it collateral to an unlawful act or to an unlawful course of business or to an unlawful design may be so connected with the illegality as to be vitiated by it; the question as Marshall C. J. said in Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. 259, at p. 272, 6 U. S. (L. ed.) 468, very often is a question of considerable nicety whether the connection is or is not of such a character as to have that effect.

There is a number of decisions in cases similar to this in which the insurance contract is treated (1) as an agreement to indemnify against the consequences of an illegal course of action or (2) as a mere incident in the carrying on of some transaction or business forbidden by law.

The former is the interpretation which has been given to marine policies insuring a voyage illegal in its inception, such policies being held void as attempts [310] to contract for indemnity against the loss suffered by reason of carrying out an unlawful enterprise. See Wilson v. Rankin, L. R. 1 Q. B. (Kng.) 162; Ocean Ins. Co. v. Polleys, 13 Pet. 157, 10 U. S. (L. ed.) 105. The latter is the interpretation upon which rest certain decisions in the American courts, notably in the courts of Massachusetts in which policies of insurance effected upon stocks of liquor held for sale by unlicensed dealers in violation of the law have been thought void as transactions in reality constituting in part the carrying on of an unlawful business.

These interpretations cannot, I think, be said to fit the case before us. The fact that in accordance with settled practice an applicant for insurance is required to state the business, if any, carried on on the premises proposed for insurance, and the fact that the business named is illegal and the fact that this statement with other statements in the application constitute the basis of the contract do not justify the interpretation of the contract as a contract to indemnify against loss incurred by reason of the carrying on of an illegal business; the policy being in the usual form, the risk insured against being the risk of fire from causes usually insured against in a policy in that form, the premium, as I have already said, being the usual premium. One would not think of describing a policy of insurance upon his office furniture taken out by a promoter whose chief business was to effect mergers obnoxious against the provisions of the Criminal Code as an agreement to indemnify against loss incurred in the course of his illegal business; and yet the parallel if not exact is approximate.

[311] Neither ought the latter of the above mentioned views (which has been given effect to in Massachusetts in the cases referred to) to govern in this case. It would be a quite unreasonable interpretation of the intentions of the parties to this contract to hold that the terms of the bargain in any way turned upon the character of the business carried on. One could better interpret their intentions by saying that the contract was made in spite of the fact rather than because of the fact that the occupation was of the character mentioned.

A distinction suggested by a series of English cases dealing with the enforceability of contracts made with persons of the respondent's class may, I think, well serve as a key to the solution of the question before us. In Lloyd v. Johnson 1 B. & P. 340, Mr. Justice Buller, in Bowry v. Bennet, 1 Campb. 348, Lord Ellenborough, and in Pearce v. Brooks, L. R. 1 Exch. 213, the Court of Exchequer had such contracts before them and the net result, I think, of the authorities of which these are typical examples, is summed up with accuracy in the treatise on contracts by Mr. Manisty, in Halsbury Laws of England, vol. 7, p. 400, in these words:—

"An action lies to recover the price of goods sold or work done even though that the plaintiff knew that the person with whom he was dealing was a prostitute (Lloyd v. Johnson, L. R. 1 Exch. 213); Bowry v. Bennet, 1 Campb. 348), unless it appears that the goods were sold or the work was done for the purpose of enabling her to exercise or assisting her in the exercise of her immoral calling. (Hamilton v. Grainger, 5 H. & N. 40; Pearce v. Brooks, L. R. 1 Exch. 213)."

In Pearce v. Brooks, Baron Bramwell, who had tried the action, says:—

[312] "I told the jury that, in some sense, everything which was supplied to a prostitute is supplied to enable her to carry on her trade, as, for instance, shoes sold to a street walker; and that the things supplied must not merely be such as would be necessary or useful for ordinary purposes, and might be also applied to an immoral one; but that they must be such as would under the circumstances not be required, except with that view."

This insurance company, no doubt invites us to hold that when they do enter into contracts for the insurance of such places (being, of course, let it be well understood, within a "licensed district") they do so with the object of enabling the proprietors to exercise and to assist them in the exercise of their immoral calling. In fact, of course, it is not so and it would be ridiculous to say that they ever thought of assisting the respondent in the exercise of her trade or of supplying her with anything that had any special reference to her trade or of contracting with her in any other character than that of the proprietor of a furnished dwelling simply.

The above mentioned cases were applied in this court in the case of Clark v. Hagar, 22 Can. Sup. Ct. 510, and the judgment of Mr. Justice Gwynne, who spoke for the majority of the court, contains an exhaustive but luminous exposition of the effect of the decisions and his conclusions are substantially in harmony with the passage quoted above from Mr. Maniaty's treatise.

Mr. Justice Gwynne's judgment was applied in a case similar to the present by the British Columbia Court of Appeal, Trites Wood Co. v. Western Assur. Co. 15 British Columbia 405, 15 West. L. Rep. 475.

I must not omit a reference to Bruneau v. Laliberté, 19 Quebec Super. Ct. 425 (Mr. Justice Andrews), in which it was [313] held that a policy of insurance on the furniture of a house of ill-fame was an illegal and immoral contract and non-enforceable. The decision is, in part, based on an interpretation of Pearce v. Brooks, L. R. 1 Exch. (Eng.) 213, which is not, I think, an admissible interpretation; and upon certain French authorities which were supposed to support the conclusion at which the learned trial judge arrived. In France, however, the jurisprudence is, by no means uniformly in favor of the learned judge's view as is shown by the following passages from Carpentier, Rep. Supplément, 2 Assurance contre l'incendie, Nos. 64 and 207 (2), giving the effect of two comparatively recent decisions of the Cour de Cassation:

"64. Le contrat d'assurance contre l'incendie passé par le tenancier d'une maison de tolérance ne peut être annulé comme ayant une cause immorale, alors que, dans ce contrat, les prestations que les parties se sont mutuellement promises consistaient, d'une part, dans le paiement de l'assuré des primes convenues, d'autre part, dans le paiement par la compagnie d'une indemnité pécuniaire, ou, à son choix, dans la reconstruction ou la réparation des bâtiments incendiés et le remplacement en nature des objets détruits; ces prestations licites en elles-mêmes, n'ont pu devenir illicites par cela seul que les risques assurés dépendaient d'une maison de tolérance, et elles ne sauraient être considérées comme ayant eu en vue la création, le maintien ou l'exploitation d'un établissement de cette nature. Cass., 4 mai, 1903.

"207. (2) Y a-t-il fausse déclaration de la part du tenancier d'une maison de tolérance qui se qualifie de loger en garni? La question s'est posée devant la cour de cassation. Le pourvoi soutenant l'affirmative par les motifs suivants: L'exploitation d'une maison de tolérance, disait-il "présente des risques considérables. Le danger d'incendie, en effet, est plus grand que partout ailleurs dans une maison fréquentée la nuit par des gens souvent avinés, où l'orgie est quotidienne, le drame fréquent, et dont le personnel par sa profession même, est une perpétuelle menace d'imprudence, sinon d'actes malveillants. Ces risques considérables entraînent les compagnies, quand elles consentent à assurer les tenanciers de maisons de tolérance, [314] à exiger d'elles le paiement de primes fort chères." Mais les juges du fond avaient refusé d'accueillir le moyen de nullité, par la raison que la compagnie ne pouvait se méprendre sur la sens et la portée des expressions "loger en garni" dans les circonstances où elles avaient été employées. C'est la solution qu'a fait prévaloir la Cour de cassation. Cass., 4 mai, 1903, Comp. d'assur, terr. Le Monde (S. & P. 1904, D. 1906, 5, 33)." The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

BRODEUR, J.—The first question in this case is whether the contract of insurance was valid.

In the application for insuring the premises, it was stated that the plaintiff (respondent) was keeping a "sporting house," which was understood as being a house of ill-fame.

The policy was procured through the appellants' agents in Calgary. They had the power to accept risks, subject to cancellation by the head-office, as is the usual insurance practice. The head-office of the insurance company refused to maintain the policy and a notice of cancellation was given.

The agents of the appellant company in Calgary immediately notified the broker through whom the application had been made. This broker, Carr, on the same day, wrote to the plaintiff telling her the policy was cancelled and asking for its return. He did not enclose the premium because, as instructed by the plaintiff, he intended to try and get insurance else where.

This letter was not received by the plaintiff and was subsequently returned to Carr.

A fire having taken place on the premises, the present action has been instituted for the purpose of recovering the amount of the insurance.

[315] The company claims that the contract was illegal because it facilitates immorality.

It has been decided in a case of Bruneau v. Laliberté, 19 Québec Sup. Ct. 425, by Mr. Justice Andrews that an "insurance upon the furniture in a house of ill-fame is an illegal and immoral contract, and will not be enforced by the courts."

Addison, on Contracts, p. 72, summarises the matter in stating—

"Contracts tending to promote fornication and prostitution are void." And Beach on Contracts, p. 2019, says that "any contract auxiliary to the keeping of a bawdy house is void." Halsbury, Laws of England, vol. 7, No. 829, p. 400, relying on the case of Pearce v. Brooks, L. R. 1 Exch. 213, says that if it appears that a work was done for the purpose of enabling a prostitute to exercise or assisting her in the exercise of her immoral calling, no action would lie.

Pollock on Contracts (7 ed.) p. 370, in speaking of transactions where there is an agreement for a transfer of property for a lawful consideration, but for the purpose of an unlawful use being made of it, says that—

"The later authorities shew that the agreement is void not merely if an unlawful use of the subject-matter is part of the bargain, but if the intention of one party so to use it is known to the other at the time of the agreement.

"If goods are sold by a vendor who knows that the purchaser means to apply them to an illegal or immoral purpose he cannot recover the price."

I find in Dalloz, Répertoire Pratique, vo. "Contrats et Conventions en général," Nos. 398 and 401, that [316] the contract whose consideration is the maintenance of a house of ill-fame is illicit and the action for the price of the service of a domestic in a house of ill-fame should not be accepted. I must say, however, that this latter decision has been severely criticized by some authors. Baudry-Lacantinerie, vol. 11, No. 313, says:—

"C'est l'obligation sur cause illicite que l'art. 1131 déclare sans effet. Il en est autrement de l'obligation dont le motif seulement est illicite. Ici donc apparaît encore l'utilité de la distinction entre la cause et le motif. Cette distinction est nettement établie dans quelques décisions judiciaires. Mais beaucoup d'autres l'ont perdue de vue et la confusion a engendré des décisions vraiment fantastiques. N'a-t-on pas vu le tribunal de commerce de la Seine, refuser sur le fondement de la cause illicite, tout effet à l'obligation contractée par le directeur d'une maison de tolérance pour acquisition de vins de champagne destinés à être consommés dans son établissement?"

On that first ground, I would be of opinion that the contract of insurance was illegal and that it should be set aside. The appeal should be allowed with costs.

Appeal allowed without costs.

NOTE.

Validity of Insurance Policy on Property Illegally Kept or Used.

Contrary to the holding in Conithan v. Royal Ins. Co. 91 Miss. 386, 15 Ann. Cas. 539, the reported case holds that a fire insurance policy which covers a house of prostitution and the furnishing therein, is invalid and no recovery may be had thereunder, on the ground that a contract of insurance on such a subject is contrary to the policy of the law.

In two recent Canadian cases, similar in facts to the reported case, a view opposed to the one expressed therein, is taken. Trites-Wood Co. v. Western Assur. Co. 15 British Columbia, 405; Morin v. Anglo-American F. Ins. Co. 3 Alberta L. Rep. 121; 13 West. L. Rep. 667. In the case first cited, wherein a recovery was allowed on a fire insurance policy which expressly stated that it insured a "sporting house" the court said: "The insurance of property is one of the things useful for the ordinary purposes of life. Such protection is no more contributory to the immoral trade carried on by the owner of these premises than are the necessities of life. A policy of insurance is not one of those things which would appear not to be required except for an immoral purpose. It was not an inducement to the assured to build and furnish a house for immoral purposes. It was to protect her property from those risks of destruction against which those in every walk of life protect themselves. But it appears from the evidence of the insurance agents that a higher rate is charged upon risks of this nature, and it might be said that the contract is tantamount to a division of profits of the immoral business. There might be something to be said on this phase of the case if it appeared by the evidence that the assured was aware that she was being charged a higher rate on account of the character of her house, but nothing of the kind does appear. She may have thought she was making the ordinary contract of insurance, i. e., paying the ordinary rate payable by respectable householders. True the Company knew what it was about and had a back-room scale of rates for this class of business, though it seems to have lacked the gambler's sense of honour, but whatever could be urged on this point had it been shewn that both parties were bargaining, the one for protection against risks peculiarly incidental to premises frequented by disorderly persons, the other for an increased premium for such protection, cannot be urged against this plaintiff because there is no evidence that the assured was knowingly a part to such transaction."

In Electrova Co. v. Spring Garden Ins. Co. 156 N. C. 232, 72 S. E. 306, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1216, it appeared that the makers of mechanical musical instruments had placed one of their instruments in a bawdy house on trial with the object of later selling it to the proprietress thereof. The makers took out a "floating" fire insurance policy on all of their instruments in two towns which included the one in which the house of ill-fame was located. In an action on the policy to recover for the destruction by fire of the instrument placed in the house of ill-fame it was held that the policy was valid, and that the public interest was too remotely affected, on the facts in the case, to justify a court in refusing to enforce the payment of the policy.

Where the general policy of a state is to forbid the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors, but under certain conditions, such liquors may lawfully be kept and stored, and a statute provides that no action shall be maintained for the recovery of possession of any intoxicating liquor or the value thereof, except in cases where the persons owning or possessing such liquor with lawful intent may have been illegally deprived of the same, it has been held that recovery may be had on a fire insurance policy which covers a quantity of whisky made in the state and stored in a bonded warehouse therein. Mechanics' Ins. Co. v. C. A. Hoover Distilling Co. 105 C. C. A. 128, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 873, 182 Fed. 590, wherein the court said: "This whisky was stored in a bonded warehouse, and the insurance of it against fire neither violated nor had any direct tendency to violate the policy of the state which forbade its manufacture and sale. While the whisky remained stored, it could be neither made nor sold. If the whisky burned, it could not be thereafter sold, and neither the payment nor the contract to pay its value in the event that it was burned could make its manufacture, storage, or sale after the burning possible. Even if these contracts of insurance had the effect to make the business of the manufacture and sale of the liquor less hazardous, and in that way to encourage the conduct of that business, nevertheless that encouragement was not the chief purpose or direct effect, but was a mere incident of the indemnity against loss by fire which the policies were made to secure. The laws of Iowa contain no express prohibition of the insurance of intoxicating liquors against fire, its Supreme Court had sustained a contract for such insurance (Erb. v. Fidelity Ins. Co. 99 Ia. 727, 733, 69 N. W. 261), there was no moral turpitude in the making or the performing of this contract, and the mere fact that an agreement, the consideration and performance of which are lawful, incidentally assists one in evading a law or a public policy, is no bar to its enforcement."

Baumann v. Steingester, 159 N. Y. App. Div. 923, reversed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Second Judicial Department.

Action to construe will. Lena Baumann, plaintiff, and Henry C. Steingester et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff at Special Term of Supreme Court. Judgment affirmed to Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Defendant Magdalena Fuhge appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

John M. O'Neill for appellant.

Anthony Darmstadt for respondent.

[330] SEABURY, J.—This action was commenced to obtain a construction of the last will of Maria Schadrack, deceased, and to have it adjudged that the plaintiff is the legatee described in subdivision 1 of paragraph "Third" of said will, and that she is one of the three residuary legatees referred to in paragraph "Sixth" of said will. The appellant, Magdalena Fuhge, answered and asked to have it adjudged that she is the legatee described in the two paragraphs of the will referred to above. The question at issue upon the trial related to the identity of the legatee referred to as "Lena Baumann" in the following paragraphs of the will. Subdivision 1 of paragraph third provides that the testatrix gives "The sum of $1,000 to my niece Lena Baumann of Richmond Hill in the County and Boroughs of Queens" paragraph sixth provides that the testatrix gives "all the rest and residue of my estate to my three nieces, Helene Bang, Katherine Hainer, and Lena Baumann, to be divided among them share and share alike." The plaintiff is a grandniece of the testatrix, and at the time the will was made resided at Richmond Hill. The appellant is a niece of the testatrix, and her maiden name was Magdalena Baumann. There was evidence received upon the trial to show that the testatrix was accustomed to speak of her as "Lena Baumann," and that while she resided at the time the will was made at a place about one mile from Richmond Hill, the testatrix [331] was also accustomed to refer to this place as "Richmond Hill." It thus appears that the language used in these two paragraphs of the will does not accurately designate either the plaintiff or the appellant. It does not accurately designate the plaintiff because the reference in the will is to a niece of the testatrix, and the plaintiff is a grandniece. It does not accurately designate the appellant because while her maiden name was Magdalena Baumann her name at the time the will was made was Magdalena Fuhge and she did not reside at Richmond Hill. These facts appearing by extrinsic evidence there was a latent ambiguity in the will. Parol evidence was properly receivable in the effort to dissolve this ambiguity. (Lefevre v. Lefevre, 89 N. Y. 434; In re Taylor, 34 Ch. D. (Eng.) 255; Henderson v. Henderson, 1 Ir.

Rep. (Eng.) [1905] 353.) In view of the unanimous affirmance by the Appellate Division of the judgment appealed from, the single question which survives for consideration in this court relates to the rulings of the Special Term excluding the evidence of the witness Kellar. Mr. Kellar was the attorney for the testatrix and was the draftsman of and a subscribing witness to her will. The testatrix, a woman about seventy years of age, called upon Mr. Kellar and gave him instructions as to the drawing of her will. With her on this occasion and present at the office of Mr. Kellar at the time was Mrs. Stiefhold. Mrs. Stiefhold lived with the testatrix and acted as companion and housekeeper. The instructions as to her will were given to Mr. Kellar in the presence of Mrs. Stiefhold, who, while within hearing, testified that she "did not pay very much attention." When Mr. Kellar was called as a witness he was asked as to the instructions he had received from the testatrix as to the legacies and the provisions for the residuary estate. The question was excluded under objection of the plaintiff and subject to the exception of the appellant. It thus becomes necessary to determine whether Mr. Kellar, the [332] attorney, should have been permitted to testify to communications which took place between himself and his client, the testatrix, in the presence of Mrs. Stiefhold. This evidence should have been received and considered by the court below. (Doheny v. Lacy, 168 N. Y. 213, 223, 61 N. E. 255; People v. Buchanan, 145 N. Y. 1, 26, 39 N. E. 846; People v. Hayes, 140 N. Y. 484, 495; 85 N. E. 951, 37 Am. St. Rep. 572, 23 L.R.A. 830; Brennan v. Hall, 131 N. Y. 160, 165, 29 N. E. 1009; Matter of Eckler, 126 App. Div. 199, 203, 110 N. Y. S. 650; People v. Bloom, 124 App. Div. 767, 109 N. Y. S. 344; Matter of Barnes, 70 App. Div. 523, 527, 75 N. Y. S. 873; Leconer v. Importers, etc. Nat. Bank, 61 App. Div. 163, 168, 70 N. Y. S. 419; Matter of Smith, 61 Hun 101, 104, 15 N. Y. S. 425; Matter of McCarthy, 55 Hun 7, 11, 8 N. Y. S. 578. See, also, People v. Andre, 153 Mich. 531, 539, 117 N. W. 55; Scott v. Aultman Ca. 211 Ill. 612, 615; 71 N. E. 1112, 103 Am. St. Rep. 215; Roper v. State, 58 N. J. L. 420, 33 Atl. 969.) Mrs. Stiefhold was not present and acting in the character of a confidential agent of the testatrix, nor was her presence necessary to enable the parties to communicate with each other. No attempt was made by the testatrix to prevent her hearing the communication which she made to her attorney. The fact that Mrs. Stiefhold did "not pay very much attention" to what was said does not alter the situation. She was within hearing and so far as the testatrix knew heard all that was said. If the testatrix had desired her communication with her attorney to be confidential she could have asked Mrs. Stiefhold to withdraw from the room or have communicated with her attorney when Mrs. Stiefhold was not present. She did not do either of these things, but on the contrary gave her instructions to her attorney as to the manner in which she wished to have her will drawn, in the presence of Mrs. Stiefhold. The fact that these instructions were given in the presence and in the hearing of Mrs. Stiefhold is a circumstance indicative of the fact that the communication was not made in confidence. A third person even though a mere stranger or bystander in whose hearing communications are made by a client to an attorney may testify to such communications. [333] (Jackson v. French, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 337, 20 Am. Dec. 609; People v. Buchanan, supra.) To allow a stranger or bystander who overhears such a conversation to testify to what he heard and at the same time preclude the attorney of the client from giving his testimony as to what occurred might often result unfairly to the client for whose protection the privilege is designed. The communication not being confidential the attorney is not privileged from disclosing it. Where there is no confidence reposed, no privilege can be asserted. In such cases the attorney is permitted to testify not because the privilege has been waived, but because the communication, not having been made in confidence, was not privileged. The privilege which exempts one from giving testimony, except in so far as it is embodied in statutory provisions, cannot be extended to cover cases not within the reason upon which the privilege rests. The provisions of section 835 and 836 of the Code of Civil Procedure apply only to those communications which are confidential in their nature, and, therefore, these sections are without application to the facts of this case. In certain cases in other jurisdictions a distinction has been attempted which permits the third person hearing such communications to testify, but holds the attorney bound to secrecy. (Gallagher v. Williamson, 23 Cal. 332; 83 Am. Dec. 114; Mount v. Kimpton, 165 Mass. 378; 29 N. E. 590, 81 Am. St. Rep. 554; Hartness v. Brown, 21 Wash. 355; 59 Pac. 491.) Such a distinction is without support in the reasons underlying the privilege which rests not only upon the professional character of the employment, but also upon the confidential nature of the communication. Nor does the supposed distinction find support in the adjudications made in this state which are referred to above.

The statement made in the opinion in Butler v. Fayerweather, 91 Fed. 458, 461, 63 U. S. App. 120, 33 C. C. A. 625, that "the circumstance that other witnesses were present at the time when the codicil is alleged to have been executed and published, even Ann. Cas. 1916C.—68.

though they heard all that took place, and were [334] aware of the contents of the instrument, is wholly immaterial," is not an accurate statement of the rule prevailing in this state and is not in accord with the authorities already cited.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

NOTE.

Communications between Attorney and Client in regard to Testamentary Matters as Privileged.

Introductory, 1073.

General Rule, 1073.

Rule in New York, 1074.

Introductory.

It is the purpose of this note to review the recent cases discussing the question whether communications between an attorney and his client in regard to testamentary matters are privileged. The earlier cases on the subject are collated in the notes to In re Young, 14 Ann. Cas. 596; In re Ounnon, Ann. Cas. 1912A 834 and O'Brien v. Spalding, 66 Am. St. Rep. 202, 229.

General Rule.

The weight of authority is to the effect that communications between an attorney and his client in regard to testamentary matters are not privileged. Mahoney v. Healy (Del.) 91 Atl. 208; Black v. Funk, 93 Kan. 60, 143 Pac. 426; Durant v. Whitcher, (Kan.) 156 Pac. 739; Holyoke v. Holyoke, 110 Me. 469, 87 Atl. 40; In re Veazey, 80 N. J. Eq. 466, 85 Atl. 176, L.R.A. 1914A 980; In re Beck, 79 Wash. 331, 140 Pac. 340. See also Norton v. Clark, 253 Ill. 557, 97 N. E. 1079; Hopper v. Sellers, 91 Kan. 876, 139 Pac. 365. Compare In re Loveland, 162 Cal. 595, 123 Pac. 801; Feltrup v. Schloemer, 33 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 467. "Instructions to an attorney as to drawing a will, are not privileged communications in a contest to establish a will." Mahoney v. Healy (Del.) 91 Atl. 208. "The great weight of authority is that statutes like that of this state, rendering an attorney incompetent to testify concerning communications made to him by his client in that relation (Civ. Code, sec. 321), are declaratory of the common law and do not render communications between a testator and his attorney in reference to the preparation of a will privileged after the death of the testator."

In Black v. Funk, 93 Kan. 60, 143 Pac. 426, it was held "that the attorney may relate the facts and circumstances surrounding the preparation and execution of the will to show that the testator was not under any improper restraint." It was said that the testimony of the attorney who prepared the will for the decedent "indicated that he was a mere scrivener, and the fact that he was an attorney at law did not affect his capacity" to testify "to what occurred in connection with the preparation of the will." In the case of In re Beck, 79 Wash. 331, 140 Pac. 340, evidence of communications between the attorney who drew a will and the principal beneficiaries under the will was held to be admissible. The court said: "If the will was drawn by an attorney who was employed by the principal beneficiaries, the communications made by such attorneys to the beneficiaries, or by the beneficiaries to the attorney, cannot, we think, be reasonably interpreted as privileged, because in drafting the will he was acting for the testatrix." In Norton v. Clark, 253 Ill. 557, 97 N. E. 1079, which was a suit brought by one of the beneficiaries to set aside a will the testimony of an attorney who had transacted business with the testatrix was stricken out. It was held that the ruling was error, the court saying: "There was nothing in his testimony about any matter involved in this suit, and apparently he was merely qualifying to give an opinion as to her mental condition, which would have been proper although he was her attorney. If it was intended to prove by him anything about the testamentary disposition of her property, it would not, if otherwise competent, be excluded as a privileged communication."

In Holyoke v. Holyoke, 110 Me. 469, 87 Atl. 40, it was held that the declarations of a testator as to his domicile made to his counsel were admissible. The court said: "The evidence in this case, of declarations to counsel as to domicile, is not to be regarded as privileged in this proceeding, whether it be that the nature of the communications was such as to raise an implication of waiver, or such that as between personal representatives or legatees, and heirs, there is no privilege. As in all testamentary contests, so in this case, the controversy is not one that affects the estate as such, but rather the manner of its administration and distribution. The real parties ultimately interested are the heirs and widow on one side, and the legatees on the other. It seems to be settled on good authority that in testamentary contest between personal representatives, heirs and legatees, the claim of privilege is unavailing, when the character and reputation of the deceased are not involved." In the case of

In re Loveland, 162 Cal. 595, 123 Pac. 801, the statute involved provided that an attorney's stenographer or clerk could not be examined without the consent of his employer, concerning any fact the knowledge of which had been acquired in his capacity as employee. It was held that a stenographer employed by the attorney of a testator could testify that she had met the testator ten or fifteen times at the office of the attorney and from conversations there had with him, had formed an opinion with regard to his condition physically and mentally.

In Feltrup v. Schloemer, 33 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 467, an attorney testified that he was the attorney for the testatrix only in the drawing of her will and it was held that "this, . . . would not foreclose him from being called to testify upon any other subject of conversation between them, but only as to those things and conversation which came to him as attorney by reason of and in connection with the matter for which he was acting as her attorney."

Rule in New York.

In New York by the force of a statute to that effect the rule is that evidence as to communications between a client and his attorney as to testamentary matters are privileged, except in the case of the probate of a will to which the attorney is a subscribing witness. Matter of Francis, 73 Misc. 148, 132 N. Y. S. 685; Matter of Seymour, 76 Misc. 371, 136 N. Y. S. 942; Rintelen v. Schaefer, 162 App. Div. 727, 137 N. Y. S. 527, reargument denied, 163 App. Div. 916, 138 N. Y. S. 1139; In re Campbell, 136 N. Y. S. 1086; In re Carpenter, 145 N. Y. S. 365; In re Coughlin, 157 N. Y. S. 630, "By the weight of authority it is held in all other states that the principle excluding evidence of confidential communications between lawyer and client has no application after the death of testators to instructions to their lawyers to draw their wills, or to the facts about the execution of such wills, and that it is not in the interest of the testators themselves after their death to exclude evidence of such instructions or the facts about execution of the will within the lawyer's knowledge. Jones v. Ewing, 1756. But by the statute of New York the rule is otherwise, unless the attorney is a subscribing witness." In re Campbell, supra. In Matter of Seymour, 76 Misc. 371, 136 N. Y. S. 942, it was held that the evidence of the attorney, who prepared a will and who was not a subscribing witness "should be wholly disregarded in so far as it relates to the matters which he testifies he saw and heard at the time of the execution of the will and as to the mental condition of the deceased and of the influence under which she acted." In

Mead v. Cavanagh, 161 App. Div. 177, 148 N. Y. S. 353, it appeared that an attorney prepared a will and became a subscribing witness to it, but the will was subsequently revoked by another will. The court in discussing the admissibility of the testimony of the attorney as to communications between him and the client with regard to the revoked will said: "There seems to be substantial reason for saying that the witness was incompetent to testify to the execution of the paper or to statements made by the alleged testatrix at the time of its execution. If the testatrix waived the seal of confidence by requesting her attorney to witness her will, she annulled such waiver by revoking the will."

In Rintelen v. Schaefer, 158 App. Div. 477, 143 N. Y. S. 631, it appeared in a proceeding to contest a will that the attorney of the testatrix was called on to testify as to his conversations with her during the year preceding his becoming her attorney. The object of the testimony "was to show the opportunity the witness had, by observation and conversation with testatrix, to qualify him to say whether such conversations and acts impressed him as being rational or irrational." In was held that the testimony was admissible as "the relation of attorney and client did not exist between the witness and the testatrix at the time to which the question was limited, and the question did not call for the disclosure of any communication by the witness."

In Matter of Spooner, 89 Misc. 30, 152 N. Y. S. 537, it appeared that the attorney of the testatrix was a subscribing witness to the will but it was not decided whether he could testify to professional communications had with her while acting as her attorney and which did not relate to the will. The court said: "I think the question is one that is open to discussion because it might very well be that testimony as to professional communications between the attorney and the decedent regarding other matters than the execution of the alleged will itself, which in nowise tends to disgrace her and which throws light upon her relations with one of the contestants, might have an important bearing upon the mental capacity of the alleged testatrix and her state of mind toward the contestant in question, and it might be argued that by making her attorney an attesting witness, the alleged testatrix intended that he should testify to any facts within his knowledge which would sustain her testamentary disposition. As the question, however, is a close one, and as there is so much evidence in this case which in my opinion justifies the conclusions I have reached without considering the testimony of the attorney referred to, I have disregarded his testimony as to all professional communications with the decedent prior to the day on which the alleged will was made."

The statutory prohibition does not apply where the communications between the testator and the attorney are had in the presence of a third person. Matter of Hall, 90 Misc. 216, 154 N. Y. S. 317; Matter of Bennett, 166 App. Div. 637, 152 N. Y. S. 46. See also Wallace v. Wallace, 216 N. Y. 28, 109 N. E. 872, affirming on other grounds 158 App. Div. 950, 143 N. Y. S. 1148, which affirmed 158 App. Div. 273, 137 N. Y. S. 43, and distinguishing In re Cunnion, 201 N. Y. 123, 94 N. E. 648, L.R.A.1912A 834. And see the reported case. In Wallace v. Wallace, supra, it appeared that a husband and wife had made mutual wills which were prepared by the same attorney at the same time and place and before the same witnesses and contained reciprocal and identical provisions. It was held that evidence of the instructions to the attorney regarding the wills was admissible although they were not given by the testators in the presence of each other. The court said: "If both were not present when the communications to the attorney were made, it is certain that such communications were intended for the information of both of them. Neither intended what was said to the attorney with regard to the wills was to be kept a secret from the other. The business could not have been done in that way. The disability of an attorney to act as a witness applies only when the communications are intended to be confidential."

Physicians and Surgeons — Malpractice — What Constitutes.

It is not negligence for a physician or surgeon to reduce a fracture by the method generally recognized by surgeons as proper.

[See 1 Ann. Cas. 21, 306; 14 Ann. Cas. 605; 93 Am. St. Rep. 657.]

Same.

In an action against a physician and surgeon, evidence held sufficient to support a jury finding of negligence in connection with the treatment of a fractured collar bone.

Same.

In the absence of a special contract, the law implies that a surgeon employed to treat an injury contracts to exercise reasonable and ordinary care to accomplish the purpose for which he is employed, but he does not warrant a cure and is not responsible for want of success unless it results from a failure to exercise ordinary care or from want of ordinary skill.

Proof of Negligence — Res Ipsa Loquitur.

A surgeon's failure to exercise ordinary care in treating a fracture is not established by proof of the result alone, but must be shown by other evidence.

[See 93 Am. St. Rep. 665.]

Verdict Not Excessive.

Where a surgeon, in treating a fractured collar bone, did not exercise the degree of care which the law requires, resulting in the fragments overlapping and causing a deformity and condition which rendered the plaintiff a cripple and necessitated an operation by another surgeon, who made an incision down to the bone, refractured it by the use of instruments, made a hole in each fragment, and inserted a wire to hold the bones in place and prevent overlapping until a new union was effected, in view of the pain and suffering, expense, and loss of time necessarily entailed, a verdict for $1,000 is not excessive and does not indicate that the jury was influenced by bias or prejudice. [See note at end of this case.]

Damages — Voluntary Remittitur by Plaintiff — Prejudice to Defendant.

Where a verdict was not excessive and there is nothing to indicate that the jury were influenced by passion or prejudice, defendant is not prejudiced by the voluntary filing by plaintiff of a remittitur of a part of the recovery, and cannot complain thereof on the ground that the error could be cured only by granting a new trial and not by the filing of a remittitur.

Error to District Court, City and County of Denver: TELLER, Judge.

Action for damages. Alonzo McCullough, plaintiff, and W. Spencer Craghead, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

John T. Bottom and Milnor E. Gleaves for plaintiff, in error.
S. S. Abbott for defendant, in error.

[486] GAUBERT, J.—Plaintiff in error (defendant below), a physician and surgeon, was employed by defendant in error (plaintiff below) to reduce a fracture of his collar bone. He brought suit to recover damages from defendant which he claimed to have sustained as a result of the negligence of the doctor in treating the fracture. At the conclusion of the testimony, the defendant requested the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in his favor which was refused. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of one thousand dollars. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial, based upon the grounds, among others, that the verdict was excessive and the result of bias and prejudice; [487] that the court erred in not directing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant; and that the verdict was against the law and the evidence. Pending the determination of this motion the plaintiff filed a remittitur in the sum of $350.00, in which it was stated, "leaving the verdict stand as six hundred fifty dollars." Defendant did not consent to this reduction of the verdict. The court denied the motion for a new trial, and ordered that judgment be entered in favor of plaintiff, and against defendant, in the sum of $650.00, which was accordingly done. The defendant brings the case here for review on error.

The negligence charged in the complaint is, that the defendant failed to use ordinary care in treating the fracture, by carelessly and negligently bandaging and placing the ends of the bone in such position that they overlapped by more than one inch, and causing them to be held in that position until they adhered and solidified. It appears from the testimony that the fracture was oblique; and that defendant is a physician, and surgeon of many years experience in the practice of his profession, and a graduate of a medical college. He testified that when called to treat the fracture he recognized its character and described the steps he took in treating it, which it is not practical to state in detail, as from the record it appears he illustrated the method employed by referring to his arm and otherwise, but briefly, his treatment consisted in putting the ends of the bone in place, and bandaging and holding the arm and shoulder in a position with the aid of a fulcrum, the object of this treatment being to prevent overlapping. All the surgeons called as witnesses who testified on the subject, stated, that the method defendant employed was the usual and proper one to treat an oblique fracture of the clavicle. Employing the method to reduce a fracture generally [488] recognized by surgeons as proper is not negligence. — McGraw v. Kerr, 23 Colo. App. 163, 128 Pac. 870; Williams v. Poppleton, 3 Ore. 139.

The real question involved, however, is whether there is testimony from which it can be fairly inferred that the defendant did not use ordinary care and diligence in treating the fracture. Not in the sense, however, that he did not employ the proper method, but in setting it improperly and causing it to be held in that position until the fragments adhered and became solidified, or in not exercising reasonable care to ascertain whether they remained in proper position. He testified that he placed the fragments in proper position, and from time to time after setting the bone visited his patient, and found it in place, having made examinations for this purpose; that later the plaintiff came to his office, which was about three months after the bone was set, when he found, for the first time, that it was overlapping, and so advised him, and requested him to return in a couple of days when he would have another surgeon make an examination. This examination was made and plaintiff advised that an operation should be performed. Arrangements for this purpose were made but plaintiff did not keep his engagement, and went to another doctor for an operation. This doctor testified that he made an examination of the clavicle, found some deformity from what had evidently been an oblique fracture in which the fragments had slipped past each other and healed in that position, and that bone adhesion was practically complete. Other surgeons testified to the effect that at this time the shoulder of the plaintiff was pressed forward, and in such position that bone interfered with respiration and deprived him of the use of his arm, and that his crippled condition was very apparent. The surgeon who performed the operation to which we will refer later, [489] and also the doctor who assisted him, stated that in their opinion the defendant ought to have discovered earlier than he did that the condition of the fracture was not satisfactory; that the fragments were overlapping and that this condition could have been ascertained by the outline or the position of the shoulder. The plaintiff testified that after the defendant set the broken bone, he examined him from time to time and said he was doing fine, up to the time when he suggested that another surgeon should be consulted and an operation performed. He also stated that about one month after the bone was set he complained to the defendant that it hurt him to breathe, that defendant told him this was caused by the enlargement at the point of union which would bother him for a time, but would come out all right.

Without question, the fragments of the broken bone had not healed in a proper position, which had caused a deformity and condition which rendered the plaintiff a cripple, but counsel for defendant contend that there is not any testimony to establish that this condition was the result of negligence on the part of defendant. In the absence of a special contract, the law implies that a surgeon employed to treat an injury, contracts with his patient that he will exercise reasonable and ordinary care to accomplish the purpose for which he is employed. He does not warrant a cure and is not responsible for want of success, unless it results from a failure to exercise ordinary care, or from want of ordinary skill.—Bonnet v. Foote, 47 Colo. 282, 107 Pac. 252, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 136; McGraw v. Kerr, supra; Leighton v. Sargent, 27 N. H. 460, 59 Am. Dec. 388; Paten v. Wiggin, 61 Me. 504, 81 Am. Dec. 593. True, as stated in many well considered cases, the failure to exercise ordinary care in treating a fracture is not established by proof of the result alone, but must be shown by other evidence. Other [490] evidence that the condition of plaintiff, bearing on the question of negligence in treating the fracture was introduced. Surgeons testified that the position of the fragments ought to have been discovered by defendant while treating the plaintiff; that an examination would have disclosed the overlapping; and that the position of the shoulder indicated that the fracture was not healing in the proper position. The plaintiff also testified that he complained to the defendant about one month after the bone was set, that it hurt him to breathe, which from the testimony of the physicians, must have been caused by the clavicle not being in a proper position. So that there is substantial testimony from which to deduce one of two conclusions, either the defendant did not place the fragments in a proper place in the first instance, or, if he did, he failed to exercise ordinary care from time to time to ascertain whether they remained in place and in keeping them in proper position.

It is next urged that the verdict was excessive and the result of bias and prejudice; and, for this reason, it should have been set aside, and a new trial granted. That an operation was necessary in order to relieve plaintiff from the condition he was in as the result of the overlapping of the fracture, must be conceded. The surgeon performing this operation testified that he made an incision down to the bone, and then by the use of instruments re-fractured it where the union had taken place, and made a hole in each fragment and inserted a silver wire, and wired the bones together so that they would remain in place and prevent overlapping until a new union was effected. Considering the pain and suffering, expense and loss of time which this operation necessarily entailed, and also the fact that there was sufficient testimony from which it could be inferred that defendant had not exercised the degree of care the law required (491) in treating the fracture, it cannot be said that the verdict was excessive or in any sense the result of bias or prejudice. Counsel, however, contend that in an action to recover for a tort, the court cannot reduce the verdict of a jury merely because it is excessive, and that the only remedy in such case is to set the verdict aside and grant a new trial. It is also contended that where the amount awarded is so excessive as to be accounted for only on the ground of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury a remittitur will not cure the error; as such passion or prejudice will be deemed to have influenced the jury in determining the issues of fact. In the circumstances of this case neither proposition is applicable. The trial judge did not find that the award of one thousand dollars was excessive. He did not direct that the verdict would be set aside unless the plaintiff consented to remit the sum of $350.00. The reduction was voluntary on the part of plaintiff. There is ample testimony to sustain the findings of the jury that defendant was guilty of negligence. The testimony is sufficient to sustain the award of the jury. So that the record does not disclose that the jury were influenced by either passion or prejudice in finding the facts in issue in favor of plaintiff, or in making the award they did, consequently, the defendant was not prejudiced by the remittitur, and hence cannot complain.

Error is also assigned in ruling out testimony sought to be introduced on the part of defendant. This testimony was in no sense pertinent to any issue in the case, and was therefore properly excluded.

Complaint is made that by instructions requested and given, the jury were prevented from considering contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. The testimony did not tend in any manner to establish negligence of the plaintiff. It is also urged that instructions [492] given speak of want of skill of the defendant which was not an issue in the case. The objection is without merit. The method employed to reduce the fracture was proper, but there was testimony tending to prove that defendant, either from want of ordinary skill or through failure to exercise reasonable care, did not properly set the fracture in the first instance, or failed thereafter to discover that the fragments were not in place, and keep them in proper position.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

NOTE.

What Is Excessive or Inadequate Verdict in Action against Physician for Malpractice.

Generally, 1078.

Excessiveness, 1079.

Inadequacy, 1080.

Generally.

The general rule by which the courts are guided in passing on the question of excessive or inadequate damages is that the jury have a broad discretion in fixing the amount, and their verdict will be upheld unless it is so clearly erroneous as to show the influence of prejudice, corruption, or a misunderstanding of the measure of damages. This rule was applied directly in each of the following cases to an action for malpractice, and is supported generally by the cases cited throughout this note. Kelsey v. Hay, 84 Ind. 189; Chamberlain v. Porter, 9 Minn. 260; Longan v. Weltmer, 180 Mo. 322, 79 S. W. 655, 103 Am. St. Rep. 573, 64 L.R.A. 969; Thompson v. Martin, 127 Mo. App. 24, 106 S. W. 535; Froman v. Ayars, 42 Wash. 385, 85 Pac. 14. Thus, in Chamberlain v. Porter, supra, the court said: "In cases of this kind, for many of the injuries for which damages may be given there is no pecuniary standard by which their compensation can be determined, and there is no rule fixing the amount which may be allowed, except that they may not be excessive. The question of damages for injuries of this character is not one of science or skill, nor is it one requiring peculiar knowledge or experience, but it is a practical question, upon which the jury are presumed to have an equal degree of knowledge and experience with others, and to be able to form a correct conclusion, from their own experience of the common affairs of life. The opinions of witnesses, therefore, upon this point were not admissible, but the damages for these injuries were to be determined by the jury from the facts and circumstances in the case. . . . In actions of this nature the jury are the proper judges of the amount of damages to be allowed, and unless there is something in the case showing that the jury, in their determination, were influenced by passion, prejudice, or some improper motive, the court will not interfere." So in Longan v. Weltmer, 180 Mo. 322, 79 S. W. 655, 103 Am. St. Rep. 573, 64 L.R.A. 969, it was said: "There seems to be no way by which it can be proven that in making a large verdict the jurors were controlled by improper influences, and therefore it can only be inferred when the verdict is so out of line with reason and justice as to shock the conscience and to satisfy the unbiased mind that it is not the result of fair and unprejudiced consideration. To justify such an inference, the fact in evidence ought not to justify any other conclusion."

That a verdict in an action for malpractice is not different from one in an ordinary action for damages for personal injuries in so far as the physician is responsible for the injuries, was pointed out in Froman v. Ayars,

42 Wash. 385, 85 Pac. 14, wherein the court said: "Appellant's counsel make an interesting argument to the effect that this case should be distinguished from one which is brought to recover for ordinary personal injuries where the injury is wholly due to the neglect of the defendant in the case. It is argued that in the case at bar the primary cause of the result which came to respondent was the running away of the team, for which appellant was in no way responsible, and that the degree of appellant's responsible relation to the final outcome cannot be as great as that of one whose negligence laid the first foundation for the injury. The theory of the case, however, is that the final outcome to respondent, by which he was deprived of a foot for the remainder of his life, would not have resulted if appellant had properly applied his learning and skill. It is true, respondent would have suffered pain and distress from the original injury, yet if the bones had properly united and the wound had healed, the suffering would have been but temporary, while as it is he must continue to suffer humiliation, inconvenience and loss of earning power during the remainder of his life. If such a result would not have occurred but for appellant's neglect, we are not impressed that there is force in the logic of counsel's argument. . . . There is seldom a case of this kind, or even one for ordinary personal injuries, when there does not seem to be some element of hardship either way the case may be decided; but such cases are triable by a jury, and when so tried, if there is reasonable evidence to support the verdict, it should not be reduced unless it is manifestly too large, when all the facts and circumstances are considered."

But to a certain extent a sound distinction exists between a case of malpractice and an ordinary case of personal injury. In an action for malpractice the plaintiff cannot recover for the original hurt, which existed before the physician was engaged, and, therefore, where the size of the verdict indicates that the jury have visited the entire loss suffered by the patient on the physician, the verdict will be held to be excessive, since the physician is responsible only for the injury and suffering caused by his own act and is not responsible for the original injury with which he had nothing to do. Taylor v. Kidd, 72 Wash. 18, 129 Pac. 406; Cranford v. O'Shea, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 1081.

Excessiveness.

Verdicts for the following amounts in actions for malpractice have been held not to be excessive:

$7,500.—Longan v. Weltmer, 180 Mo. 322, 79 S. W. 655, 103 Am. St. Rep. 573, 64 L.R.A.

969 (negligent and unskillful treatment of female patient by "magnetic healer," tearing ligaments connecting backbone and hipbone, and permanently injuring back, spine and pelvic organs);

$5,500.—Brooke v. Clark, 57 Tex. 105 (gross negligence in tying ligature around penis, instead of umbilical cord, of newly born infant, causing glans of penis to come entirely off);

$5,200.—Getchell v. Lindley, 24 Minn. 265 (malpractice in setting and treatment of injured arm);

$5,000.—Froman v. Ayars, 42 Wash. 385, 85 Pac. 14 (mistreatment of broken leg, resulting in loss of foot; patient was laborer, forty-four years old);

$4,500.—Kelsey v. Hay, 84 Ind. 189 (negligence in setting broken legs, resulting in loss of use of both legs);

$3,600.—Samuels v. Wallis, 133 Ky. 459, 19 Ann. Cas. 186, 118 S. W. 339 (failure to remove sponge after abdominal operation);

$3,000.—Prout v. Martin, 140 Ill. App. 4 (mistreatment by dentist in replacing missing teeth, including fraud and deceit in regard to method); Allen v. Voje, 114 Wis. 1, 89 N. W. 924 (negligent operation upon female patient, resulting in permanent injury);

$2,250.—Kraus v. Ballinger, 171 Ill. App. 534 (the court said: "It is argued by the appellants that passion and prejudice are shown because the court required a remittitur of $750. We cannot agree with this contention. The evidence offered on behalf of the appellee would tend to show that the arm was left in a very bad condition, which might or might not be relieved by a serious operation. If this condition is chargeable to the acts of the appellants, as the jury found, the amount of the judgment cannot, in our opinion, be regarded as excessive.") Wilk v. Black (Mich.) 154 N. W. 561 (negligent treatment of fractured arm; it appeared that plaintiff had life expectancy of forty years; and that his arm would always be crooked);

$2,000.—Lathrope v. Hood (Cal.) 83 Pac. 1007 (abandonment of case of woman in confinement; judgment was reversed in 185 Cal. 458, 87 Pac. 683, 67 L.R.A. 215, for allowance of certain elements of damage unsupported by evidence); Stanford v. Hyde, 87 Conn. 707, 87 Atl. 788 (failure to discover dislocation of shoulder, resulting in permanent impairment of shoulder, affecting patient's pursuit of his trade); Vilta v. Dolan (Minn.) 155 N. W. 1077 (negligent treatment of fractured leg); Moslander v. Armstrong, 90 Neb. 774, 184 N. W. 922 (negligent treatment of injured foot, resulting in necessity for amputation);

$1,741.66.—Hastings v. Stetson, 91 Me. 229, 39 Atl. 580 (delay in reducing dislocation of shoulder, causing paralysis);

$1,500.—Miller v. Minton, 73 Ark. 183, 83 S. W. 918 (mistreatment of injured ankle, causing patient great pain for many months and resulting in probably permanent lameness); Reeves v. Lutz, 179 Mo. App. 61, 162 S. W. 280 (failure to remove drainage tube in due time after operation on breast of female patient; this action was brought by husband of patient to recover for loss of consortium);

$1,250.—Evans v. Munro (R. I.) 83 Atl. 82 (failure to remove drain in due time after operation, necessitating another operation);

$1,000.—See the reported case.

$500.—Gerken v. Plimpton, 62 App. Div. 35, 70 N. Y. S. 793 (mistreatment of fractured arm, necessitating further operation costing $500); Just v. Littlefield, 87 Wash. 299, 151 Pac. 780 (negligent treatment of case of pregnancy).

Verdicts for the following amounts in actions for malpractice have been held to be excessive:

$9,000.—Brown v. Goffe, 140 App. Div. 363, 125 N. Y. S. 466 (alleged negligence in performing operation; no permanent injury);

$7,385.—Cranford v. O'Shea, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 1081;

$5,500.—Taylor v. Kidd, 72 Wash. 18, 129 Pac. 406 (negligent treatment of strained shoulder, necessitating operation and leaving arm shorter than before; reduced to $3,500);

$5,000.—Reynolds v. McManus, 139 Ia. 242, 117 N. W. 667 (negligent treatment of woman, in confinement, causing additional suffering and delayed recovery); Nickerson v. Gerriah (Mo.) 96 Atl. 235 (unskilful diagnosis and treatment of fractured leg as sprain only, resulting in impaired motion of ankle joint; reduced to $3,000);

$4,000.—Hensen v. Crocker, 160 Ill. App. 514 (gauze left in body of patient after operation, causing temporary pain and necessitating further operations); Helland v. Bridestine, 55 Wash. 470, 104 Pac. 626 (examination of widow with unsterilized instruments which communicated loathsome disease to her, patient recovered from disease, amount reduced to $2,000); Hoffman v. Watkins (Wash.) 155 Pac. 159 (failure to diagnose injury to shoulder as dislocation; patient was man 54 years old; reduced to $2,400. The court said: "The evidence indicates that the shoulder has entirely recovered and is now giving the respondent no pain. While it is true that some of the effects of the operation are permanent in their nature, the evidence shows that the respondent's earning capacity is not materially diminished. It is true that he cannot perform those tasks which necessitate lifting above the level of his shoulder, and it is true, also, that he has suffered much pain, inconvenience, and considerable expense. The joint, however, so far as the evidence shows, is otherwise unimpaired. In Taylor v. Kidd, 72 Wash. 18, 129 Pac. 406, a case similar to this in many respects, the shoulder joint was permanently impaired, the head of the humerus was partially removed, the arm was permanently shortened, and had permanently lost perhaps 75 per cent of its original power and scope of motion. The results were evidently much more serious than those found here. In that case a verdict for $5,500 was held to evidence passion and prejudice and was reduced in the sum of $2,000. We think a reduction in about the same proportion is essential to meet the ends of justice in this case."

$2,000.—Reynolds v. Smith, 148 Ia. 264, 127 N. W. 192 (failure to remove gauze in proper time after abdominal operation; consequences not serious; reduced to $1,200);

$1,100.—Evans v. Roberts (Ia.) 154 N. W. 923 (cutting of patient's tongue while removing adenoids, causing pain and slight deformity of tongue. The court said: "The injury, though a regrettable one, was not of a very serious character. The wound was soon healed. There is no personal disfigurement, unless the slight scar upon the tongue is to be so regarded. The only suggestion of permanent ill effect is a slight difficulty in vocalizing a single letter of the alphabet. Damages in such cases, where no element of wilfulness or recklessness is shown, ought to be strictly compensatory, and not punitive. Upon the whole record we conclude that a judgment not to exceed $750 is sufficient to answer the ends of justice in this respect."

Inadequacy.

In an action against a physician for alleged negligence in the treatment of an injured arm wherein it appeared that the jury cancelled the physician's counterclaim for services rendered and in addition considered the evidence of contributory negligence, it was held that a verdict of one dollar in favor of the plaintiff was not so inadequate as to justify interference. Whitesell v. Hill (Ia.) 66 N. W. 894.

The defendant physician attempted to take advantage of an alleged inadequacy of the verdict in Thompson v. Martin, 127 Mo. App. 24, 106 S. W. 535. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff sought to recover $25,000 for alleged malpractice resulting in total blindness, and was awarded $1,500 by the jury. The defendant claimed that the small amount of the verdict showed that it was based on sympathy for the plaintiff rather than on the law and the evidence. In affirming the judgment the court said "Jurors are liable to make mistakes, but it is an undeniable fact that they are prone to administer equity on suitable occasions. Where nothing is shown that the jury acted from improper motives, it is the duty of the court to impute to them honesty of purpose at least, although it may be that they have been mistaken in their conclusions. The respondent with propriety might have attacked the verdict on the ground that the sum awarded was inadequate, but as he has seen fit to acquiesce in the result the appellant ought to be satisfied also as he is bound to admit that under the evidence a verdict in respondent's favor is supported by the evidence."

Appeal and Error — Harmless Error — Admission of Evidence as to Damages.

There being other independent evidence of negligence, any error in admission of evidence thereof, which would in all probability go only to the quantum of damages, is not sufficiently prejudicial to require reversal; affirmance being, because of excessive damages, conditional on remission of part of recovery.

Failure to Submit Contentions — Harmless Error.

Failure, in submitting the issues, in a malpractice case for not seasonably discovering and setting a fracture of the femur just above the knee, to state defendant's contention that he knew of the fracture, but could not heal it, because of synovitis of the knee joint and fractures just above the ankle, is harmless; every feature of the defense, as well as plaintiff's case, having been prominently and skillfully brought out during a long trial.

Physicians and Surgeons — Malpractice — For What Injuries Liable.

For malpractice in treating an injury, a surgeon is liable only for results from his negligence, and not for those from the original injury.

Verdict Excessive.

A verdict of $7,385 for malpractice in not seasonably setting a fracture of a femur held excessive to the extent of $2,000.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane county. BLACK, Judge.

Action for damages. Clara E. Cranford, plaintiff, and John H. O'Shea, defendant.

Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. Modified.

Lloyd E. Gandy and Graves, Kizer & Graves for appellant.

Attwood A. Kirby and H. M. Stephens for respondent.

[509] CHADWICK, J.—Appellant is a surgeon, engaged in the practice of his profession. He is sued for malpractice. On January 17, 1910, respondent was injured in a coasting accident. Both bones of one of her lower limbs were fractured just above the ankle. The fracture is denominated by the medical witnesses a compound comminuted fracture. The flesh was torn and the bone protruded. There was also a simple fracture or a nearly square break of the femur a short distance above the kneejoint. Appellant was, at the time of the accident, surgeon at the emergency hospital, and gave respondent first aid and thereafter treated her for four or five weeks, when she was passed to the care of the county physician, who cared for her until Dr. Phy, a surgeon of her own choosing, took charge of the case.

So far as we can see, the fracture of the two bones in the lower limb was treated surgically, and but for an infection that appeared two or three days after the accident and for which appellant is not shown to be responsible, respondent would have recovered of that fracture in from six to twelve weeks. The malpractice is alleged to lie in the fact that appellant did not make timely discovery of the fracture of the femur and did not, after discovery, render proper and skilled service. On February 2 or 3, X-ray photographs were taken. [510] Thereafter respondent's limb was set and put in a cast. It was continued until after the case passed to the charge of the succeeding doctors. After several months, Dr. Phy had X-ray pictures made, and it was found that the fractured femur had slipped out of place and, being held by the contracted muscles, had knit or formed a union. This union was broken up by Dr. Phy, who cut the two ends, slightly shortening the length of the two pieces, which he held in place by plates riveted into the bone. The limb is now straight instead of bowed out as it had been and, but for the shortening and a slight probability of future trouble, is what is called a good recovery. Appellant insists, that he knew of the fracture of the femur; that he discovered it at the time he first examined the patient; that he could not have failed to see it as it was "laid out before him." In this he is corroborated by the assisting surgeon and by the surgical nurse who was present. But the jury believed the respondent and her mother, who testified that appellant did not examine or give any attention to the upper fracture, although respondent continuously complained of the pain and suffering she endured at the place of the fracture.

Appellant's version is, that the lower fracture was the important thing; that the knee became immediately swollen, and that a synovitis of the knee joint developed; that because of the swelling and synovitis, he could not set the bone at the time by ordinary methods, nor could he attach a weight to the limb to hold the fractured bones in place because of the fracture and lacerations below the knee. Respondent's present condition is: the upper fracture has made a good recovery; the lower fracture, after an operation in which the bones were cut and reunited, has healed; the limb is shorter than the other from one and one-half to two and one-half inches as variously estimated by the witnesses; she walks with, and bears most of her weight on, a cane which she carries at her hip; she can walk without help, though she can walk better with assistance; she was bedridden for many [511] months, and has suffered, and still suffers, acute pain; her knee is slightly larger than its companion and she cannot bend her ankle up, although she can bend it down, so that when going upstairs she has to carry the injured limb after the other. Respondent asks for damages for pain and suffering. It is not shown that she lost any earning time or wages on account of the injury. The case was here on defendant's appeal, Cranford v. O'Shea, 75 Wash. 33, 134 Pac. 486, and was reversed and remanded for a new trial, with the same result except that the jury substituted the sum of $7,385 for the $5,000 allowed on the former trial.

It is urged that the court erred in allowing evidence to be received tending to show that appellant was negligent in that he did not have X-ray pictures taken at the time or shortly after the case came under his notice; that the court did not properly instruct upon this feature of the case; and that the court erred in submitting the issues to the jury, in that he failed to state appellant's contention that he knew of the fractured femur but could not heal it because of the synovitis of the knee joint, and the condition of the lower fracture. As for the first contention, we think it would have been better if the court had sustained appellant's objections and had given his requested instructions, but as there is independent evidence of negligence and the testimony would in all human probability go only to the quantum of damages, we have decided, in view of the conclusion we have reached, to treat the act and refusal of the court as not sufficiently prejudicial to justify a third trial of the case. As for the last contention, the case went to the jury after a long trial. Every feature of respondent's case as well as the defense was prominently and skillfully brought out. We cannot believe the jury were unamindful of, or failed to consider, appellant's case. In this respect we find no error.

This brings us to the real contention. Are the damages awarded excessive? It is fundamental that a doctor who is called to treat an injured person cannot be held to answer [512] for the suffering caused by the original injury, but only for the suffering caused by his own negligent acts. Taylor v. Kidd, 72 Wash. 18, 129 Pac. 406; Rice v. Puget Sound Traction, etc. Co. 80 Wash. 47, 141 Pac. 191. L.R.A.1915A 797. The theory being evident, the original injury, in so far as the attending surgeon is concerned, is regarded as if it were self-inflicted. All hurts requiring surgical care are presumptively painful and tormenting. It can be judicially noticed that a compound fracture of the lower limb and a fracture of the femur are painful hurts, and will occasion long suffering although treated with the best of surgical skill. In the instant case, appellant is not responsible for the original injury, or the infection which prolonged the healing of the lower fracture indefinitely and which made a surgical operation upon it necessary, or for the six to twelve weeks of confinement during which the bones might have knit under the most skillful treatment had there been no infection. In fact, the negligence of which the jury found appellant guilty cannot be made to extend beyond his treatment, or as it is found, his lack of treatment, of the fractured femur which, barring the slight shortening of the limb, made necessary to square the bones, is a fair recovery, and the added pain and suffering. Considering recoveries in cases where the injuries were of like nature and for which the party charged was solely responsible, we are constrained to believe that the jury, in pity for the respondent, visited the whole consequence of her hurts and suffering upon appellant, without appreciating the demand of the law that respondent bear her share of the misfortune which angry chance threw over the unlucky parties to this action. Mueller v. Washington Water Power Co. 56 Wash. 556, 100 Pac. 476, is, in so far as the consequences of the injury are concerned—an injury for which defendant was responsible—most like this case. We there allowed a recovery of $5,000. It has seemed to us that a recovery of more than $6,385 is not justified by the record in this case.

A motion for a new trial was taken under advisement by [513] the trial judge, after saying, "To tell you the truth, Mr. Stephens, the girl is fortunate to be alive with any kind of a leg." After reading the case of Froman v. Ayars, 42 Wash. 385, 86 Pac. 14, in connection with the Mueller case, the court allowed the verdict to stand. The opinion in the Froman case admits that a verdict "manifestly too large" should be reduced. The surgeon was there charged, and the jury found; that but for the malpractice, the plaintiff would not have lost his foot by amputation. A life expectancy and the earning power of a common laborer were proved. The holding of this court was rested on that circumstance. "To pass through twenty-six years of life without a foot is a condition that we may assume no man, however humble his occupation, would be willing to accept for $5,000," said the court.

We have not overlooked the contention that, when the trial judge has refused to reduce the verdict we will not, and the cases cited to sustain it. In the cases relied on, the party charged was primarily responsible; the testimony conflicting, and we could not say, nor would we say if this case were against one responsible for the original hurt, that the verdict is too large; but bearing as she must her own share of the attendant and consequent suffering, we think respondent, who can claim no more than compensation, should remit $2,000 of her recovery or take a new trial. It is our judgment that the jury was moved by the passion of sympathy for respondent and possibly by the passion of prejudice against appellant.

If the respondent will, within thirty days after the remittitur in this case goes down, remit $2,000 of her judgment and consent to the entry of a judgment for $5,385, the judgment will be affirmed. Otherwise a new trial will be awarded.

Crow, C. J., Parker, Gose, and Morris, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

The reported case illustrates the rule that in assessing damages against a physician for malpractice a line must be drawn between the damages caused by the act of the physician and the damages caused by the original injury. The court holds that the verdict rendered for $7,385 is excessive, its size indicating that the jury were influenced by passion or prejudice to charge the physician with damages further than those for which he was responsible. The question what is an excessive or inadequate verdict in an action against a physician for malpractice is exhaustively treated in the note to Craghead v. McCullough, reported ante, this volume, at page 1075.

RIGGLE

LENS.

Oregon Supreme Court—June 9, 1914.

71 Oregon 125; 142 Pac. 346.

Negligence — Unguarded Mill Race — Death of Trespassing Child.

The owner of a mill race is not liable for the death of a child who, trespassing upon premises and playing upon the banks of the mill race, fell in and was drowned, though it was sometimes resorted to by children for amusement and was not protected by fence or guard.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Umatilla county: PHELPS, Judge.

Action for death by wrongful act. George W. Riggle, plaintiff, and I. C. Lens, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AF FIRMED.

Will M. Peterson for appellant.

Kaley & Kaley for respondent.

[125] EAKIN, J.—Plaintiff brings this action to recover damages for the death of his son Paul, an infant of five years of age by drowning in the Byer's mill-race. The complaint charges that the mill-race was situated in the City of Pendleton and owned by defendant, being located near public streets or highways; that it was from three to eight feet deep; that it was sometimes resorted to by children for amusement, and was not protected [126] by fence or guard. Paul Riggle, while playing upon the banks thereof, fell in and was drowned; and plaintiff seeks to recover for the loss of Paul's services during his minority. A demurrer thereto was sustained, and, from a judgment thereon, plaintiff appeals.

The question is whether defendant was guilty of negligence in leaving the race unprotected against small children; plaintiff contending that the defendant is liable for the death of the infant by drowning therein under the turntable doctrine, the race being an attractive nuisance constituting a lure to children. Although the question is one of first impression in this state, it is not new to the courts of this country. It is discussed in many decisions by nearly all the courts of last resort, and they do not all arrive at the same result, differing principally on account of the difference in the facts involved. The cases holding in regard to the liability of the owner of the object attractive to children are to some extent collated on the one side by the plaintiff and upon the other by the defendant, as well as in some of the annotated cases on the subject.

The cases of Sioux City, etc. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 745, and Union Pac. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 282, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 434, 14 S. Ct. 619, seem to be recognized by subsequent decisions as authoritative and final upon the points decided; at least they are very extensively quoted and followed. Sullivan v. Huidekoper, 27 App. Cas. (D. C.) 154, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 263, Duell, J., annotated in 7 Ann. Cas. 196, is a case in which there is a full discussion of the law upon that question and also a review of many cases, in which a child of tender years was drowned in a pool of water upon the property of the defendant, caused by a street grade. The court says:

[127] "We deem it immaterial whether the pond be a natural or an artificial one."

This is not a case where the injury was claimed by reason of negligence in not properly guarding a concealed, dangerous condition, as were the Stout and McDonald cases.

Bjork v. Tacoma, 76 Wash. 225, 135 Pac. 1006, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 331, was a case of unguarded, concealed danger, and comes directly within the two former cases, as are also Brinkley Car Co. v. Cooper, 60 Ark. 545, 31 S. W. 154; 46 Am. St. Rep. 216, and Kinchlow v. Midland El. Co. 57 Kan. 374, 46 Pac. 703. It is considered to be the primary duty of the parent to guard or protect the small child against patent and unconcealed dangers: Sullivan v. Huidekoper, 27 App. Cas. (D. C.) 154; 7 Ann. Cas. 196, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 263; Wheeling, etc. R. Co. v. Harvey, 77 Ohio St. 235, 83 N. E. 66, 122 Am. St. Rep. 503, 11 Ann. Cas. 981; 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1136.

In the case of McCabe v. American Woolen Co. 124 Fed. 283, the court recognizes the principle announced in the Stout and McDonald cases, supra, but distinguishes them from a case of an open, visible ditch or canal, which is similar to a natural stream. In the Sullivan case it is said that:

"The doctrine of the turntable cases is an exception to the rule of nonliability of a land owner for accidents from visible causes to trespassers on his premises."

Stendal v. Boyd, 73 Minn. 53, 75 N. W. 735; 72 Am. St. Rep. 597; 42 L.R.A. 288, adopts the same language, where it is said that, with the exception of Pekin v. McMahon, 164 Ill. 141, 39 N. E. 484, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114, 27 L.R.A. 206, the courts of last resort, including those which recognize the doctrine of the turntable cases, have uniformly denied the liability [128] of the land owner for injuries to trespassing children by reason of open and unguarded ponds or excavations upon his premises. That state had previously adhered to the doctrine of the turntable and attractive nuisance cases, and the court had modified its former position on that question, holding that the turntable doctrine is an exception to the rule of nonliability of a land owner for accidents from visible causes to a trespasser on his premises, which is followed in Mattson v. Minnesota, etc. R. Co. 95 Minn. 477, 104 N. W. 443, 111 Am. St. Rep. 483, 5 Ann. Cas. 498, 70 L.R.A. 503.

In Brickson v. Great Northern R. Co. 82 Minn. 60, 84 N. W. 462, 83 Am. St. Rep. 410, 51 L.R.A. 645, the Chief Justice says the manifest trend of all the decisions of this court is to limit its application to attractive and dangerous machinery and to other similar cases where the danger is latent, and that as a general rule the doctrine must be limited to those cases.

In an able article in 11 Harvard L. Rev. 349, 434, Judge Jeremiah Smith, in a review of the cases, reaches the conclusion that the turntable doctrine is not sound. This article is an able and exhaustive treatment of the subject, the cases pro and con being collated, at the conclusion of which the author says:

"Our conclusion, therefore, is that the law ought not to impose upon the land owner even qualified liability, so far as the condition of his premises is concerned, to children entering without permission, although attracted by his method of making beneficial use of his premises."

The turntable doctrine is repudiated in Massachusetts in the McCabe case, supra, and in Daniels v. New York, etc. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 28 N. E. 283, 26 Am. St. Rep. 253, 18 L.R.A. 248. In the former [129] Justice Putnam says that this doctrine is also repudiated in New Hampshire, and suggests that it is doubtful if it is recognized in any part of New England. We conclude by saying that the rule of the turntable and slack-pit cases should not be extended to cases of injuries to children by reason of open and unguarded ponds on the defendants' lands.

In Thompson v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 218 Pa. St. 444, 67 Atl. 768, 180 Am. St. Rep. 997, 11 Ann. Cas. 896; 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1162, it is said:

"The doctrine of the so-called turntable cases has been disapproved."

In a note to Wheeling, etc. R. Co. v. Harvey, 77 Ohio St. 235, 83 N. E. 66, 122 Am. St. Rep. 503, 11 Ann. Cas. 981, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1136, annotated in 11 Ann. Cas. 981, the author at page 990 on this subject says:

"While the doctrine of the turntable cases has been approved and followed by many jurisdictions, there has developed in the last few years a tendency to break away from that doctrine. . . . In some jurisdictions . . . the doctrine has been . . . so limited as to apply only to injuries occurring to trespassing children while playing on a turntable, or to injuries occasioned by alluring, attractive, and dangerous unguarded machinery."

The opinion in that case adopts the well-settled rule that a land owner is under no obligation to safeguard his property so as to prevent injury to trespassers, and that such duty cannot be imposed by the inefficiency of the trespasser, where none would otherwise exist. The opinion is exhaustive and apparently unanswerable upon the point that a land owner is not liable for damages to an infant trespasser for injuries arising from an unguarded, open, and unconcealed [130] danger on his land. Liability in such a case is no different from liability to an adult, and he concludes that the rule that the owner of land may manage it in his own way for his own benefit, owing no duty to those who come upon it for no business purpose, but without license, express or implied, is too well-established to need further comment or to warrant a departure from it.

In Thompson v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 218 Pa. St. 444, 67 Atl. 768, 120 Am. St. Rep. 897, 11 Ann. Cas. 894, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1162, the opinion repudiates the turntable doctrine entirely. There is a strong dissenting opinion, and the two opinions set forth the argument on either side of the question involved.

The case of Sullivan v. Huldekoper, 27 App. Cas. (D. C.) 154, 7 Ann. Cas. 190, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 263, sets forth the leading arguments of the cases against the liability of a land owner for injuries from an open, unguarded pond on his land, and the case of Bjork v. Tacoma, 76 Wash. 225, 135 Pac. 1006, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 332, is a strong opinion to the contrary. In the latter case the city, in connection with its water system, maintained a flume 24 inches square about on the level with the ground to carry water to its reservoir; and, at a point where the land is used as a playground for children, it had an opening 24 inches square and a cover fastened with hinges and used by residents in that vicinity for a time, but it had subsequently fallen into decay, and, the cover being removed, a child three years old fell in and was drowned. The flume was a closed box from which there could be no escape or rescue.

In Haynes v. Seattle, 69 Wash. 419, 125 Pac. 147, it is disclosed that the reason for the court's conclusion was that the danger was exposed on the street of the city in front of and adjacent to the school playground, where there was a swarm of children; that it was not [131] only alluringly attractive, but in the nature of dangerous machinery carelessly left exposed to them.

In a former Washington case Gordon v. Snoqualmie Lumber, etc. Co. 69 Wash. 272, 100 Pac. 1044, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 88, it is held that hot water in a substantial barrel, used in connection with a shingle mill, being securely placed and covered, was not a trap or concealed danger. Defendant averred that it was under no duty to trespassers, and that one injured by dipping hot water from it could not recover damages, and was held not liable. The opinion in Bjork v. Tacoma, 76 Wash. 225, 135 Pac. 1006, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 332, is a strong argument in favor of such a liability.

In many cases a distinction is made between the case of negligence in not properly guarding dangerous machinery or a concealed dangerous condition, as found in the Stout and McDaniel cases, supra, and cases where there may be on one's land an unguarded pond or waterway, artificial or natural, even though children may be attracted there. As said in the Sullivan case, to hold the land owner liable in the latter cases would be to shift the care of children from their parents to strangers. The private duty to guard a child against unconcealed dangers devolves upon the parent, and not upon the land owner. The great majority of the cases upon this point hold that the landowner is liable only for accidents occurring on his land by reason of dangerous, unguarded machinery, permitted or created by him, or some concealed, dangerous condition thereon that is attractive to children whereby they may be injured; otherwise he is not liable.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE.

Liability of Landowner for Injury to Trespassing Child on Account of Unguarded Pond, Pool, Well, Etc.

The earlier cases discussing the liability of a landowner for an injury to a trespassing child by reason of an unguarded pond, pool, well or the like are reviewed in the notes to Wheeling, etc. R. Co. v. Harvey, 11 Ann. Cas. 981; Bottum v. Hawks, Ann. Cas. 1913A 1025; and Barnes v. Shreveport City R. Co. 49 Am. St. Rep. 400, 423. The present note collects the recent cases. For a discussion of the attractive nuisance doctrine as applied to municipalities, see the note to Doyle v. Chattanooga, Ann. Cas. 1915C 283.

The majority of the recent cases refuse to apply the attractive nuisance doctrine to an unguarded pool or pond, and hold that a landowner on whose premises such a body of water is situated is not liable for the death of a trespassing child who is accidentally drowned therein. Pastorello v. Stone, 89

Conn. 286, 93 Atl. 539; Somerfield v. Land, etc. Co. 93 Kan. 762, 145 Pac. 803; Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Moore (Tex.) 172 S. W. 568; Thompson v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 105 Miss. 636, 63 So. 185; 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1101; Emond v. Kimberly-Clark Co. 159 Wis. 83, 149 N. W. 760. And see the reported case. Thus in Thompson v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. supra, it was said: "Here we have a generally shallow body of water covering a large area in the woods, a half mile from the inhabited parts of the town, wherein boys waded, and wherein appellant's boy was drowned. We think it must be conceded that this deplorable tragedy could not have been anticipated as probable by the exercise of reasonable forethought, nor could it have been prevented by any reasonable precautions. Of course, one could have anticipated the possibility of this sad event, but we think the danger was comparatively remote. Scattered over the length and breadth of the land are innumerable ponds and lakes, artificial and natural; and occasionally a boy or man loses his life while wading, or bathing, in such body of water. If, as a matter of law, the owners of fish ponds, mill ponds, gin ponds, and other artificial bodies, wherein it is possible that boys may be drowned, can be held guilty of actionable negligence unless they inclose or guard same, few will be able to maintain these utilities, and to our minds an intolerable condition will be created." In Emond v. Kimberly-Clark Co. 159 Wis. 83, 149 N. W. 760, wherein it appeared that a boy, attracted to a pond situated about forty feet from a highway, was drowned therein, it was held that it was not the duty of the proprietor to maintain a fence to guard the pond, it not being situated so close to the highway as to endanger passersby. The court said: "Stripped of verbiage describing the attractiveness of the pond to children, we have a body of water forty feet long and thirty feet wide, situated upon defendant's land, with one end adjacent to a highway and the other end remote from the highway containing the dam and overflow gate or spill. There is nothing peculiar either in size, construction, or location of the pond. Hundreds of bodies of water both larger and smaller and equally attractive dot the whole state. And they take their toll of human life, especially of children, both in winter and summer. But it has not yet been deemed to be the duty of the owners thereof to fence or barricade them so as to exclude the public therefrom. Bodies of water like the one in question either natural or constructed by a dam or otherwise are useful and lawful objects whether located wholly within private lands or adjacent to a highway. Their usefulness would often be seriously interfered with if not entirely destroyed by a fence; especially so of ponds located on farms where they furnish water for stock. Generally speaking it is true, as stated in defendant's brief, that every drop of water except that in the washbowl is attractive to children, and it is also true that all bodies of water deep enough to drown a child situated within roving distance of children present a danger from which an injury to some person or death may reasonably be anticipated. But it does not follow from such fact that a duty on the part of the owner to fence or guard springs therefrom. There are many useful, lawful structures and objects of which the same is true. One having a grove of trees, especially be they nut-bearing trees, may reasonably anticipate that a boy may climb one and be injured. Such occurrences are by no means rare. But would any one claim that he must fence or guard his trees lest an injury to a child might result? The difference between an attractive lawful object and an attractive nuisance must not be overlooked. A certain amount of danger apparent to the mature mind inheres in the very existence of many useful objects both natural and artificial that surround our daily life. When the risk resulting from their use or existence is no greater than is reasonably necessary for their proper enjoyment by the owner, it is one we must assume as a condition of living. All efforts to minimize danger are commendable. But in so far as they are compulsory they must remain within the realm of what is fairly reasonable, and that is especially true of duties owing to trespassers. As to them, useful or lawful structures or objects upon one's land may in the absence of active negligence at the time of the injury be maintained and used in the customary manner in which they have been in the past, provided such maintenance and use is not so obviously dangerous as to partake of the nature of gross negligence. Zartner v. George, 156 Wis. 131, 145 N. W. 971. The world cannot be made danger-proof—especially to children. To require all natural or artificial streams or ponds so located as to endanger the safety of children to be fenced or guarded would in the ordinary settled community practically include all streams and ponds—be they in public parks or upon private soil—for children are self-constituted licensees if not trespassers everywhere. And to construct a boy-proof fence at a reasonable cost would tax the inventive genius of an Edison. Heretofore it has been the judgment of this court that, in the absence of special danger or peculiar circumstances, there is no breach of duty to the public in leaving unfenced a pond of water located on private property." But in Cochran v. Kankakee Stone, etc. Co. 179 Ill. App. 437, a recovery was permitted for the death of a child drowned while fishing in a pool formed in a stone quarry on the defendant's premises, which was not sufficiently fenced or guarded from entrance by children. The court said: "Where the owner or occupant of land has unguarded dangers thereon, of such a nature as to be attractive to a child and to appeal to his childish curiosity and instincts, such dangerous attractions are regarded as holding out implied invitations to children of tender years to come upon the premises for their own pleasure, and the owner or occupant of the premises must use ordinary care to keep them in safe condition; because such children, being without judgment, are liable to be drawn by childish curiosity into places of danger and to be there injured by reason of such unguarded attractions. In any given case where an injury results to a child from unguarded conditions upon the premises of another, the questions whether the premises are dangerous; whether they are calculated to be attractive to a child of tender years and liable to lead such a child into danger; and whether the child had such a lack of intelligent capacity and experience as to bring him within the protection of said rule; are questions of fact for the jury." To the same effect see Thomas v. Anthony, 170 Ill. App. 463. And in Cour d'Alene Lumber Co. v. Thompson, 215 Fed. 8, 131 C. C. A. 816, L.R.A.1915A 731, it was held that recovery could be had for the death of a child who while trespassing on the defendant's property was drowned in a well maintained by the defendant, which was not properly protected from children. The court said: "We are aware that in many cases the rule laid down in the cases from which we have cited has not been adhered to. There are numerous authorities of high repute in support of the rule that if a child trespasses upon the premises of another, and is injured in consequence of something that befalls him while so trespassing, he cannot recover damages, unless the injury was wantonly inflicted. Among these is the late case of Shawnee v. Cheek (Okla.) 137 Pac. 724, to which our attention has been directed by a supplemental brief filed by the defendant. The cases in support of the two rules are hopelessly in conflict. We have only to say that we prefer to follow the more humane rule, rather than the rule that an owner of land cannot be held responsible for injuries to children unless the same were wantonly inflicted. The latter rule is—A cruel and wicked doctrine, unworthy of a civilized jurisprudence, which puts property above humanity, leaves entirely out of view the tender years and infirmity of understanding of the child, indeed his inability to be a trespasser in sound legal theory, and visits upon him the consequences of his trespass just as though he were an adult, and exonerates the person or corporation upon whose property he is a trespasser from any measure of duty toward him which they would not owe under the same circumstances towards an adult." Thompson's Commentaries on the Law of Negligence, sec. 1026.

CHURCHILL ET AL.

England—Court of Appeal—July 14, 1914.

[1914] 3 K. B. 1272.

Agency—Del Credere Agent—Liability to Principal.

A del credere agent, though he sells to an undisclosed buyer, is liable to his principal only as a guarantor for the buyer and is not subject to an action by the principal to litigate disputes arising on the contract of sale. [See note at end of this case.]

[1272] Appeal from a decision of Pickford, J., in an action tried in the Commercial Court without a jury; reported [1914] T. K. B. 449.

The following statement of facts is taken in substance from the judgment of Pickford, J.:—The claim in this action is against the defendants as del credere brokers. The plaintiffs are timber merchants and the defendants are wood brokers; and the action arises out of a sale of timber made by the defendants as brokers for the plaintiffs. The name of the purchaser was not at the time of the sale disclosed to the plaintiffs, but the purchaser was in fact Millar's Karri and Jarrah Company, Limited, a company of unimpeachable solvency. The defendants gave the plaintiffs a sold note which was in the following terms: "Sold for account of Messrs. Thomas Gabriel & Sons to our principals about 380 loads Blackbutt scantlings as per specification at foot at two shillings and nine pence per foot cube. Cost freight and insurance to London. Delivery as soon as possible and to follow on after delivery of 2000 setts contract 7th February 1907. To be paid for by net cash on arrival of each shipment. Any question arising under this contract which cannot be settled by the brokers hereto shall [1273] then be submitted to arbitration in the usual manner. (Signed) Churchill & Sim, Brokers. The goods to be at buyer's risk in respect of fire directly they leave the ship's deck. Brokerage and guarantee 2½ per cent." The bought note was in these words: "Sold to Messrs. Millar's Karri and Jarrah Company (1902), Limited; for account of our principals:" then followed the same description of the goods and the same terms as in the sold note, except that the bought note said "Brokerage $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent." The notes did not disclose to the plaintiffs the name of the buyers; nor did they disclose to Millar's Karri and Jarrah Company the name of the sellers. The defendants took the brokerage and guarantee, or what is called a del credere commission, from the plaintiffs in respect of the transaction. The plaintiffs got into default in delivering under the contract, and it was arranged that they should pay a sum of 200*l.* in respect of claims arising out of that delay, and it was also arranged that the plaintiffs would deliver, and the buyers would accept, the balance of the timber under a penalty of 250*l.* to be paid by the plaintiffs if they did not deliver the balance on March 1, 1911, the contract having been made in 1908. The contract was varied to that extent and became a contract by which the plaintiffs agreed to deliver the balance of the goods and agreed to pay a penalty if they were not delivered by March 1, 1911. The timber was not all delivered by March 1, 1911, and the buyers declined to pay to the extent of 250*l.*, because they said they were entitled as against the price that might be due for the goods to set off 250*l.* which was owing by the plaintiffs under the contract as altered. That dispute having arisen and the names of the buyers being by that time known to the plaintiffs, the buyers were willing to have the matter settled either by arbitration or by the submission of a case for the opinion of counsel or of some person of standing in the trade. The plaintiffs declined to agree to that unless the brokers, the defendants, were made parties to the arbitration of the case. The defendants took up the position, which they still adhere to, that they were not personally liable to the plaintiffs in respect of the performance of the contract; thereupon the plaintiffs brought this action against them, alleging that by a custom in the timber trade where a merchant sells timber through a broker to an [1274] unnamed principal, and the broker is paid a del credere commission by the seller, the broker is responsible for the due performance of the contract and for the payment of the bills on their due date, and that the liability of the broker is not limited to guaranteeing the solvency of the undisclosed principal.

Pickford, J., found that the custom had not been proved, and held that a broker who on a sale of goods to an undisclosed buyer receives a del credere commission from the seller is not liable to pay the seller for the goods if the buyer is solvent but has refused to pay for the goods on the ground that the seller has not duly performed the contract, and that the broker is liable to pay the seller only if, owing to the insolvency of the buyer or some other analogous cause, the seller is unable to recover the price from the buyer.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Schiller, K.C., and Douglas Hogg for appellants.

George Wallace, K.C., and A. H. Chaytor for respondents.

Drake, Sen & Parton, solicitors for appellants.

Coward & Hauckley, Sons & Chance, solicitors for respondents.

[1275] BUCKLEY, L.J.—I think that this appeal fails. For the determination of the case it is not necessary to decide what the obligation of a del credere agent is. It is only necessary to decide negatively that this obligation is not so extensive as to constitute him a person with whom a seller may litigate any dispute that arises out of a contract and determine what is the sum which is due in respect of the contract which is the subject of the del credere agency. The appellants' contention on the contrary is based on Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112, on which I will say a word in a moment.

The facts are simple. The plaintiffs are timber merchants; the defendants are wood brokers. A contract was made on January 23, 1908, by which a sold note was given by the defendants to the plaintiffs, the defendants not disclosing the buyer. The sold note expressed that the defendants had sold for the plaintiffs, [1276] who are principals, certain goods at certain prices, delivery as soon as possible, to follow on after delivery of certain sets under a previous contract, to be paid for by net cash on arrival of each shipment; any question arising under this contract which cannot be settled by the brokers hereto shall then be submitted to arbitration in the usual manner. The contract was performed to a certain extent, deliveries took place under it, the plaintiffs then fell into default in delivering, and certain varied terms were arrived at. An arrangement was made to pay a certain sum of 200*l.* in respect of claims arising out of delay. A date was fixed, March 1, 1911, upon which the plaintiffs were to complete delivery under a penalty of 250*l.* if they failed. Under the contract thus varied default was made; the last delivery was not effected by March 1, 1911; one shipment arrived at a later date. A dispute arose between the parties whether the penalty was payable or not. The buyers were willing to refer to arbitration under the contract, the plaintiffs declined to do so except on certain terms which were not assented to, and thereupon the defendants took up the position that they were not personally liable to the plaintiffs in respect of the performance of the contract. The plaintiffs then brought this action against them, alleging that they were personally liable under the contract.

It will be noticed from what I have said that no ascertained sum has been arrived at as between the vendors and the vendees as to what is the amount due. There is a dispute pending as to what is the sum. The contention before us is that the vendor is entitled to sue the del credere agent and to ascertain for the first time in that proceeding what is due and to settle in that proceeding matters in dispute between the vendors and vendees as to what the amount is. The contention to that effect is raised on what Lord Mansfield, C.J., said in Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112. His language as to the nature of a del credere contract was this: "It is an absolute engagement to the principal from the broker and makes him liable in the first instance. There is no occasion for the principal to communicate to the underwriter, though the law allows the principal for his [1277] benefit to resort to him as a collateral security. But the broker is liable at all events." That was language that affirmed that the del credere agent was under an absolute engagement in respect of which he was liable in the first instance, that he was liable, I suppose, for the performance of the contract, an expression which is found in some of the later cases, that his liability was not confined to a liability to make good the event of insolvency of the buyer or the impossibility of suing the buyer by reason of his being abroad or anything of that kind, but that he was liable as a principal in the matter. From that it would flow, I suppose, that he would stand in the position of a sub-seller to the ultimate buyer and would be entitled to retain any profit made upon the sub-sale. That of course is inconsistent with the general idea as regards the engagements subsisting between seller and del credere agent and buyer. Lord Mansfield's language in Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112, has been criticized in Morris v. Cleasby, 4 M. & S. 566; Hornby v. Lacy, 6 M. & S. 166, and Couturier v. Hastie, 8 Exch. 40. In the first case, Morris v. Cleasby, 4 M. & S. 566, Lord Ellenborough said this, after reading what I have read from Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112: "With all the respect which is due to Lord Mansfield and those judges, we cannot accede to these propositions thus generally laid down without restriction or qualification. The doctrine contained in them, as so laid down, appears to us to reverse the relative situations of principal and factor and to have a tendency to introduce uncertainty and confusion into the law on this subject." Lord Ellenborough in Hornby v. Lacy, 6 M. & S. 171, says: "I own I cannot think that a commission del credere is to have an effect attributed to it beyond that which regards the benefit of the principal who gives the commission. The commission imports that if the vendee does not pay the factor will; it is a guarantee from the factor to the principal against any mischief to arise from the vendee's insolvency. But it varies not an iota the rights subsisting between vendor and vendee. A somewhat different doctrine seems to have originated with Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112. A kind of magic effect was there given to a commission del credere [1278] changing the relative position of the owner and buyer; and what is reported to have fallen from Chambre, J., in a later case is referable to the same authority; but this was set right, as I think, in the judgment in Morris v. Cleasby, 4 M. & S. 566, which was given after much consideration, and I may add with the concurrence of two of our learned brethren on this bench now unhappily no more." I need not refer with particularity to the case of Couturier v. Hastie, 8 Exch. 40. The decision in Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112, is criticized in Story on Agency in a note to s. 33, where the learned author says this: "It was laid down in Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112, that a commission del credere amounts to an absolute engagement to the principal from the factor and makes him liable in the first instance. But the doctrine of that case on this point seems incorrect. A factor with a del credere commission is liable to the principal, if the buyer fails to pay or is incapable of paying. But he is not primarily the debtor. On the contrary, the principal may sue the buyer in his own name notwithstanding the del credere commission; so that the latter amounts to no more than a guaranty." I do not propose to travel through more of the authorities. They have all been most carefully reviewed by Pickford, J., in the judgment from which this appeal is brought. The proposition which the learned judge affirms at the end of his judgment seems to me absolutely correct. After pointing out that it is not necessary for him to determine whether the obligation of a del credere agent extends beyond the case of insolvency to a case of inability, by reason of a debtor being beyond the seas or something of that kind, to obtain immediate payment, and that it is not necessary to decide what his obligations are as regards making payment in default of payment by the buyer, he goes on to say this: "I think it is quite clear that it" (that is, the obligation of the del credere agent) "does not extend to make him the person with whom the seller is entitled, if he wishes, to litigate any disputes that arise out of the contract and ascertain what is due upon it. I think that, according to the authorities, it cannot extend further than that where there is an ascertained amount [1279] or certain sum due as a debt from the buyer to the seller, and the buyer fails to pay that amount either through insolvency or something that makes it as impossible to recover as in the case of insolvency, the broker has to answer for that default by reason of his having received a del credere commission." To that I assent. The liability of the del credere agent is a contingent pecuniary liability, not a liability to perform the contract; it is a pecuniary liability to make good in an event the default of the buyer in respect of a pecuniary liability. It does not extend to other obligations of the contract. It does not expose the del credere agent to an action to ascertain the sum due. It is limited to a contingent pecuniary liability in respect of a sum which, as between the seller and the buyer, is an ascertained sum.

On these grounds I think that the judgment under appeal is right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

KENNEDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think myself that this is a novel effort, very gallantly made and supported with much care and learning, to put the position of a del credere agent where it has never been before. I think it has always been understood, both by men of commerce and by men of law, to be a liability to be called upon by the principal to pay the ascertained sum when due under a contract from the other contracting party. The case that has been put here is summarized in his judgment by Pickford, J., at p. 454, where he says: "The question which I have to decide is one of principle whether the seller is entitled to call upon the del credere broker to litigate any disputes that may have arisen between the seller and the buyer, and not only to pay an ascertained sum which the buyer has refused to pay, but also to ascertain by setting up the buyer's defences how much is to be paid." That was what he had to decide, and in my judgment he decided it rightly on principle and rightly on authority. I cannot help thinking that it would generally be correct to say that the del credere undertaking or guarantee relates to the solvency of the contracting party, but I am not going any more than Pickford, J., did, so to tie it down, because I can conceive of a case in which it would be impossible [1280] to say that the buyer, though he may be temporarily embarrassed, was not able to pay, and if in fact he did not pay a liquidated sum on the particular day, I think it could quite conceivably be right to say that recourse to the agent is within the intention and meaning of a del credere agency. The seller may say to the agent "You, who have taken the del credere commission, have given me a buyer who does not produce the cash which is unquestionably due to me on a certain day. You say if I can press it on the buyer he can pay, but the process of squeezing is a difficult and a troublesome one; you have agreed that he shall pay me that liquidated sum." I am prepared to hold my mind open as to whether that would not be a proper case in which to call upon the del credere agent to fulfil his duty; and I think that that was what was perhaps in the minds of those judges who have not absolutely confined themselves to solvency as the question to be considered, but have also considered performance of the contract. At the same time, from such inference as I can draw from one's knowledge and experience, I cannot help thinking that the popular view is not far wrong; certainly if you asked nine people out of ten who were in a position to express an opinion they would say that the del credere agent guarantees the solvency of the buyer. Lord Ellenborough in the case of Hornby v. Lacy, 6 M. & S. 186, says this: "I own that I cannot think that a commission del credere is to have an effect attributed to it beyond that which regards the benefit of the principal who gives the commission. The commission imports that, if the vendee does not pay, the factor will." That is putting it in general terms that would include non-payment simply; but what he goes on to say in the same sentence, and what I think is the general idea, is, "It is a guarantee from the factor to the principal against any mischief to arise from the vendee's insolvency." I do not think that so great a judge would have used that phrase, as he did, in the commencement of his judgment, if he had not thought, as I, following him, think, that the central idea is that "I guarantee to give you a client who can pay when the time comes." But I am not prepared to say that the liability of the agent will not go a little further and [1281] be enforceable when there is an ascertained sum so as to be an undertaking: "If he will not pay, I am called upon on my guarantee to pay." The question that we have heard argued with so much care is a totally different one; it is this: "Is the agent to be treated as a person who says to his principal 'I turn my face to the smiter when the other side, the contracting party, has a number of disputes with you about what is due; sue me, I take upon myself all the burden of these vexed questions though I may not even know of the correspondence between you and him. I do not know even the rights of the parties; I cannot say whether he has a good answer to your claim by reason of prior contracts and dealings by set-off or counter-claim.'" It is impossible, I think, that a business man ordinarily would take such a view; and I do not think that is the view of the law. I am far from saying that you might not have in any given trade or market a custom by which a del credere agent may be made to take upon himself a larger liability and that you might not prove a custom under which the person who says "I am going to do business as a del credere agent" may be holding himself out as a person who undertakes a larger liability, but if I am to construe the term "del credere agent" apart from special custom, apart from usage in a particular market, I do not think that it includes anything like that which it must include in order to justify the success of the appellants in this case.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I agree. It has been said that this point which the learned judge has decided, on which we have heard a good deal of argument, was not the point really raised on the pleadings. I am not quite sure how far the point was raised by the pleadings, but looking at the course of the trial, looking to the correspondence which was put in without objection, I am sure that it was open to Pickford, J., to decide that which he has now decided, namely, whether on the particular facts of this case—and that is all I am going on—the del credere agent was liable to pay. If the decision in Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112, really established what the position of a del credere [1232] agent is, the plaintiffs would be right. A great many people have thought that Grove v. Dubois, was right; apparently the current of American decisions is that way. I think, so far as we are concerned in this country, that it is pretty well established that Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112, went too far. Morris v. Cleasby, 4 M. & S. 566, and Hornby v. Lacy, 6 M. & S. 166, were cited, as Pickford, J., said, without disapproval in Couturier v. Hastie, 8 Exch. 40. No later case in England has been brought to our notice in which any suggestion has been made that the doctrine in Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112, was the right view. When you come to think of it, if the doctrine of Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112, was right, the vendor can sue the del credere agent not merely for the price of the goods but for the refusal of the ultimate vendee to accept, and I find no case in which that view has been accepted. If Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112, were out of the way, then the del credere agent is not responsible as a principal to his vendee; he is responsible only in virtue of the relation which arises between them, namely, that he is an agent for making a contract with some unknown vendor and also that he guarantees something. What exactly he guarantees, I do not propose to say. I think it is quite likely that he does more than guarantee solvency, but what I do think is that he does not guarantee the performance in such a case as this. He does not guarantee performance where, for instance, the vendee refuses to take delivery or accept the goods; he does not guarantee performance where the vendee and the vendor have, no doubt through him (because the correspondence all passed through him and not between the principals direct), made a fresh arrangement. Here the arrangement made was that the vendors were willing to pay a sum of money and that they should enter into a contract with regard to the promptitude of future delivery. The question of construction of that contract may be wrongly raised by the vendee, but from that moment forward the only thing the vendors could possibly look to the del credere agent for was the assurance that the vendee, when the contract was ultimately fought out with him and these points on the subsequent contract had been raised [1233] and determined, would prove solvent. On these grounds I think this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE.

Nature and Extent of Liability of Del Credere Agent to Principal.

Nature of Liability.

The reported case holds that a del credere agent is liable to his principal for goods sold only in case the purchaser of the goods fails to pay for them. Although there is authority for a different doctrine this view that the undertaking of a del credere agent is in the nature of a guaranty is upheld in a number of cases both in the United States and in England. Morris v. Cleasby, 4 M. & S. 566; Hornby v. Lacy, 6 M. & S. 166; Peele v. Northcote, 7 Taunt. 478, 2 E. C. L. 477, 1 Mod. C. Pl. 178; Ex p. Bright, 10 Ch. D. (Eng.) 566; Thompson v. Perkins, 3 Mason 232, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,972; Bradley v. Richardson, 2 Blatchf. 343, 23 Vt. 720, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,786; Muller v. Bohlens, 2 Wash. 378, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,914; Dunnell v. Mason, 1 Story 543, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,179. See also Baker v. Langhorn, 6 Taunt. 519; 1 E. C. L. 470, 2 Marsh 215, 4 Campb. 396; Corbett v. Foote [1884-1896] Newfoundland L. Rep. 276; Ex p. Flannagans, 2 Hughes 264, 12 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 230, 9 Fed. Cas. No. 4,855; Wittkowski v. Harris, 64 Fed. 712; Titcomb v. Seaver, 4 Me. 542; Wasey v. Whitcomb, 167 Mich. 58, 132 N. W. 572; Commercial Credit Co. v. Girard Nat. Bank, 246 Pa. St. 88, 92 Atl. 44. In Bradley v. Richardson, supra, the court said: "It is established, that the undertaking of the factor is merely to answer for the solvency of the buyers of the goods, or, rather, to guaranty to the principal the payment of the debts due from the buyers. He becomes liable to pay to the principal the amount of the purchase-money, if the buyers fail to pay it when it becomes due. This is the effect and whole extent of his engagement. The doctrine is so laid down in all the adjudged cases, with few exceptions, and is recognized as the true doctrine by Chancellor Kent in his Commentaries, and by Judge Story in his Treatise on Agency. And I think it necessarily must be so, if the factor has authority to sell on credit, as he indisputably has, and if the principal may maintain an action against the buyers of the goods, which has been often adjudged and is nowhere denied." And in the same case on the question whether such a guaranty by a factor was within the clause of the statute of frauds requiring a contract to pay the debt of another to be in writing, it was said by the court: "Some confusion has arisen on this subject from the decisions on the question whether the undertaking of a factor is a contract within the Statute of Frauds, and so must be in writing. The better opinion is, that it need not be in writing; that, though a guarantee, it is not a collateral engagement, but an original and absolute one, that the prices for which the goods are sold, or the debts created by the sales of the goods, shall be paid to the principal when the credit given on the sales shall have expired."

It was held in a few early English decisions that the liability of a del credere agent to his principal was not merely that of a guarantor but that he was absolutely liable in the first instance for the proceeds of goods sold by him for his principal. Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112; Bize v. Dickason, 1 T. R. (Eng.) 285; Houghton v. Matthews, 3 B. & P. (Eng.) 485. The foregoing cases may be regarded as overruled by the reported case and the English cases cited in the opening paragraph of this note.

The doctrine, however, that a del credere agent is liable to his principal in the first instance finds support in several American decisions. Lewis v. Brehme, 33 Md. 412, 3 Am. Rep. 190; Swan v. NeSmith, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 220, 19 Am. Dec. 282; Balderston v. National Rubber Co. 18 R. I. 328, 27 Atl. 507, 49 Am. St. Rep. 772. See also Pugh v. Porter Bros. Co. 118 Cal. 628, 50 Pac. 772; Cushman v. Snow, 186 Mass. 169, 71 N. E. 529.

In New York although there is some authority for a contrary view (see Heubach v. Rother, 2 Duer (N. Y.) 227; Wallace v. Castle, 14 Hun (N. Y.) 106; Gindre v. Kean, 7 Misc. 582, 31 Abb. N. Cas. 100, 28 N. Y. S. 4), the larger number of decisions take the position that a del credere agent is liable to his principal in the first instance for goods sold in his capacity as agent. Leverick v. Meigs, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 645; Wolff v. Koppel, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 458, affirmed 2 Denio 368, 43 Am. Dec. 751; Cartwright v.

Greene, 47 Barb. (N. Y.) 9; Blakely v. Jacobson, 9 Bosw. (N. Y.) 140; Sherwood v. Stone, 14 N. Y. 267. See also Milliken v. Byerly, 6 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 214. In Wolff v. Koppel, supra, the court said: "This is a class of contracts that have existed in this country as long as commerce has flourished, and under which business is daily transacting to a large amount. The understanding of the mercantile community has, I apprehend, been general and uniform, that the agreement between the principal and factor was original and absolute to pay the price of the sale, deducting the commission, at the time the credit expired. Doubtless the factor expected the fund would be received from the purchaser; but whether received or not, he charges himself with the amount in his account with his principal. A contrary rule would require the principal to exhaust his remedy against the purchaser, in order to determine his insolvency, before he could charge the factor as surety." In Cartwright v. Greene, 47 Barb. (N. Y.) 9, it was held that it is not necessary for a principal in order to hold his agent liable for the purchase price of goods sold to show that he has tried to collect from the person who bought from the agent.

Extent of Liability.

It has been held that a del credere agent does not guarantee the bills of exchange sent by him to his principal in payment for goods sold where the bills are forwarded under instructions from the principal or that method of remittance is the ordinary course of business between them. Heubach v. Rother, 2 Duer (N. Y.) 227; Leverick v. Meigs, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 645; Sharp v. Emmet, 5 Whart. (Pa.) 288, 34 Am. Dec. 554. See also Cartwright v. Greene, 47 Barb. (N. Y.) 9. It is otherwise however where it appears that the understanding of the parties is that the agent shall guarantee the remittances. Heubach v. Rother, 2 Duer (N. Y.) 227, wherein it was held that a del credere agent who remitted to his principal in advance the funds due for a sale made on credit was liable as for a personal debt and should make good in case the remittance proved worthless.

In Muller v. Bohlens, 2 Wash. 378, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,914, it was held that an agent who sold goods for a del credere commission was liable to his principal on a protested bill of exchange which he took from a purchaser in payment for goods sold, but was not liable on another protested bill which he purchased from a solvent person for a remittance to his principal in accordance with the latter's directions.

If the agent is guilty of negligence and deviates from the instructions of his principal in making a remittance, as by drawing a bill of exchange on a person of poor credit, he is liable for the payment of the bill in case of its dishonor. Leverick v. Meigs, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 645. See also Lucas v. Groning, 7 Taunt. 164, 2 E. C. L. 164, 2 Marsh. 460.

In Lewis v. Brehme, 33 Md. 412, 3 Am. Rep. 190, it was held that a del credere agent was bound to see that the proceeds from a sale of his principal's goods were safely transmitted to him in the absence of special instructions from the principal regarding the manner of remitting.

A del credere agent need not account to his principal for the proceeds of a sale of goods until the period of credit extended to the purchaser has expired. Lewis v. Brehme, 33 Md. 412, 3 Am. Rep. 190; Upham v. Lefavour, 11 Mete. (Mass.) 174; Leverick v. Meigs, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 645; Swan v. Nesmith, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 220, 19 Am. Dec. 282.

It has been held that an agent who makes a contract with his principal to be liable for the proceeds of all goods sold by the agent, is not discharged from responsibility where notes taken in payment for goods sold by the agent are renewed by the principal after suit has been instituted for an accounting between the parties. Buelterman v. Meyer, 132 Mo. 474, 34 S. W. 67. And where a del credere agent who has sold goods at a par price takes payment in depreciated bank notes he cannot set off this loss in accounting to his principal but must account for the purchase price at par. Dunnell v. Mason, 1 Story 543, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,179.

A local agent who had agreed with his principal to indorse all the notes which he took in payment for his principal's goods has been held not to be liable for goods sold by a general agent of the principal where it appeared that the local agent protested against the sale on the ground that the proposed vendee was insolvent and refused to indorse his note for that reason. Springfield Fertilizer Co. v. Tompkins, 16 Ind. App. 403. And a factor who guarantees sales for his principal is not chargeable by the principal for goods sold but subsequently recovered from the purchaser because of his fraud, or for goods which have been rejected by the purchaser as not being up to sample. Talcott v. Canton Mills Co. 31 Abb. N. Cas. 97, 30 N. Y. S. 421 (Arbitration).

It has been held that where, under the terms of an agreement, an agent becomes a guarantor of all sales made for his principal and the agent has a right to sell on credit, he cannot be held liable as for a conversion of goods sold on credit even though he has failed to collect for the sales. Standard Fertilizer Co. v. Van Valkenburgh, 21 Misc. 569, 47 N. Y. S. 708.

Where a contract of sale was made by a del credere agent of goods which had been sold to another at the time the contract was entered into, this fact being unknown to either of the parties, it was held that the agent was not liable to his principal for the price of the goods as there was nothing capable of a transfer at the time of the making of the contract. Couturier v. Hastie, 5 H. L. Cas. (Eng.) 673, 2 Jur. N. S. 1241, 25 L. J. Exch. 253.

Where a del credere agent has received goods from his principal under an express contract which does not oblige the agent to insure the goods, he is not liable for the loss of the goods by fire even though the invoice of the goods bears a stipulation in very small type that the stock is "to be kept covered by insurance for the benefit of the consignor." Sturtevant Co. v. Cumberland, 106 Md. 587, 14 Ann. Cas. 675, 68 Atl. 351.

In a jurisdiction where the doctrine of the absolute liability of a del credere agent prevails it has been held that the agent is liable to his principal for interest on the amount due from the date on which the credit extended to a purchaser expires. Blakely v. Jacobson, 9 Bosw. (N. Y.) 140.

BURNS

CITY OF NEW YORK.

New York Court of Appeals—January 12, 1915.

213 N. Y. 516; 106 N. E. 77.

Landlord and Tenant — Covenant for Perpetual Renewal of Lease.

Covenants in a lease for continual renewals, while not favored, because tending to create a perpetuity, are valid and enforceable if explicit and clear.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A covenant in a lease by a city for 21 years "to renew it at its expiration for 21 years, "with a like covenant for future renewals of the lease as is contained in this indenture," is one for future renewals in perpetuity.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Four renewals of a lease for 21 years are a practical construction of a covenant of the original lease, to be given great weight by a court, as one for future renewals in perpetuity.

[See note at end of this case.]

Municipal Corporations — Power to Lease — Limitation Not Retroactive.

Ordinances and statutes limiting the period for which the city may lease property, not being retroactive, do not affect renewals under a prior valid lease by the city of New York for 21 years, with covenant for renewals in perpetuity.

Burns v. New York, 158 N. Y. App. Div. 729, reversed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, First Judicial Department.

Submission of controversy. John N. Burns, administrator, plaintiff, and City of New York, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

James A. Donnelly for appellant.

Frank L. Polk, Charles J. Nehrbas and Terence Farley for respondent.

[519] CHASE, J.—The mayor, aldermen and commonalty of the city of New York, in 1811, leased to John Dixey a small piece of real property in the city of New York now known as No. 103 Park Row. The lease was for the term of twenty-one years, beginning May 1, 1806. It contained a covenant by the lessor that "They, the said Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New York, their successors and assigns shall and will, at the expiration of the term hereby demised, again demise and to farm let the above premises in pursuance of this present lease unto the said John Dixey, his executors; administrators or assigns for and during the term of twenty-one years thereafter, with a like covenant for future renewals of the lease as is contained in this present indenture, and upon such rents and other terms and conditions as shall be agreed upon between the parties, or as shall be determined by two sworn appraisers, one of whom to be chosen by each of the said parties: unless the said premises or some part thereof shall at the expiration of the said term hereby demised be required for public purposes; in which case the said term shall not be renewed, but the said Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New York, their successors and assigns shall and will pay to the said John Dixey, his executors, administrators or assigns, the value of such buildings as shall be erected in pursuance of this lease. . . ."

[520] On May 1, 1827, May 1, 1848, May 1, 1869, and on May 1, 1890, and on each of said dates, said lease was renewed for a further term of twenty-one years to the successor in interest of said Dixey. Each of said renewals contained a provision similar to the provision quoted from the first lease providing for future renewals. Prior to May 1, 1911, at the expiration of the lease dated May 1, 1890, the successor in interest of said Dixey duly applied for a renewal of said lease for a further period of twenty-one years, which application was refused. The plaintiff's testatrix and her predecessors in title fully performed all the conditions and covenants required of the lessee by the terms of said leases. The premises are not required for public purposes. The respondent claims that if the original lease did not provide for perpetual renewals the leases executed on and subsequent to May 1, 1869, were made without authority of law and are void, because of the ordinances passed by the common council of the city of New York in 1844 and subsequent acts of the legislature. (Ordinances of the City of New York, sections 9 and 10, title 4, as ratified and confirmed by chapter 225, Laws of 1845; chapter 217, Laws of 1853, section 7; chapter 446, Laws of 1857, section 41; chapter 876, Laws of 1869, section 8; chapter 410, Laws of 1882, section 170; present Charter of the City of New York, section 205.)

But one question of law is presented on this appeal and that is involved in the construction of that part of the lease quoted relating to the renewals thereof. Was it the intention of the parties to the lease to provide for perpetual renewals?

Covenants by a landlord for continual renewals are not favored for they tend to create a perpetuity. When they are explicit the more established weight of authority is in favor of their validity. (Kent's Comm. vol. 4, 109.) The rule stated by Kent was the law in England and has been frequently stated by writers and in opinions by the courts both in England and in this country. (Platt on [521] Leases, 709; Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, section 335; 3 Washburn's Real Property, 469; McAdam on Landlord and Tenant, section 123; Jones on Landlord and Tenant, section 343; Tritton v. Foote, 2 Bro. C. C. (Eng.) 636, 639 and note; Hare v. Burges, 4 Kay & J. (Eng.) 45; Rutgers v. Hunter, 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 215; Carr v. Ellison, 20 Wend. 178; Hoff v. Royal Metal Furniture Co. 117 App. Div. 884, 103 N. Y. S. 371, affirmed, 189 N. Y. 555, 82 N. E. 1128; Drake v. Board of Education, 208 Mo. 540, 13 Ann. Cas. 1002, 108 S. W. 650, 123 Ann. St. Rep. 448, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 829.)

Reading the provisions of the leases in question in the light of the settled law upon the subject of the construction of covenants for renewal, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the parties to the original lease in preparing the same had the established rule of law in mind and intended to bind the city to grant future renewals in perpetuity. Such intention is not left to conjecture or to be implied. It is clearly and specifically provided by the lease that it shall run for a term of twenty-one years and that at the expiration of the term it will be renewed "with a like covenant for future renewals of the lease as is contained in this present indenture." As the language in regard to future renewals is clear, it should be enforced.

The respondent relies upon the case of Syms v. New York, 105 N. Y. 153, 11 N. E. 369. The plaintiff in the Syms case brought the action to reform two leases. The city of New York had executed a lease for the term of thirty years which ended on the first day of May, 1840. In it the city agreed that at the expiration of the term it would give a new lease "for and during the term of twenty-one years thereafter with a like covenant for future renewals of the lease as is contained in this present indenture." A new lease was given at the end of the first term for a term of twenty-one years, and it was therein covenanted that at the end of such renewed term another lease would be given "in pursuance of this present lease . . . for and during the term of twenty-one years thereafter upon [522] such rents as shall be agreed upon." At the end of the second lease a third lease was given to an assignee of the first lessee, and in such third lease there was no covenant for a renewal, but the lessee expressly covenanted that at the end of the term he would peaceably and quietly leave, surrender and yield up to the city or its successors or assigns all the demised premises. Near the end of the term of the last lease the city sold the property to a stranger to the lease. Thereafter the successor of the lessee brought the action to reform the leases given in renewal of the original lease so as to insert in each a covenant for a further renewal of twenty-one years from the date of the expiration of such renewals. The court in the opinion say (page 158): "This action was brought mainly for the purpose of reforming the last two leases. But there was no proof of any mistake or fraud in their execution, or in the terms inserted in them, and, therefore, even if the statute of limitations did not furnish a bar to the action to reform the leases, there was no basis or ground for their reformation. The plaintiff's action, therefore, utterly failed and a verdict was properly directed for the defendants." It was not necessary for the court to discuss the construction of the original lease, as the renewals had been given and accepted without fraud or mistake, and by the terms of the last renewal neither the lessee nor any person claiming under him could assert any right to the premises after the termination of such lease. The court, however, did in the course of the opinion use language as follows: "The lease executed in 1810 should not be so construed as to create a perpetuity. (Rutgers v. Hunter, 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 215; Carr v. Ellison, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 178; Piggot v. Mason, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 412; Banker v. Braker, 9 Abb.

N. Cas. 411.) Its language is satisfied by holding that it gave the lessee the right to two renewals and those renewals were subsequently given and it must be assumed that the parties so understood the first lease. The two renewals signed by both parties gave that lease [523] a practical construction which should have great weight with any court called upon to ascertain its meaning and effect."

Notwithstanding the statement of the court regarding the covenant for renewal in the Syms case, we think that if the intention of the parties in that lease had not been shown by their acts amounting to a practical construction, and if the renewals had not been accepted and fully agreed to by the parties in the form stated, the language of the original lease would not have been satisfied by granting two renewals thereof.

The intention of the parties in this case is shown by the four renewals covering a period of nearly one hundred years to have been in accordance with the construction of the appellant. As said by the court in the Syms case, these renewals are a practical construction of the original lease which should have great weight with any court called upon to ascertain the meaning and effect of the lease itself.

In Storms v. Manhattan R. Co., 178 N. Y. 493, 71 N. E. 3, 6 L.R.A. 625, the court construed a lease having a covenant in the exact words of the covenant in the lease now under consideration. The court there referred to the lease as one entitling the lessee to perpetual renewals and say: "The covenant for renewal must be considered as perpetual, absolutely binding the city until some portion of the land upon which the plaintiff's building stands shall be actually required for public purposes by the City of New York." The decision in the Storms case was subsequent to the decision in the Syms case, and it supports the claim of the appellant that the court is not bound by language used in the opinion in the Syms case which was not only not necessary to the decision of the case but was used in connection with its reference to the practical construction placed upon the lease by the parties to it. It is conceded that if it was not the intention of the parties to the lease under consideration to provide for perpetual [524] renewals the judgment appealed from is right and should be affirmed.

The intention to grant renewals in perpetuity is not shown by a general covenant to renew upon the same covenants, conditions and agreements as contained in the original lease. There must be some language in the covenant which shows an intention to include in the renewal leases a particular covenant in regard to future renewals. (Muhlenbrink v. Pooler, 40 Hun 526, 1 N. Y. St. Rep. 223; Carr v. Ellison, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 178; Winslow v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 188 U. S. 646, 23 St. Ct. 443, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 635.) The lease under consideration expressly provides that the renewal leases shall contain a covenant in regard to renewals the same as in the original lease. This agreement the parties are entitled to have carried out.

In Hare v. Burges (supra) a clause in a lease providing for a renewal lease at the same rents and subject to the same covenants including this present covenant was held to give to the lessee the right to perpetual renewals.

In Hodges v. Blagrove, 18 Beav. (Eng.) 404, the lease contained a covenant on the part of the lessors to renew for twenty-one years "and that in every future lease should also be inserted the like covenant for renewals at the expiration of the first ten years of every such lease." The court held that the lessee was entitled "to a perpetual renewal from time to time forever upon the terms stated in the original lease." In Hoff v. Royal Metal Furniture Co. (supra) the lease contained a covenant that "Said party of the second part, its successors or assigns, to have the privilege of renewing this lease from year to year upon notice to that effect in writing, given on or before the day of the date of the expiration of each and every year by written notice addressed to the party of the first part at her last known address." The court held that the covenant entitled the lessee to perpetual yearly renewals.

It is not denied that the mayor, alderman and commonalty [525] of the city of New York had the power to make the lease in 1811, and therein provide for perpetual renewals. Neither is it claimed that the ordinances and the acts of the legislature prevented the renewal of said lease from time to time if it was so agreed in the original lease. The ordinances and acts of the legislature were not intended to affect outstanding valid contracts.

The judgment should be reversed and judgment directed in favor of the plaintiff in accordance with this opinion, with costs.

NOTE.

Construction of Covenant in Lease for Renewal as Covenant for Perpetual Renewal.

It is the purpose of this note to review the recent cases discussing the question whether a covenant in a lease for a renewal should be construed as a covenant for perpetual renewal. The earlier cases are considered in the notes to Drake v. Board of Education, as reported in 13 Ann. Cas. 1002, and 123 Am. St. Rep. 448, 462.

The courts lean against a construction of a renewal clause in a lease that will make the lease one in perpetuity. Therefore it is generally held that a lease containing a covenant to renew at its expiration, with covenants, terms, and conditions similar to those contained in the original lease, is fully carried out by one renewal without the insertion of another covenant to renew. U. S. Brewing Co. v. Wolf, 181 Ill. App. 509; Feigenspan v. Popowska, 75 N. J. Eq. 342, 72 Atl. 1003; Fergen v. Lyons (Wis.) 155 N. W. 935; Rex v. St. Catharines Hydraulic Co. 43 Can. Sup. Ct. 595; Wilson v. Kerner, 21 Ont. W. Rep. 477, 3 Dominion L. Rep. 11, 3 Ont. W. N. 789; Hoadley v. Bayntum, 31 West L. Rep. (British Columbia) 751. See also Leavitt v. Maykel, 203 Mass. 506, 89 N. E. 1056, 133 Am. St. Rep. 323; Greenville Bank v. Gornto, 161 N. C. 341, 77 S. E. 222. Compare Swan v. Colclough, Hayes & J. (Eng.) 807. Thus in Fergen v. Lyons, supra, the court said: "An unqualified covenant to renew a lease calls for a new lease for the same period and upon the same terms as the original lease, except the agreement to renew." And in Feigenspan v. Popowska, 75 N. J. Eq. 342, 72 Atl. 1003, the court said: "It is conceded that an agreement to renew a lease implies a renewal for a like term on like conditions. . . . This general covenant to renew, while calling for a lease of similar tenor to the original lease, does not require that the renewal lease shall contain a similar covenant to renew. The authorities all agree upon this exception, and the reason for it is obvious." So in U. S. Brewing Co. v. Wolf, 181 Ill. App. 509, wherein the court said: "That the plaintiff was not entitled, under the optional clause of its lease with Schreiber, to a new lease including the optional clause, thereby making the lease perpetual, is too well settled to require the citation of authorities." In Hoadley v. Bayntum, 31 West L. Rep. (British Columbia) 751, it appeared that a lease contained the following covenant as to renewal: "And at the option of the lessee the term hereby demised shall be renewed for a further term of one year and so on from year to year at a like rental and on similar terms." The court said: "I think the tenancy under which the defendant in the case at bar had been holding . . . was a tenancy from year to year. The words in the renewal covenant contain these very words: 'for a further term of one year and so on from year to year, etc., etc.'" Compare Van Beuren, etc. Bill Post Co. v. Kenney, 60 Misc. 338, 113 N. Y. S. 450. The courts look with disfavor upon a lease that is perpetually renewable, and from the ordinary covenant to renew, a perpetuity will not be regarded as created. There must be some peculiar and plain language before it will be assumed that the parties intended to create a perpetual renewal. Rex v. St. Catharines Hydraulic Co. 43 Can. Sup. Ct. 595. See also Sadlier v. Biggs, 4 H. L. Cas. (Eng.) 435, 457; Wilson v. Kerner, 21 Ont. W. Rep. 477, 3 Dominion L. Rep. 11, 3 Ont. W. N. 769; Alexander v. Herman, 21 Ont. W. Rep. 461, 2 Dominion L. Rep. 239, 3 O. W. N. 755. See also Thomas Hinds Lodge, etc. v. Fayette Presbyterian Church, 103 Miss. 130, 60 So. 66. Thus in Rex v. St. Catharines Hydraulic Co. supra, the court said that it has been held "almost uniformly against the insertion in the renewal lease of such a covenant unless the language used in the contract expressly or by very clear implication showed such was the intention of the parties." And in Sadlier v. Biggs, 4 H. L. Cas. (Eng.) 435, the court said that the intention to renew perpetually must be clear from the language of the lease and that the fact that several renewals had been granted was not admissible to explain the intention. But though the courts may dislike perpetual renewals, yet such renewals are not void, and the law is now settled that if the parties clearly express in the covenant their intention to renew perpetually, it will be so construed and enforced. Bridges v. Hitchcock, 5 Br. P. C. (Eng.) 6; Furnival v. Crew, 3 Atk. (Eng.) 83; Sadlier v. Biggs, 4 H. L. Cas. (Eng.) 435; Wynn v. Conway Corp. [1914] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 705 [1914] W. N. 332, 78 J. P. 380, 30 Times L. Rep. 666, 59 Sol. J. 43. And see the reported case. See also Atkinson v. Pillsworth, 1 Ridg. P. C. (Eng.) 440; Palmer v. Hamilton, 2 Ridg. P. C. (Eng.) 550; Sheppard v. Doolan, 3 Dr. & War. (Eng.) 1, 5 Ir. Eq. 6; Chambers v. Gausson, 2 Jo. & La. T. (Eng.) 99, 7 Ir. Eq. 575; Hughes v. Public Works Com'rs [1912] 1 Ir. R. 156. Thus in Furnival v. Crew, 3 Atk. (Eng.) 83, it was held that a covenant to renew "from time to time" was a covenant for perpetual renewal, the language meaning "to renew and continue renewing." And in Sheppard v. Doolan, 3 Dr. & War. (Eng.) 1, 5 Ir. Eq. Rep. 6, the court said that while the lease did not contain any technical covenant for renewal, the habendum amounted to a covenant for perpetual renewal.

BARFIELD

v.

SOUTH HIGHLANDS INFIRMARY
ET AL.

Alabama Supreme Court—January 14, 1915.

191 Ala. 553; 63 So. 30.

Hospitals — Liability for Malpractice
by Surgeon.

Where the medical and surgical treatment of a patient in an infirmary and an operation were prescribed and performed by a surgeon under an independent employment by the patient, the infirmary corporation is not liable for his negligence, unskillfulness, or other wrong, though he was a shareholder and officer of the corporation.

[See Ann. Cas. 1915B 1229.]

Depositions — Practice — Notice to Parties of Taking.

Under Code 1907, § 4032, as amended by Acts 1911, p. 487, providing, relative to depositions, that when the testimony is desired under section 4030, subd. 3, authorizing the taking of depositions when the witness resides more than 100 miles from the place of trial or is absent from the state, the testimony may, unless the opposite party makes the affidavit therein prescribed, be taken by interrogatories, that the moving party may file interrogatories, of which and of the residence of the witness and of the commissioner to be appointed he must give the opposite party notice, and that, if thereupon, such opposite party shall make affidavit that in his belief it is material that the testimony of such witness be taken orally, the clerk shall issue a commission to take such testimony by oral examination, provided, however, that in all cases in which testimony is to be taken by interrogatories the party against whom the testimony is proposed to be taken shall, within the time allowed to file cross-interrogatories, have the right to demand reasonable notice of the time and place of taking the testimony and to attend such examination and cross-examine the witnesses orally in all cases where depositions are taken on commissions from the law courts, the party against whom it is proposed to take the testimony within the time for filing cross-interrogatories has a right to demand reasonable notice of the time and place of taking the testimony, and to attend and cross-examine the witnesses orally, though the meaning of the statute is somewhat obscure.

Appeal and Error — Error Not Shown by Record.

Error must be affirmatively shown, and is not shown with respect to the suppression of a deposition on a motion on the ground, among others, that notice of the time and place of taking the deposition was not given, where the evidence on the motion, if any was taken, is not before the Supreme Court and it did not appear that the deposition was not suppressed for lack of compliance with the statute.

Physicians and Surgeons — Malpractice — Evidence — Amount of Charge.

In an action against a surgeon for malpractice, a question asked a witness as to the surgeon's charge for his treatment was properly excluded, the amount of the charge not being in issue, defendant being morally and legally bound to exercise the same degree of care, diligence, and skill whether his charge was large or small, and no inference of wrong or negligence arising from the fact that the charge was unreasonable, especially as his charge was shown by other evidence.

Evidence — Medical Books.

Relevant extracts from medical treatises recognized and approved by the medical profession as standard may be read to the jury in evidence.

[See 19 Ann. Cas. 1002.]

Expert Witness — Cross-Examination — Statements in Medical Books.

In an action for malpractice, it is proper to permit an expert medical witness to be asked on cross-examination whether it is true, as stated in a medical treatise of high authority, that it is not uncommon even in closed fractures of the femur to find gangrene developing because of laceration or pressure, and that early amputation of the thigh above the fracture is necessary in those cases, and should be done early in order to save life, as this is a statement of surgical theory and practice, and the gist of the question is whether the witness' expert opinion concurs with that of the author.

Trial — Leading Questions.

It is within the court's discretion ordinarily to allow leading questions, especially as a question, asked over plaintiff's objection in an action for malpractice, as to whether it is not a fact that "this sort of human disaster" is preventable, led away from, and not to, the desired answer.

Hypothetical Questions — Basis — Facts Subsequently Supplied.

While it is better to defer hypothetical questions asked expert witnesses until evidence of all the facts hypothesized has been offered, where evidence of such facts is subsequently offered and the error is substantially cured, it does not require a reversal.

Appeal — Harmless Error — Admission of Trivial Evidence.

In an action against a surgeon for amputating plaintiff's leg without her consent, where plaintiff intimated that from the time she went to the hospital where she was operated on and was put in defendant's charge she was kept in ignorance of the danger of her condition and deceived as to the measures that would be resorted to for her cure, the admission of testimony for defendant, apparently in answer to this contention, that on the morning she was removed to the hospital defendant told plaintiff's mother, who was making the arrangement for plaintiff, that he "would not guarantee her," but that he would do all he could for plaintiff, relates to a matter of so little significance as not to require a reversal, especially as it is probably competent to rebut the contention that defendant made an agreement or promise to restore plaintiff to health or to save her leg.

Evidence — Hospital Charts.

In an action for malpractice on the part of a surgeon in treating a patient in a hospital, it is not error to permit defendant, while testifying as an expert and giving his opinion on the whole course of treatment administered to plaintiff, to read temperature charts kept by the nurses in the hospital, the authenticity and accuracy of which was fully established and undisputed, this being nothing more than a statement of some of the considerations that influenced his professional judgment respecting the proper treatment to be followed.

[See Ann. Cas. 1916C 78.]

Harmless Error — Proper Answer to Improper Question.

In an action against a surgeon for amputating plaintiff's leg without her consent, where she testified that she was ignorant that it had been amputated for several days after the operation, if a question asked a nurse as to whether plaintiff knew her leg had been amputated is improper as calling for the witness' cognition of the state or operation of plaintiff's mind, it is rendered harmless by her answer that plaintiff would lie there and watch the leg being dressed every time it was dressed, as she stated only cognizable facts.

Admissions and Declarations — Self-Serving Declarations.

In an action against a surgeon for amputating plaintiff's leg without her consent, evidence as to declarations by plaintiff to another doctor about the amputation, and what was said between them relative thereto, and whether the witness knew that defendant sent such doctor to tell plaintiff about her condition is properly excluded, as statements made or things done in the absence of defendant and not brought to his knowledge can have no bearing on his exercise of due care and skill.

Physicians and Surgeons — Malpractice — Admissibility of Evidence.

In an action for amputating plaintiff's leg without her consent and for so negligently and unskillfully treating it as to make its amputation necessary, where there was no suggestion in the declaration or the evidence that defendant was guilty of any negligence or lack of skill in treating plaintiff after the amputation, evidence as to matters occurring after the amputation is properly excluded.

Hospital Charts.

In an action against a surgeon for malpractice in his treatment of a patient in a hospital, charts or records kept by the nurses for the information of the attending physician or surgeon are properly admitted in evidence, though they doubtless signified little to the jury.

[See Ann. Cas. 1916C 78.]

Opinion Evidence — Testimony That Person Appeared Sick.

A graduate and experienced nurse may properly testify that a person appeared to be very sick, and it would seem that any witness of ordinary intelligence might be allowed to so testify.

Expert Evidence — Possibility of Cure.

In an action for malpractice, it is not error to permit experts to answer questions as to whether there was any way known to the medical profession by which a blood clot, "in cases of this sort," could be prevented, on the theory that such testimony transcended the limits of all possible human attainment.

Physicians and Surgeons — Necessity of Consent to Operation.

If a patient was incapacitated to consent to the amputation of a leg, and if the necessity therefore was extremely urgent to save her life, a surgeon treating her had a right to consult with her mother and to act upon her mother's consent as the implied consent of the patient; and hence, where there was evidence of these facts, it was not error to admit evidence, in an action for malpractice, that the mother consented and stated that the patient had consented.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In an action against a surgeon for amputating plaintiff's leg without her consent, evidence that plaintiff's mother and a nurse told defendant that plaintiff was willing to have the leg amputated, though falling in the general class of hearsay, is admissible as bearing upon defendant's good faith.

[See note at end of this case.]

Trial — Restriction of Testimony — Discretion.

It is within the court's power and discretion, for the purpose of keeping the examination of witnesses on collateral issues within the bonds of reason and convenience, to exclude questions asked expert witnesses, based on a state of facts finding no support in the evidence, though such questions are asked on cross-examination.

Physicians and Surgeons — Malpractice — Evidence as to Experience.

Where a surgeon sued for malpractice testified as an expert, evidence as to his age, the extent of his practice, and his place of residence and other similar matters is admissible, as the jury were entitled to be informed of his opportunities for observation and experience in his line, and to know what manner of man he was, and it was immaterial that testimony as to these matters was given by another witness rather than by defendant.

Evidence — Medical Books.

Objections to extracts from scientific medical works introduced in evidence were properly overruled, though there was no proof that they were works of authority and standing with the medical profession, where the objections did not point out this lack of proof, as the deficiency might have been supplied or the extracts excluded had the point been raised.

[See 19 Ann. Cas. 1002.]

Physicians and Surgeons — Necessity of Consent to Operation.

Where a patient voluntarily submits to an operation by making no objection, though she knows it is about to be performed, her consent thereto will be presumed, unless it is made reasonably clear that she was the victim of a false and fraudulent representation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In an action against a surgeon for amputating plaintiff's leg without her consent, an instruction, justifying the amputation without plaintiff's affirmative consent if an emergency demanding the operation, and "not produced by defendant," existed, sufficiently excludes an emergency superinduced by defendant's own negligence or lack of skill, or voluntarily brought on by him, where plaintiff did not consider the matter of sufficient importance to call the court's attention directly to the supposed deficiency.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In an action against a surgeon for amputating plaintiff's leg without her consent, where it was admitted that plaintiff refused for a long time to consent, but defendant's testimony tended to show that she freely consented shortly before the operation, an instruction that, if she was in imminent danger of losing her life, and was advised to have her leg amputated to save her life, it was her right and privilege to refuse to consent, and if she did refuse, and defendant cut off the leg without her consent, it was wrongful, is misleading, and properly refused.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Such instruction is also properly refused because it ignored evidence tending to show that she was wholly incapacitated to consent, justifying defendant in acting upon a consent to be implied on considerations of custom, humanity, and reason.

[See note at end of this case.]

Physicians and Surgeons — Malpractice — Evidence — Failure of Another to Cure.

In an action against a surgeon for amputating plaintiff's leg without her consent, and for so negligently and unskillfully treating it as to make its amputation necessary, the fact that another physician or surgeon had failed in an attempt to treat the leg is proper for the consideration of the jury on the question of defendant's alleged negligence and the alleged wrongful amputation, and an instruction that such fact, if it was a fact, should not be considered is properly refused.

Degree of Responsibility.

Unless so provided by an express contract, a physician or surgeon does not warrant that he will effect a cure, or that he will restore the patient to the same condition as before the necessity for treatment arose, or that the result of the treatment will be successful.

[See 1 Ann. Cas. 21,306; 14 Ann. Cas. 605; 93 Am. St. Rep. 657.]

Same.

A physician or surgeon, possessing the requisite qualifications and applying his skill and judgment with ordinary care and diligence to the diagnosis and treatment of the patient, is not liable for an honest mistake or error of judgment in making a diagnosis or prescribing a mode of treatment, where there is ground for reasonable doubt as to the practice to be pursued.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from City Court of Birmingham:
FERGUSON, Judge.

Action for damages. Josephine Barfield, plaintiff, and South Highlands Infirmary et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. AFFIRMED.

[557] The fifth assignment of error is as follows: "The court erred in overruling plaintiff's objection to the question, 'Is it not a fact that this sort of human disaster is preventable, in your opinion and judgment as a physician?'"

Assignment 7 is to overruling plaintiff's objections to the following questions: "Is it true that in case of a fracture of the femur, if a vein has been compressed by a displaced fragment of the bone, causing thrombosis, the resulting gangrene of the wound occurs?"

"Doctor, taking into consideration your knowledge of the history of this case, the kind of injury that was caused, fracture, its proximity to the blood vessel, or the probability of it impinging or resting upon a blood vessel, resting upon the fracture, and taking into consideration all that you know about the case of your own knowledge, as testified to by you, and the fact that several weeks afterward, while she was still in the infirmary under the treatment of Dr. Prince, mortification began to set in in the leg; suppose the foot became cold; no pulsation in the vessel; green spots began to appear on different parts of the limbs—what, in your opinion, was the cause of that condition?"

Assignment 8 refers to the answer to the question: "I should say she lost her limb from a gangrene or death of the limb; that would be my answer."

Assignments of error 17 to 29, inclusive, have reference, first, to declarations made by plaintiff to Dr. Jordan about the amputation, and what he said, and what she said relative thereto, and whether or not witness [558] knew that Dr. Prince sent Dr. Jordan in to tell her about her condition.

Assignments 43 and 44 are the same, as follows: Is there any way known to the medical profession by which a blood clot in cases of this sort can be prevented?

Assignment 75 sets forth: "Miss Gossett came down and said, 'Miss Josephine says she is willing to have her leg cut off.' (Objection by plaintiff.)"

Assignment 47: "The court erred in overruling plaintiff's objection to the question, 'Did she know that her leg had been amputated?'"

The charge made the basis of assignment 101 is as follows: "If you find from the evidence in this case that plaintiff was in imminent danger of losing her life by reason of an infected or dislocated leg, and was advised by Dr. Prince to have her leg amputated to save her life, I charge you that it was her right and privilege to refuse to give her consent to the amputation, and if she did refuse to give her consent, it was wrongful."

The court gave the following charges for defendant: "(1) If a patient voluntarily submits to an operation, her consent thereto will be presumed.

"(2) Unless it is so provided by an express contract, a physician or surgeon does not warrant that he will effect a cure, or that he will restore the patient to the same condition as before the necessity for treatment arose, or that the result of the treatment will be successful.

"(3) A physician or surgeon possessing the requisite qualifications and applying his skill and judgment with ordinary care and diligence to the diagnosis and treatment of the patient is not liable for an honest mistake or error of judgment in making a diagnosis or prescribing [559] a mode of treatment, where there is ground for reasonable doubt as to the practice to be pursued."

Allen & Bell for appellant.

Cabaniss & Bowie for appellees.

SAYRE, J.—Plaintiff (appellant) brought her action against defendants, a surgeon and an incorporated infirmary where the surgeon operated, alleging: (1) That defendants, wrongfully, intentionally, and without her consent amputated one of her legs; and (2) that they so negligently and unskillfully treated one of her legs, which had been accidentally broken and injured, as to make its amputation necessary. From a verdict and judgment for defendants, plaintiff has appealed.

(1) On the undisputed evidence the defendant corporation was entitled to the general charge which it requested and received. The medical and surgical treatment and operation were prescribed and performed by the defendant Prince under an independent employment by plaintiff, and Prince, though he was a shareholder and officer of defendant corporation, in treating and operating upon plaintiff acted not at all as the agent of the said corporation nor within the line and scope of his authority as an officer. Beyond question or doubt any negligence, unskillfulness, or other wrong, if any there was, was his wrong, and for it he alone was responsible.—Robinson v. Crotwell, 175 Ala. 194, 57 So. 23. Such being the case, other assignments of error bearing alone upon the alleged liability of defendant corporation need not be considered.

(2,3) On defendant's motion the deposition of Frances J. Barfield was suppressed, and this ruling is assigned for error. We do not feel sure that we are in [560] a position to pass upon this assignment intelligently. We have before us the deposition in narrative form, the grounds of the motion, one of which was that notice of the time and place of taking the deposition was not given to defendants, the court's ruling, and an exception reserved in due form. If any evidence was taken on the motion, we have it not before us. We are left to infer the ground upon which the court acted, though it is proper to assume that the court acted upon some one of the grounds assigned for the motion. The statute on this subject has by amendments (Acts Sp. Sess. 1909, p. 168; Acts 1911, p. 487) been reduced to a state of obscurity and confusion in some respects. Our judgment is that the last proviso to section 4032 of the Code, as amended by the act of 1911, intends that in all cases where depositions are taken on commissions from the law courts, that is, in all cases provided for by section 4030, the party against whom it is proposed to take such testimony shall, within the time allowed for the filing of cross-interrogatories, have the right to demand reasonable notice of the time and place of taking the testimony and to attend the examination when and where had, and cross-examine the witness or witnesses orally. For aught appearing the deposition was suppressed for lack of compliance with the requirement of this statute as to notice. Error must be affirmatively shown. Appellant has failed to show error in the ruling under examination.

(4) There was no error in refusing to allow plaintiff, on the examination of her witness Dr. Whelan, to have an answer to the question: "Did you know how much Dr. Prince charged for what he did for this girl?"—referring to plaintiff. Prima facie this question was inadmissible. The amount of the charge was not in issue. Defendant was morally and legally bound to exercise [561] the same degree of care, diligence, and skill whether his charge was large or small. The fact that the charge was unreasonable—assuming that plaintiff may have been able to prove it so—afforded no inference of wrong or negligence. It may be stated further, though we are entirely satisfied with the ground of the ruling already announced, that later in the progress of the trial plaintiff had a statement of the charge that appears to have been accepted without challenge.

(5, 6) Some courts hold differently, but this court has long entertained the opinion that relevant extracts from medical treatises, recognized and approved by the medical profession as standard, may be read to the jury in evidence.—Stoudenmeier v. Williamson, 29 Ala. 558; Bales v. State, 63 Ala. 30. Appellant's real complaint at this point seems to be that defendant was allowed, on cross-examination, to ask Dr. Whelan, an expert medical witness, whether it was true, as stated in Scudder's Treatment of Fractures, a work shown to be of high authority, that "It is not very uncommon, even in closed fractures of the femur, to find gangrene of the leg developing because of laceration or pressure upon the great vessels of the limb. Early amputation of the thigh just above the fracture will be necessary in these cases. It should be done early in order to save life."

This was a statement of surgical theory and practice, made in the abstract, but strictly relevant to the concrete case sought to be shown by plaintiff. The gist of the question was whether the witness' expert opinion concurred with that of the author. Defendant was entitled to the answer.—Stoudenmeier v. Williamson, supra. This ruling in principle disposes of several of the assignments of error.

[562] (7) It seems scarcely necessary to linger over appellant's fifth assignment of error. If the question was put in exactly the form shown in the bill of exceptions, it was leading. But it led away from, not to, the answer desired, and, anyhow, it was within the court's discretion ordinarily to allow a leading question. The witness was competent, the expert opinion called for was relevant, and there was no error.

(8) Assignments 7 and 8 cannot be sustained. Some of the facts hypothesized in these questions, seeking to elicit an expert opinion, had not been proved. It would have been better practice to defer the questions until evidence of all the hypothesized facts had been offered, as it was at a later stage of the case; but errors of this sort cannot be allowed to work a reversal where, as here, they have been substantially cured.

(9) Plaintiff testified that her limb had been removed without her knowledge or consent, over her protest indeed. She seems to intend to convey the idea, though it is hinted rather than asserted, that from the time she went to the infirmary where defendant Prince operated and was put in his charge she was kept in ignorance of the danger of her condition and deceived as to the measures that would be resorted to for her cure. To answer this, probably, defendant was permitted to show by the nurse that on the morning of plaintiff's removal to the infirmary defendant had said to plaintiff's mother, who was making the arrangement for plaintiff, that "he would not guarantee her, but he would do all he could for Miss Josephine," the plaintiff. If this testimony tended to prove anything at all, it was, in view of the intimations of plaintiff's evidence to which we have referred, probably competent for the purpose for which it was admitted in the trial court, viz., to rebut the contention that defendant made any agreement [563] or promise that he would restore the plaintiff to health or save her leg. Otherwise, taken at its worst, it was nothing more than a commonplace of so little significance that it would be a travesty to set aside the result of the trial in this case on this ground.

(10) Defendant, testifying in his own behalf, after consulting the fever charts that had been kept by the nurses, was allowed to state what those charts showed at various places in respect of the patient's temperature. It was, however, made perfectly clear—this witness made it clear—that he was not testifying to the historical accuracy of the figures, or, for that matter, testifying at all; he was merely reading the undisputed record prepared by the nurses and already before the jury. This was not the violation of any rule of evidence; it was merely a matter of practice which in the case of an ordinary witness would be pronounced bad, and; if it appeared probable that it led to results of any account, might induce a reversal. But the witness was not an ordinary witness; he was an expert, entitled to state his opinions on the technical questions involved, was in effect giving his opinion on the whole course of treatment administered to plaintiff, and his reference to the temperature charts here in question—the authenticity and historical accuracy of which, we may add, was fully established and undisputed—read in connection with the rest of his examination, appear to have amounted to nothing more than statements of some of the considerations that influenced his professional judgment from time to time in respect of the proper treatment to be followed. We find no grounds for reversal in this.

(11) Plaintiff had testified that she was ignorant of the amputation of her leg for several days after it had [564] been done, this in support of her claim that the operation had been performed without her knowledge or the consent she at one time refused to give. Defendant was allowed to ask the nurse in charge whether plaintiff knew her leg had been amputated. If, according to the narrow rule that has been sometimes here enforced, the question asking for the witness' cognition of the state or operation of plain-tiff's mind was improper, its consequence as error was relieved by the answer which stated only cognizable facts. The witness answered: The patient would lay there and watch her limb being dressed every time it was dressed.

(12, 13) Appellant's assignments of error numbered 17 to 29, both inclusive, are treated together under one head in the briefs. It seems enough to say that statements made or things done in the absence of defendant should not have been allowed to affect a finding as to his exercise of due care and skill unless brought to his knowledge. Another reason, applicable to several of the matters plaintiff here sought to get before the jury, and conducing to the same result, is that they are shown by the proposed questions to have occurred after the amputation, and we are unable to find in the declaration or evidence any intimation that defendant was guilty of any negligence or lack of skill in treating plaintiff after the amputation. As for plaintiff's declaration, before the operation, that she would rather die than have her leg cut off, it may be said, further, that there was no denial, but that plaintiff long persisted in her refusal to have the operation performed. Defendant himself testified to that. The only question at issue in this connection was whether within an hour or two before amputation plaintiff did consent after being informed that she would forfeit her life by a refusal. [565] Some of these exceptions may be answered on other legal grounds. We find no reversible error here.

(14) The charts or records kept by the nurses were kept for the information of the attending physician or surgeon. Everything in them was proper for his information. They were duly proved. Defendant had a right to consider them in determining his treatment, and the jury were properly allowed to have these charts before them as part of the evidence in the case, though doubtless they signified little to any but the skilled professional mind.

(15) We think any witness of ordinary intelligence may be allowed to testify that a person appeared to be very sick; certainly a graduate and experienced nurse, as Miss Gossett was, may so testify.

(16) For the reason that much space and a wealth of illustration, drawn from sacred and profane sources other than law books, have been devoted to a discussion of the forty-third and forty-fourth assignments of error, we linger over these assignments long enough to say that we are unwilling to conclude, as matter of law or fact, that Dr. Moore, shown to be an expert, transcended the limits of all possible human attainment when he testified that there was no way known to medical science to prevent thrombosis in a case of the sort. It is safe to say the doctor knew more of that subject than we do. He was entitled to give his opinion, and the objection went only to its credibility.

(17) Conversation between defendant and plaintiff's mother in which the latter is said to have stated that her daughter had consented, and that it was all right to go ahead and cut off her limb, this immediately after she had been told that her daughter had consented and had consulted with her daughter for the purpose, as the jury were well authorized to infer, of confirming that [566] report as to her daughter's state of mind. If the mother's deposition had not been excluded, this evidence would have been admissible for impeachment. It was competent anyhow. It scarcely need be debated that plaintiff, if capable of intelligent consideration of the question involved, had the absolute moral and legal right to determine the issue for herself, as defendant contends on the strength of his evidence she in fact did, and an operation of this capital character, performed without regard to her wishes in such case, could not be justified in any forum of law or conscience. But considering plaintiff's contention as to her condition at the time of her alleged consent, the evidence as to which on the part of plaintiff she seems to overlook in her argument for a reversal on this point, considering the incapacity she claims to have labored under at the time, and the extreme urgency of the case as shown by the expert evidence, if believed, it was proper for defendant to consult with the mother—and not conceivably improper in any event—and to act upon her consent as the implied consent of plaintiff.—Mohr v. Williams, 95 Minn. 261, 104 N. W. 12, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 439, 111 Am. St. Rep. 462, 5 Ann. Cas. 303; Bakker v. Welsh, 144 Mich. 632, 108 N. W. 94, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 612, 8 Ann. Cas. 195; Luka v. Lowrie, 171 Mich. 122, 136 N. W. 1106, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 290.

(18) There is an even more obviously sufficient response to the exception last above noted and to the seventy-fifth assignment of error in which appellant complains that the court admitted the testimony of defendant that "Miss Gossett came down and said 'Miss Josephine says she is willing to have her leg cut off.'" Under the circumstances which have appeared, no negligence could be charged to defendant in accepting this statement and that of plaintiff's mother as expressing [567] the true state of plaintiff's mind; at least these statements, though falling in the general class of hearsay, went a part of the way towards demonstrating defendant's good faith in performing the operation which plaintiff charged, inter alia, was performed without her knowledge or consent.

If it be conceded that there was technical error in allowing the question made the subject of the forty-seventh assignment of error, its capacity for harm to plaintiff's case was cured by the witness' statement of the facts on which he based his knowledge of plaintiff's cognition, so that the jury were fully informed of the worth of the testimony, and must be presumed to have given it proper weight.

(19) We have not had our attention called to any authorities sustaining appellant's contention that it was error, even on cross-examination, to deny parties the privilege of asking for an expert opinion on a state of facts finding no support in the evidence. Such questions may, at times, serve a proper purpose, but our opinion is that there is no reversible error in refusing such a test of an expert opinion, for the process involved must, of necessity, depend upon the court's power and discretion to keep the examination of witnesses on collateral issues within the bounds of reason and convenience. This, we think, will answer several of the assignments of error.

(20) Defendant was also a witness, qualified as an expert on the questions involved. The jury were entitled, in a general way, to be informed of his opportunities for observation and experience in his line, and in general to know what manner of man he was. Within this rule, without prejudice to plaintiff's case, and without conveying any intimation that such conditions affected the rule of due care, the jury might be given to [568] understand whether defendant was young or old, did a large practice or none at all, resided in Birmingham or Toad Vine, and other like things, and we do not see that it makes any difference in principles that inquiries to this end were directed to another witness rather than to the defendant himself. It is common practice to introduce a witness with inquiries of this character, though they be of slight or no importance as decisive factors in the case.

(21) As to some of the objections taken to scientific medical works, extracts from which were introduced in evidence by defendant, notably Transactions of the Medical Association of Alabama, it appears that there was no proof that they were works of authority and standing with the medical profession. The objections were of the utmost generality and did not point to this deficiency. No doubt the deficiency would have been supplied, or the extracts excluded, had the objections taken the point.

(22) Defendant could not, of course, compel plaintiff to submit to an operation; but if she voluntarily submitted to the operation, that is, knew it was about to be performed and made no objection, her consent was to be presumed, unless she was the victim of a false and fraudulent representation; this last a fact to be made reasonably clear in the evidence. The trial court in effect so charged the jury, and in this there was no error.—State v. Housekeeper, 70 Md. 162, 16 Atl. 382, 2 L.R.A. 587, 14 Am. St. Rep. 340.

(23) It is urged that in one part of the oral charge the court allowed the jury to justify defendant's amputation of plaintiff's limb without her consent, if she did not affirmatively consent, on the ground that there may have existed an emergency demanding the operation, although such emergency may have been superinduced by [569] his own negligence or lack of skill, or may have been voluntarily brought on by him. The charge, its parts relating to this question construed together, is not fairly open to this criticism. When the court finally came to a statement of the effect of the emergency doctrine on the conclusion to be reached, it postulated an emergency "not produced by the defendant." This might have been amplified into verbiage meeting specifically the criticism visited upon the charge in appellant's brief, but unless appellant considered the matter of importance enough to call the court's attention directly to the supposed deficiency, the court's general statement must be held to have sufficed.

(24, 25) The charge made the subject of assignment 101 was refused without error. It was misleading. It did not adequately state the case. Plaintiff did refuse for a long time to submit to the loss of her limb. The charge was so framed as that the jury may have been led to believe that this fact was conclusive against defendant's right to amputate. But defendant's testimony was that at the last moment she did freely consent, and the situation at that time determined defendant's right and duty in the premises. A fair statement of the applicable law would have taken some account of this consideration. Besides, this and other instructions refused to plaintiff postulated defendant's liability upon the hypothesis that plaintiff did not consent. The argument for error in the matter of these rulings overlooks plaintiff's contention that she was wholly incapacitated to consent. If that were the case, defendant may have been justified in acting upon a consent, not actually given, but to be implied on considerations of custom, humanity, and reason, as the authorities to which we have heretofore referred and many others amply demonstrate. These charges were properly refused because they omitted [570] any statement of the law of this aspect of the case.

(26) There was no error in the court's refusal to instruct the jury that in determining defendant's liability they should not consider the fact, if it was a fact, that another surgeon or physician had made a failure in an attempt to treat plaintiff's leg, and had made it probable that plaintiff would lose her life if the leg was not amputated. The charge was manifestly wrong. It occurs to us that the facts hypothesized were necessary to be considered in passing upon the question of defendant's alleged negligence in the treatment of the case and his alleged wrong in amputating the leg. Plaintiff had been under treatment for her injury for two months before she came under defendant's care. She had been in the care of an expert physician and surgeon as plaintiff was at pains to prove. And yet there was in the evidence room for the inference that the medical man first called was discharged, and defendant retained, because no relief had been afforded. These facts and the probability hypothesized in defendant's statement of the case it was necessary to consider in determining whether the result of which plaintiff complained may not have been brought about by a course of treatment over which defendant had no control and the effects of which no skill or care on his part could have obviated. Of course, we speak not of our view of the facts, but only of the case made by tendencies of the evidence and the concessions of plaintiff's requested charge.

Several charges refused to defendant proceed upon the idea that the amputation was wrongful, and that therefore plaintiff was entitled to damages, if it was done without her consent, and seem to premit the emergency theory of consent. These charges, in view of tendencies of the evidence, should have given a definition of consent as containing the consent, in a proper [571] case of emergency, of plaintiff's family, her mother, for example, in this case, and without this they had a misleading tendency. Some of them were misleading also as apparently basing plaintiff's right to recover on her dissent expressed before the emergency arose, or before the assent she finally gave when confronted with the alternative of amputation or death.

(27, 28) Charges given on defendant's request, defining the degree of care required of physicians and surgeons in the treatment of their patients, were evidently based on our cases. They state the law of our cases as it may be read in McDonald v. Harris, 131 Ala. 359, 31 So. 548; Shelton v. Haelip, 167 Ala. 217, 51 So. 937; Hamrick v. Shipp, 169 Ala. 171, 52 So. 932; Carpenter v. Walker, 170 Ala. 659, 54 So. 60, Ann. Cas. 1912D 863; Robinson v. Crotwell, 175 Ala. 194, 57 So. 23.

We believe proper and careful attention has been given to all of the 118 assignments of errors found in the record, though not all of them have been made the subject of specific statement. Thus working our way through the record from first to last, making occasionally, perhaps, statements of our consideration reaching beyond the limits of necessity or profit, we have found no error for which we can think the judgment in this case should be reversed.

NOTE.

Consent as Affecting Right to Perform Surgical Operation.

Introductory, 1105.

Consent of Patient, 1105.

Consent of Parent to Operation on Child, 1107.

Introductory.

The earlier cases discussing the necessity of a surgeon's obtaining the consent of his patient before performing an operation, are collated in the notes to Mohr v. Williams, 5 Ann. Cas. 303, and Gillette v. Tucker, 93 Am. St. Rep. 639. This note reviews the recent cases.

Consent of Patient.

Where a person is in full possession of all his mental faculties and in such physical health as to be able to enter into a consultation with respect to the necessity of an operation, and where no emergency exists making it impracticable to confer with him, his consent is a prerequisite to the performance of a surgical operation on him. Pratt v. Davis, 224 Ill. 300, 8 Ann. Cas. 197, 79 N. W. 562, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 609.

Consent to an operation does not ordinarily authorize any other or different operation than that consented to. Rolater v. Strain, 39 Okla. 572, 137 Pac. 96, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 880. In that case it appeared that the patient consented to an operation consisting of an incision in her toe for the purpose of drawing an inflamed joint. In performing the operation a sesamoid bone was removed. The court said: "It is not denied that this bone was removed, and it is not contended that the defendant in error consented to its removal. The plaintiff in error denies that he undertook the operation with the understanding that no bones were to be removed, but the defendant in error testifies that such was the agreement, and in this she is supported by the testimony of her mother and a sister. This evidence was sufficient to take this question to the jury. It is argued by the plaintiff in error that, even if the contract was made as contended, the sesamoid bone was not within the contemplation of the parties, and that its removal, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, was not a violation of the terms of the agreement, and that the jury should have been instructed to bring in a verdict for the plaintiff in error.

An attempt is made in the brief to distinguish Mohr v. Williams, 95 Minn. 261, 104 N. W. 12, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 439, 111 Am. St. Rep. 462, 5 Ann. Cas. 303, from the case at bar, inasmuch as in that case the patient consented to an operation on the left ear, and it was performed on the right ear, while in this, the consent was to the operation upon the right foot, where it was performed. However, the operation was not performed in the manner agreed upon and in the manner consented to by the patient, and, as a matter of fact, the actual operation performed was without her consent. There can be no real distinction between the cases in principle. The same rule of law is applicable to each. It follows from this authority and upon reason and principle that if the contract was made between the patient and surgeon, that the patient had the right to insist upon a strict performance of it, that the removal of the sesamoid bone by the surgeon was without the consent of the patient, and was therefore unlawful and wrongful, and constituted a trespass upon her person." Referring to a contention that the operation was justified by an emergency the court continued: "The operation itself was not designated by any of the expert witnesses as a major operation. It was represented by the plaintiff in error that it was of slight consequence, and that it would not be necessary for the patient to remain in his hospital over 24 or 48 hours at the outside, and he testified, as to the time taken to perform the operation, that 'I suppose the time I occupied in doing that was possibly 15 or 20 minutes, the actual work that completed the operation.' We would not hold under this evidence, as a matter of law, that there was such an emergency existing as authorized the surgeon to proceed in this operation, after the discovery of this bone in an unusual and unexpected place, as to authorize him to remove it without the consent of the patient. As to whether or not such an emergency existed was a question of fact under the evidence for the jury. If the jury found that the necessity which authorized the surgeon to proceed to remove this bone without the consent did not exist, then his doing so was wrongful and unlawful, and he is liable for whatever injury resulted to the patient from such unauthorized act."

In Robinson v. Crotwell, 175 Ala. 194, 57 So. 23, in holding that the evidence did not support the contention of the plaintiff that a dangerous operation had been performed on him without his consent, instead of a minor operation to which he had consented, the court said: "In one aspect of his case, plaintiff claimed that defendant caused a dangerous operation to be performed upon him, after assuring him that the operation to be performed would be a mere trifle, as operations go, and would involve no serious consequences. As has been stated, the operation not only failed to relieve plaintiff's ailment, but left behind injurious consequences of its own. If plaintiff's contention in this regard be true, and it had support in his testimony, defendant's conduct would seem to be indefensible. The cases so hold."

While the patient's consent is a necessary prerequisite to the performance of a surgical operation, in the absence of an emergency which renders it impracticable to confer with the patient, it seems that a surgeon is justified in performing an operation to which the consent of the patient may be inferred or implied from the evidence and circumstances of the case. Van Meter v. Crews, 149 Ky. 335, 148 S. W. 40; Zoterell v. Repp (Mich.) 153 N. W. 692; Mosslander v. Armstrong, 90 Neb. 774, 134 N. W. 922. And see the reported case. In the case first cited it appeared that a physician told a patient (the plaintiff) that he was not satisfied with the examination he had made at his office and would like her to go to the hospital where he could make the examination more satisfactorily. She went to the hospital and there, after the usual preparations had been made and several of her relatives had been summoned, she was placed under an anaesthetic and an operation performed which consisted in his taking out one of the ovaries and making an adjustment of the other, which operation she claimed was performed without her consent. The court said: "The evidence heard on the trial tends very strongly to show that though the plaintiff was averse to the operation it was understood by her, and her relatives who were summoned to the hospital and consulted, that if upon the examination by the doctor it was found that an operation was necessary, he would perform it while she was under the anaesthetic. Both her uncle and her brother were sent for and the matter was discussed carefully, not only with them but with her; and while there is some conflict in the testimony there was evidence warranting the jury to conclude that the doctor understood, and had the right to understand, from all that passed between him and the plaintiff, that he was to perform the operation while she was under the anaesthetic if upon the examination he found this necessary. . . . The court should have told the jury that if the defendant understood and had reasonable grounds to understand, from the words or conduct of the plaintiff, that she was willing for the operation to be performed while she was under the anaesthetic if upon his examination he found the operation to be necessary and he so performed it, then he had the right to perform the operation as by her consent." In Bennan v. Parsonnet, 83 N. J. L. 20, 83 Atl. 948, it appeared that a surgeon had his patient's consent to an operation for a rupture in the left groin. After the anaesthetic was administered the physician discovered a more serious rupture of the right groin, which he and the assisting surgeons agreed was a serious menace to the patient's life. The more serious rupture was operated on, instead of that for which the patient's consent had been obtained. Holding that no recovery could be had against the surgeon, the court said: "The condition for the cure of which the plaintiff applied to the defendant was rupture; he is therefore presumed to have contemplated all of the risks incident to an operation for such a condition. Now, rupture is simply a protrusion of the intestine. Whether it occurs on the right side or on the left the intestine is the same, the muscular wall is the same, the operation is the same, and its dangers and the risks are the same. In the present case it is not conceivable that if the plaintiff had known that at the same risk and with the same absence of expense he could by the contemplated operation be relieved of a condition that seriously threatened his life and health he would not have assented to it or that he would not have relied upon the judgment and have acted upon the advice of the surgeon who was so kindly disposed towards him. Under these circumstances the operation that was performed was not in any true sense against the will of the patient or in any legal sense an operation of a different sort from that which the plaintiff had consented to undergo. The trial judge was therefore right in admitting the evidence and in sending the case to the jury, the fact that the proper question was not left to them being amply explained by his having followed the reputable authority to which reference has been made. The question, however, is one to be settled not by authority but by reason, and its importance is such that it touches at a vital point the interests of the entire public, any member of which may at any time suffer in life or health by the establishment of a rule that will paralyze the judgment of the surgeon and require him to withhold his skill and wisdom at the very juncture when they are most needed, and when, could the patient have been consulted, he would manifestly have insisted upon their being exercised in his behalf. This concluding suggestion may perhaps be ethical rather than legal, but it does seem that in good morals a patient ought not, in his efforts to obtain a money verdict, be permitted to repudiate the sound judgment exercised in his behalf by the surgeon of his choice in whose judgment, had he been capable of being consulted, he would unquestionably have concurred."

In Edwards v. Roberts, 12 Ga. App. 140, 76 S. E. 1054, under a statute (Civ. Code 1910, sec. 4427) declaring that "a person professing to practice surgery . . . must bring to the exercise of his profession a reasonable degree of care and skill;" and that "any injury resulting from a want of such care and skill will be a tort for which a recovery may be had," it was held that a petition in the suit of a woman against a physician and surgeon, to recover damages for alleged malpractice, was not subject to general demurrer, the petition alleging, in substance, that the defendant had made an unskillful and improper diagnosis of her physical condition; that following this incorrect diagnosis he removed her left ovary, although it was not diseased, and its removal, in whole or in part, was unnecessary and against her expressed desire; that this removal of the ovary was due to his want of knowledge and skill as a surgeon, and to his reckless disregard of her health.

Consent of Parent to Operation on Child.

In the absence of an emergency, it has been held that a physician must obtain the consent of the parents of a child before performing an operation on it. Rishworth v. Moss (Tex.) 159 S. W. 122. In that case a physician was held to be liable to the parents of a child who died as the result of an operation for adenoids. It appeared that the child, who was eleven years of age, was taken to the physician by an adult sister, and that the operation was undertaken without notice to the parents who never consented thereto. The court said: "A child of tender years being incapable of legally consenting to the administration of an anaesthetic and a surgical operation, consent must be obtained from the person clothed with authority to consent by the law, which would be the parent or guardian, in case there be such person. Under the circumstances of this case, the sister, whether adult or otherwise, would have no more authority by virtue of such relationship than would any other person, and it was fundamental error upon the part of the court to instruct the jury that the presence of the elder sister, as a matter of law, justified the physicians in performing the operation. The parents were easily accessible by telephone or telegraph, and there was no emergency."

But where an emergency exists, it has been held that a surgeon may operate without first obtaining the consent of the child or of its parents. Luka v. Lowrie, 171 Mich. 122, 136 N. W. 1106, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 290, wherein the following facts appeared: "The plaintiff, a boy 15 years of age, while crossing the Michigan Central Railroad track, was knocked down by an engine and in some manner, not clearly shown, was thrown under the wheels of a car. His left foot was mangled and crushed. There was a compound disarticulation of the bones of the foot, and one of the principal bones of the arch, the 'scaphoid' bone, was torn away entirely, the flesh was crushed and torn from the top of the foot, leaving the muscles, ligaments, and bones exposed. The plaintiff testified: 'I could see the bones sticking out. I could see they weren't broken. Don't know how many bones were sticking out; around four or five, something like that.' Shortly after his injury, plaintiff was removed to Harper Hospital in an ambulance. He was partially conscious upon his arrival and was able to communicate his name and the name of the street upon which he lived to the attending surgeons. Within 10 or 15 minutes after his arrival, he lapsed into a comatose condition, and later into complete unconsciousness. Efforts to revive him by injections of strychnine and infusion of a saline solution were made, but he remained unconscious until after the operation. Soon after his arrival at the hospital, at 10:15 A. M., plaintiff's foot was examined by four house physicians connected with the hospital. They concluded that prompt surgical treatment was necessary and telephoned to defendant, who is assistant surgeon of the Michigan Central Railroad. Defendant arrived at the hospital at 10:45 A. M. Upon examining the plaintiff, he found him unconscious, with a weak pulse and dilated pupils. The foot was found to be cold and dead, the circulation having been interrupted. Defendant testified that he learned from the house surgeon the boy's name and residence street. With reference to the residence, he knew the distance from Harper Hospital and the time it would take to get from there to the hospital; that he inquired of the house surgeon if any one, any relatives, were present, and was informed that no person was present whatever. After consultation with the four house physicians, it was agreed by all that an immediate amputation was necessary to save the plaintiff's life. The foot was amputated, and the plaintiff recovered." The plaintiff claimed that his foot should not have been amputated at all, and particularly that it should not have been amputated without first obtaining his consent or the consent of his parents, who went to the hospital as soon as possible after learning of the accident. The court said: "There is nothing in this record to indicate that, had the parents of plaintiff been present at the operating table, they would have refused their consent to the operation. Indeed, it is inconceivable that such consent would have been withheld in the face of the determination of five duly qualified physicians and surgeons that it was necessary to save the plaintiff's life. But defendant testifies, and in this he is not contradicted, that he made inquiry for relatives of the plaintiff and was told that none was in the hospital. Suppose that his informant was in error (which is not certain), the defendant had a right to rely upon the information and to act in the emergency upon the theory that to obtain consent was impracticable. . . . The fact that surgeons are called upon daily, in all our large cities, to operate instantly in emergency cases in order that life may be preserved, should be considered. Many small children are injured upon the streets in large cities. To hold that a surgeon must wait until perhaps he may be able to secure the consent of the parents before giving to the injured one the benefit of his skill and learning, to the end that life may be preserved, would, we believe, result in the loss of many lives which might otherwise be saved. It is not to be presumed that competent surgeons will wantonly operate, nor that they will fail to obtain the consent of parents to operations where such consent may be reasonably obtained in view of the exigency. Their work, however, is highly humane and very largely charitable in character, and no rule should be announced which would tend in the slightest degree to deprive sufferers of the benefit of their services."

In Bakker v. Welsh, 144 Mich. 632, 8 Ann. Cas. 195, 108 N. W. 94, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 612, it was held that, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, a surgeon performing an operation on an infant with the infant's consent, was not liable, though he had not obtained the father's consent.

LANE

v.

AU SABLE ELECTRIC COMPANY.

Michigan Supreme Court—June 1, 1914.

181 Mich. 26; 147 N. W. 546.

Landlord and Tenant — Forceful Eviction — Evidence Insufficient.

In a striking employee's action for damages sustained from his eviction from a house occupied by him as part compensation for his services, where there is no evidence as to the use of excessive force, plaintiff is not entitled to go to the jury on that issue.

Damages — Humiliation from Eviction — Evidence Insufficient.

A striking employee, evicted from a house occupied by him as part compensation for his services, is not entitled to damages for the mortification, humiliation, and injured feelings caused by having his household effects put into the street in the presence of onlookers, where it appears that most of the onlookers were strikers or sympathizers with the strikers and with plaintiff.

Master and Servant — Occupant of House as Servant or Tenant.

The relation of landlord and tenant does not exist between an employer and an employee who is furnished a house as part compensation for his services, and, where he voluntarily leaves the employment, his right to the use of the house immediately ends.

[See note at end of this case.]

Error to Circuit Court, Muskegon county: SULLIVAN, Judge.

Action for damages. William Lane, plaintiff, and Au Sable Electric Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff for less than amount claimed. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Jerome E. Turner for plaintiff in error.
Cross, Vandercorp, Foote & Ross and W. S. Westerman for defendant in error.

[27] MOORE, J.—This suit is brought by William Lane to recover damages which he alleges he sustained by reason of an unlawful eviction of himself and family from certain premises located in the city of Muskegon Heights, owned by defendant.

The plaintiff was chief operator of the substation of the defendant at Muskegon Heights, when a strike came on. His testimony as to the occurrences which gave rise to this litigation is, in substance, as follows:

"I lived there and operated the station, used the house as a dwelling house. The time of this strike was the 27th day of May, 7 o'clock in the evening. I don't just remember how long I remained in the employ of the company—after the strike, after the boys walked out. I think it was until about 9 o'clock in the morning of the 28th, the next day. I did not have any talk at that time with any of the officers of this defendant; I don't know that I did. On the 3d day of June, in the forenoon, we were still on the place and in possession of the dwelling house. On that day we were eating dinner. . . . We wasn't up from the table, but we were through, and in come Mr. Stewart and Mr. Burton and asked me if I had received notice to vacate, and I told them that I had, and he asked me if I was going to move, I think. No, he said, 'You have received your notice and you have not vacated yet.' I said, 'No.'

He said, 'We will have to set your furniture out on the street.' And he then asked me if I had any place to go, and I told him no, that I didn't. . . . He said that he would take my wife and children to the hotel, but he didn't say what hotel, or who was to pay the bill, and I told him, 'No;' that I could look after my wife; that it wasn't necessary. And he and Mr. Stewart went out of the house. I don't think they were out over 20 minutes before in came these men and began to tear up and set things out. I can't say that I counted them, but I would say that there was eight or nine men came in. They were strangers to me. It took them about an hour and a half to set our goods in the street. I was there myself all the time while this was being done; also my wife and children.

[28] On cross-examination:

"There is a passageway between the dwelling house and the substation, as shown there; it is sort of an alleyway, so that you can pass right from the dwelling house into the substation, or from the station into the dwelling house. It was used for convenience, or had been so used, in performing my duties there as chief operator. . . . Shortly before I came here the chief operator there at the substation died, and the position was offered to me. I was receiving $60 a month in Grand Rapids and provided my own place of living; the company didn't furnish me a place to live in in Grand Rapids; so when I came over here my compensation was $55 a month and the use of this house, which Mr. Gilbert thought was worth $5 or $10 a month, and the company also furnished the lights and water, and there was a telephone in the house, which rental wasn't paid by me. It was furnished for my use. There was also a telephone in the substation—the Citizens' and Bell was extended from the house to the substation, and the private, the power company's private, phone was extended from the substation to the house. . . . I performed the last of my duties there as chief operator on the 27th day of May, about 7 o'clock in the evening; then quit and went on a strike; in other words, I walked out with the other strikers. Did not send any notice to the company. There were others at the station capable of performing my duties. One of the strikers, the operator that had been there with me, he walked out, too. I and my helper, or whoever operated there at the substation, walked out at night at 7 o'clock, without any notice to the company whatever. I continued to live in the dwelling house. That substation is supposed to be opened all night, a man on duty there all night; I locked up the station. We had the keys and returned them afterwards to the operator, Mr. Essex. I didn't deliver the keys to anybody that night. When we walked out in that way it left the city and everything in darkness. I know that Mr. Stewart, the local manager here, and Douglas Erwin came out there and got in and turned on the lights; at the time I was down the street. I claimed that the company discharged me afterwards, not until after I had gone on [29] a strike and quit of my own accord, and after I had gone out in this way, locked up the substation, nobody there to turn on the lights, and refused to vacate the house used in connection with the substation. I did not quit my employment there because I had any complaint myself against the company. I was in the Union and was in sympathy with the striking linemen. If you are a mind to call it so, it was sort of a compulsory matter with me. Had no personal grievance against the defendant at that time. Mr. Burton of the defendant company gave me no verbal notice to vacate that dwelling house. I was not asked to vacate on the 28th, the next day after we went out, but I did get a written notice; it was served upon my wife on the 29th, when I got home she delivered it to me. That is the notice that was served:

"To William Lane:

"Sir;

"You are hereby notified to quit and surrender up the dwelling house and premises which you have occupied incident to your employment by this company. Said dwelling house and premises being the dwelling house and premises situated on block thirty-seven (37) plat B, village (now city) of Muskegon Heights, Michigan, the same adjoining the substation of this company on Peck street in said city of Muskegon Heights.

"Dated this 29th day of May, 1913.

"Au Sable Electric Company,

"By S. Stewart."

"The Au Sable Electric Company did not have any local manager here that I know of. I did not get a verbal notice before this written notice was served on me to get out of that house. Mr. Gilbert called me on the telephone, I remember, and he asked me when I was going to move; that was all the notice that I got. He didn't tell me to vacate it. I think it was the morning of the 29th or 28th. I told him that I didn't have any place to go, and that I would see what I could do. I had the intention of moving at the time. I did not consult a lawyer and conclude that I would stay, nor take any legal advice, before this notice was served upon me, or before my goods were taken out. I was told not to move, but not by a lawyer. It came from the Union. . . . I swear I didn't hear any messages over the telephone. I heard messages, but [30] not over the telephone—heard one side of the conversation, the man who was talking. I could hear through the corridor; the telephone switchboard is at one end of the corridor, and I could hear through the corridor. I have listened on purpose to hear what was going on and would report to the Union. . . . Notwithstanding whatever investigation I had made in regard to procuring a dwelling house elsewhere, I had made up my mind to stay right there in this little house, and I was doing that on the theory that I had a right to stay there. It was four days after I got this notice before I was set out. The goods were not actually set out until after dinner of June 3d. In the house at the time we took dinner was my wife and children and myself, that was all.

"Mr. Burton said to me he wanted to know if I had had notice to vacate. I told him I had. Well, he said that I hadn't moved, and that they would be compelled to set my goods out on the street. He did not tell me that it would be a good deal better if I went on and moved out myself. I didn't tell him anything. Mr. Burton turned to my wife and informed her that they had an automobile outside. We were not told that they would take my wife and children to the Occidental Hotel. He said to the hotel. I did not know what hotel he meant. My wife said 'No,' that she wouldn't go. At all events both she and I declined the offer, and then the men came in and moved out the stuff. It took them about an hour and a half. They didn't handle the furniture very carefully, I don't think, the way it was scratched up. They damaged it to the extent of $14.50. They carried things out separately and set them down on the ground. I cautioned them myself to use care and not to do any damage.

"I do not remember that Mr. Burton on the morning of the 29th of May, the day this written notice was served, or on the preceding day, May 28th, of Mr. Burton coming where I was at the rear of the substation, or at the rear of the building that I occupied, and having a talk with me about the situation. I remember Mr. Burton being there, but it wasn't that day; it was after that, after the notice was served; it was while I was still occupying the house. He did not offer me another job. He told me I could come back [31] if I wanted to; that he was sorry that I had gone out. In that conversation I probably told him, 'We have got just as good lawyers on our side as you have,' but I can't recall it. At that time I had probably consulted lawyers. I personally hadn't; somebody consulted a lawyer for me in regard to my rights to remain on those premises."

At the close of all the testimony counsel for defendant conceded the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for $14.50, and moved for a directed verdict in that amount. Under the direction of the court the jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for that amount. The plaintiff brings the case here by writ of error.

Counsel claim they had a right to go to the jury upon the question of whether excessive force was used, and also upon the question of damages because of mortification, humiliation, and injured feeling, caused by having his household effects put into the street in the presence of onlookers. The record is barren of proof of forcible entry or of the exercise of excessive force. It also shows that most of the onlookers were strikers or sympathizers with the strikers and the plaintiff.

The relation of landlord and tenant between the parties did not exist. It was the relation of employer and employed; the plaintiff being in possession of property belonging to the employer by virtue of his employment. When the plaintiff voluntarily severed the relationship which entitled him to the use of the property, that moment he ended his right to its use. Suppose a maid servant was employed at a monthly wage of $20 and the use of a furnished room in the house of her employer, and should then go on a strike and refuse to do any work, could she still insist upon the right to use the furnished room? A statement of the proposition shows its unreasonableness, and yet it is like the instant case in principle.

[32] The language used in Bowman v. Bradley, 151 Pa. St. 351, 24 Atl. 1062, 17 L.R.A. 213, is "pertinent here:

"If the possession of the house be regarded as an incident of the hiring, the incident must fall with the principal. If it be regarded as part of the compensation for labor stipulated for, then the right to the compensation ceased when the labor was discontinued.

"Bowman had the same right to insist on the payment of the cash part of his wages as on that part which provided his family a place to live. His right under the contract of hiring was like that of the porter to the possession of the porter's lodge; like that of the coachman to his apartments over the stable; like that of the teacher to the rooms he or she may have occupied in the school buildings; like that of the domestic servants to the rooms in which they lodge in the house of their employers. In all these cases and others that might be enumerated the occupancy of the room or house is incidental to the employment. The employee has no distinct right of possession, for his possession is that of the employer, and it cannot survive the hiring to which it is incidental, or under which it is part of the contract price for the services performed. . . . When his contract ended, his rights in the premises were extinguished, and it was his duty to give way to his successor. . . . The case seems to have been begun, and tried, by the plaintiff on the theory that his right to the possession of the house was superior to his right to remain in the defendant's service.

When the labor ceased on the 19th of July, the plaintiff ceased to pay for his occupancy. By ceasing to labor without remonstrance or objection he must be held to acquiesce in the defendant's right to terminate the contract for labor. If that contract was rightfully terminated, then the plaintiff's right to the house was at an end, and he could be lawfully put out of possession. . . . It is not necessary that occupation of a house, or apartments, should be a necessary incident to the service to be performed in order that the right to continue in possession should end with the service. It is enough if such occupation is convenient for the purposes of the service and was obtained by reason of the contract of hiring."

[33] To the same effect is Heffelfinger v. Fulton, 25 Ind. App. 33, 56 N. E. 688, and East Norway Lake Church v. Froislie, 37 Minn. 447, 35 N. W. 260.

NOTE.

Person Occupying Premises of Employer as Part of Compensation as Tenant of Owner.

Introductory, 1111.

General Rule, 1111.

Application of Rule, 1112.

Qualification of Rule, 1115.

Introductory.

It is the purpose of the present note to discuss only those cases which deal with the relation of a person occupying the premises of his employer as a part of his compensation, as affecting the civil rights and liabilities of the owner of the property. There are decisions which deal with the effect of occupation of that kind with relation to other matters, such as the right of the servant to claim a settlement, or his liability to be rated under the various poor laws, and his right to a franchise under particular statutes, but as stated by the court in Bowman v. Bradley, 151 Pa. St. 351, 24 Atl. 1062, 17 L.R.A. 213, which action was brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful ejection of a farm hand from premises, owned by his employer, of which he claimed to be in possession as a tenant and not as a servant, "analogies furnished by cases arising under the poor laws in England or in this country, while they may be helpful in some respects, ought not to be controlling."

For a discussion of the cases dealing with the relation between the owner of premises and a person working the land for a share of the crops see the notes to Mead v. Owen, 13 Ann. Cas. 231; Wagner v. Buttles, Ann. Cas. 1914B 144.

General Rule.

As a general rule it is held that a person, who occupies the premises of his employer as part of his compensation, is in possession as a servant and not as a tenant where the occupancy is connected with or is required for the necessary and better performance of his service.

J., said: "The distinction is extremely important between granting an estate to a person and the case where an owner allows a person in his employ, for the purpose of better complying with his duties as a servant, to have the use of premises. He has no estate in the latter case, and the owner of the premises, as far as that goes, is able to remove him at any time."

On the termination of the employment the right to occupy the premises ceases. Lake v. Campbell, 5 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 582; Hart v. O'Brien, 15 L. C. Jur. (Eng.) 42; Williams v. Herrick, 5 U. C. Q. B. 613; De Briar v. Minturn, 1 Cal. 456; Homan v. Redick, 97 Neb. 299, 149 N. W. 782, L.R.A.1915C 601; Mitchell v. Morris Canal, etc. Co. 31 N. J. L. 99; McQuade v. Emmons, 38 N. J. Minturn*, 1 Cal. 450, the court said: "The defendant was an innkeeper. He employed the plaintiff as a barkeeper, and was to give him three hundred dollars per month for his services, and allow him the privilege of occupying a room so long as he remained in the defendant's employ. The plaintiff was not hired for any definite period, and he was discharged by the defendant. After such discharge, the defendant notified the plaintiff to leave the room which he occupied, at the end of the month. The plaintiff did not comply with the notice, and the defendant put him out of the house by force; and this action is brought to recover damages for being thus ejected. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for six hundred dollars. We do not see how any action can be maintained upon the facts presented. The plaintiff had no right to remain in the defendant's house after being notified to leave, and the defendant had a right to eject him. It does not appear that any more force was used than was necessary, or that the facts would warrant anything more than nominal damages, even if an action could be sustained at all. We think a new trial should be granted." In Crain v. Burnett, 190 Ill. App. 407, it was said: "Where an employee occupies a house incidental to his employment and he is discharged, whether the discharge be rightful or wrongful, he must vacate the premises occupied by him as such employee. If he fails to leave peaceably, or after doing so returns, he becomes a trespasser and may be ejected by the master although his wages have not been paid."

Application of Rule.

In Mackenzie v. Minis, 132 Ga. 323, 16 Ann. Cas. 723, 63 S. E. 909, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1003, it appeared that the defendant had entered into a written agreement with the plaintiff whereby the former agreed to work for the plaintiff as gardener on the latter's summer place for a period of three years. The engagement was dependent on the defendant proving himself competent and satisfactory to the plaintiff. As an employee, he was to have the use of a house on the land of the plaintiff. Before the expiration of three years the plaintiff discharged him and gave him written notice to quit the premises. The defendant refused to go and the plaintiff sought to enjoin him from continuing to enter the premises. In granting the injunctive relief the court said: "Where a servant occupies a dwelling house belonging to the master, free of rent, as incidental to and connected with the performance of his duties as such servant; if he quits the service of the master before the expiration of the term, or is discharged by the master, his right to the possession of the dwelling house ceases, and he must surrender it. In such cases, in the eye of the law, the master has never parted with possession of the premises, the servant's possession being regarded as that of the master. Hence the master may enter and use such reasonable force as may be necessary to expel the servant. It has been said, that, 'when a servant has been discharged, the master's right in this respect does not depend upon the question whether the servant is rightfully or wrongfully discharged, but exists in the one case as well as in the other, the master incurring the peril of paying damages for a breach of the contract if the discharge is wrongful; but the right to expel a servant from the house exists, whether he had good cause therefor or not.' . . . It is evident from the reading of the contract that the furnishing of the house upon the place to the manager and head gardener was an incident to the service, and for the purpose of aiding in its discharge, and was not a letting of any part of the property to him as a tenant of the owner. The occupancy of the house was directly connected with the service to be rendered, and for the better performance thereof. In law, therefore, the employer did not resign possession to the employee as to a tenant, but the possession of the employee was in effect that of the master. When the employee was discharged, it was his duty to resign possession and to leave the premises. He had no right to persist in remaining on the place, walking over it, and using it as if he had not been discharged. Nor could he do this because he insisted that he could not legally be discharged for three years from the date of the contract." So in Mitchell v. Morris Canal, etc. Co. 31 N. J. L. 99, it appeared that the defendant was employed by the plaintiff canal company as a lock tender and as part of his compensation he was permitted to occupy one of their dwelling houses. One of the rules of the company which had been in force for a number of years and of which the defendant had notice provided that "in case any plane or lock tender shall be discharged while occupying the house belonging to the company, he shall thereupon immediately leave said house." The defendant was served with a written notice of his discharge and a notice and demand in writing for the surrender of the premises within thirteen days. The defendant refused to surrender, claiming that he was a tenant at will and entitled to three months' notice to quit. The court said: "The defendant was to occupy 'as long as he was in the employment of the company; and when he ceased to be so employed he was immediately to leave the house.' He held under the company and so was their tenant, not at a rent reserved, but as part compensation for his services and only during the time those services were being performed. The company reserved to themselves the right to terminate his employment and his occupancy at their pleasure. Such an arrangement is not only reasonable, but in most cases of large manufacturing companies and public works, almost indispensable. Dwellings are provided for the employees convenient to the places of their labor, to further the objects of the enterprise and facilitate the business of themselves and the public. These dwellings are not leased; nor is a rent reserved or term fixed beyond the period of labor, for that would frustrate the design of the owners and tend to defeat the enterprise—since while the time of a notice to quit was running, their works might be suspended. The notice to quit, which by the common law was six months, by our statute three months, was not required in this case." Similarly in McGee v. Gibson, 1 B. Mon. (Ky.) 105, it appeared that the plaintiff contracted to labor on the farm of the defendant, for which the defendant was to pay him, monthly, till the end of the year certain sums stipulated, and the defendant was to furnish a house to the plaintiff and to keep his cow, for which he was to pay two dollars a month for the house and one dollar a month for the cow, both payable monthly. The court said: "Upon this contract, we are of opinion that there was no independent lease of the house for a year, or any other period, but that the right of occupancy was incident to the contract of hire, and ceased whenever, by mutual consent, or by the fault of the plaintiff, the services themselves ceased. Furnishing of the house at two dollars per month, was obviously a mode of paying a part of the wages of the plaintiff; and after such a cessation of his services as is above described, he could no more claim the right to occupy the house, or to feed his cow on the defendant's pasture, than he could claim any other portion of his hire. From that time he would be in no better condition than a strict tenant at will, who has, by his own act, terminated the tenancy, and would, at most, be entitled only to a reasonable time for removing from the house."

In Presby v. Benjamin, 169 N. Y. 377, 62 N. E. 430, 57 L.R.A. 317, an action instituted to recover the rent reserved in the lease of an apartment, the defense was eviction. The claim of the defendant was that on leaving his apartment before the expiration of the demised term he placed the porter of his store with his wife in the apartment as his servant to take care of the apartment on his behalf during his absence; that the plaintiff refused to allow the defendant's servant to enter or occupy the apartment and that thereupon he surrendered and abandoned the premises to the landlord. The lease contained a covenant that the lessee would not assign or sublet the premises and it was the claim of the plaintiff that the action of the lessee in attempting to place his employee in possession of the premises was a breach of the covenant against subletting. The court said: "It is clear that even under a liberal construction of the covenant, to constitute a violation of this lease the defendant must have attempted to put in possession of the premises a new tenant, not merely a new occupant. To be a tenant a person must have some estate, be it ever so little, such as that of a tenant at will or on sufferance. A person may be in occupation of real property simply as a servant or licensee of his master. In that case the possession is not changed; it is always in the master. . . . Therefore, if the defendant sought to place his porter in occupation of the premises as caretaker or as servant he was entirely within his rights. His testimony to this effect was not conclusive. There were circumstances from which the jury might have inferred that the suggestion of a caretaker was a subterfuge, and that the real intent was to make the porter a tenant of the premises. But in this respect the evidence presented a question of fact for the jury to pass upon." In Vincent v. Crane, 134 Mich. 700, 97 N. W. 34, it appeared that an employer was the lessee of a farm. His lease contained a covenant against subletting. The court held that the act of the employer in placing one of his laborers in possession of a house situated on the premises, for the better performance of his service was not such a subletting as would avoid his lease.

In Huggins v. Bridges, 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 82, it was held that while the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist as between an employer and his employee who occupied rooms on the premises, as a part of his compensation and although at the termination of his employment the employer had the right to set out his goods, he was liable for injuries sustained by the employee's wife as a result of his stopping up the chimney thus causing smoke and gas to enter the rooms so occupied in an effort to make him vacate after the termination of his employment.

In Waller v. Morgan, 18 B. Mon. (Ky.) 136, it was held that a college professor who occupied a portion of the house of his employer on the premises as a part of his compensation could not be considered a tenant of his employer and therefore was not liable as a subtenant or assignee for the rent due the owner from his employer.

Where a pastor occupies as a residence property owned by a church, for the better performance of his duties, the relation of landlord and tenant does not exist and his right to the possession of the property ceases with the termination of his employment. Chatard v. O'Donovan, 80 Ind. 20, 41 Am. Rep. 782; East Norway Lake Church v. Froislie, 37 Minn. 447, 35 N. W. 260. See also Bigelow v. Norton, 3 Nova Scotia 283. Compare Bristol v. Burr, 120 N. Y. 427, 24 N. E. 937, 8 L.R.A. 710. Thus in Chatard v. O'Donovan, supra, it appeared that the action was instituted to oust the defendant, a priest, from the possession of certain church property. He had been removed from the office of pastor but had refused to surrender his possession of the property. The court said: "While it may not be said . . . that the defendant was the hired servant of his Bishop, it does appear that he was appointed to his position by and held it at the discretion of the Bishop, and that his possession of the property was only an incident to his appointment, the better to enable him to discharge the duties of his office, and when, in the exercise of that discretion, which by the rules and customs of the church he had the right to employ, the Bishop removed the defendant from his charge or pastorate over the congregation, his right to possession of the property at once necessarily ceased. If, under the circumstances, the parties should be deemed to have come under a contract relation to each other, the plain meaning of the contract was that when the defendant should cease to be pastor, which might be at the will of his Bishop, he should cease forthwith to occupy the property, there being, from the nature of the case, no right of occupancy except as an incident to the performance of the duties of pastor. And if this be regarded as a tenancy, it was a tenancy at will, and determinable by one month's notice, in writing, delivered to the tenant," which notice the complaint shows to have been given. We are, however, of the opinion that the relation of the parties was more like that of master and servant—the possession of the priest being, in fact, the possession of his superior, the Bishop, who had power, at any time and upon his own judgment or discretion, to remove one and install another in the office of pastor, and in the possession of the property of the office." In Doe v. M'Kaeg, 10 B. & C. 721, 21 E. C. L. 154, it was held that a minister placed in possession of a chapel and dwelling house was a mere tenant at will of his employers whose estate was determined by a demand of possession. See to the same effect Doe v. Jones, 10 B. & C. 718, 21 E. C. L. 153, 8 L. J. K. B. 310.

Likewise, it has been held that where a person occupies the premises of his employer as a caretaker or while looking after the interests or business of the owner the relation of landlord is not created. Mayhew v. Suttle, 4 El. & Bl. 347, 82 E. C. L. 347, 1 Jur. N. S. 303, 24 L. J. Q. B. 54, 3 W. R. 108, 3 C. L. R. 59; Doe v. Derry, 9 C. & P. 494, 38 E. C. L. 194; Davis v. Williams, 130 Ala. 530, 30 So. 488, 89 Am. St. Rep. 55, 54 L.R.A. 749; Cook v. Klenk, 142 Cal. 416, 76 Pac. 57; Davis v. Clancy, 3 McCord L. (S. C.) 422. See also Allen v. England, 3 F. & F. (Eng.) 49; Mitchell v. Davis, 20 Cal. 45; McCutchen v. Crenshaw, 40 S. C. 511, 19 S. E. 140; Letang v. Donohue, 6 Quebec Q. B. 180; Reynold v. Metcalf, 13 U. C. C. P. 382. Compare Colcord v. Hall, 3 Head (Tenn.) 625. In Cook v. Klenk, supra, the court said: "The mere possession of property does not necessarily imply that the relation of landlord and tenant exists. The servant when given the possession of a cottage in which to live while in the employ of the master is not necessarily a tenant. If this were so, servants and agents would have novel and embarrassing powers in regard to property placed in their charge. The relation of landlord and tenant is created by contract express or implied. The evidence here does not show that any such contract was made, or that any facts exist from which it can be inferred. To allow defendant to remain in possession under an arrangement by which he was to collect the rents from third parties and turn them over to plaintiff, after he has refused to turn over such rents, on the theory that he is a tenant, would be to allow him to reap an undue advantage from the acts of kindness shown him by plaintiff. He would be a tenant for the purpose of holding possession, but not for the purpose of collecting or paying rents."

However, in Shaw v. Hill, 79 Mich. 86, 44 N. W. 422, it was held that where one is put in possession of premises under an agreement to improve the same and to keep off trespassers he becomes a tenant at will.

Qualification of Rule.

A person may occupy premises as a tenant and yet be a servant of the owner and where the occupation of the employer's premises is not a mere incident to the service the principle of landlord and tenant applies even though the rental is satisfied by service. Reg. v. Lynn, 8 Ad. & El. 379, 35 E. C. L. 409, 3 N. & P. 411; Snedaker v. Powell, 32 Kan. 396, 4 Pac. 869; Ofschlager v. Surbeck, 22 Misc. 595, 50 N. Y. S. 862; Anderson v. Steinreich, 36 Misc. 845, 74 N. Y. S. 920. See also Hughes v. Chatham, Bar. & Arn. El. Cas. 61, 7 Jur. 1136, 13 L. J. C. Pl. 44, 5 M. & G. 54, 44 E. C. L. 39, 7 Scott. N. R. 581; Hunt v. Colson, 3 Moo & S. 790, 30 E. C. L. 319. In Womach v. Jenkins, 128 Mo. App. 408, 107 S. W. 422, the court said: "Where the occupation of the master's house by the servant is directly connected with the service or if it is required expressly or impliedly by the employer for the necessary or better performance of the service, the relation of the parties with respect to the property is not that of landlord and tenant, but of master and servant, and the latter will be required by law to surrender possession of the premises at the end of the employment. . . . But there is no inconsistency between the relation of landlord and tenant and that of master and servant, and where, as in the case in hand, it appears that the occupation of the master's premises was not treated by the parties themselves as a mere incident of the service, it should be regarded in law as the occupation by a tenant, and the rights of the parties should be determined according to the laws and principles applicable to the relation of landlord and tenant." In Anderson v. Steinreich, 36 Misc. 845, 74 N. Y. S. 920, it was held that where a janitress occupies an apartment owned by her employer under an agreement to pay rent therefor and her salary as janitress is deducted from the rent, her occupancy is that of a tenant although the relation of master and servant exists while she is performing the service of janitress. In Ofschlager v. Surbeck, 22 Misc. 595, 50 N. Y. S. 862, it appeared that a hired man who occupied a house on the premises of his employer was in possession under an agreement that he should keep the house in good order and that the rent was to be ten dollars per month, which was deducted from his wages each month. It further appeared that the employer had several times sworn that the occupancy of the hired man was that of a tenant. Under those circumstances the court held that the question whether the employer held as a tenant had been properly left to the jury. In Snedaker v. Powell, 32 Kan.

396, 4 Pac. 869, it appeared that the plaintiff had agreed with one B. to work on his farm for eight months. In return B. agreed that he would pay the plaintiff fifty dollars a month and would furnish him with a house on the premises for a period of one year. With the consent of B. the plaintiff permitted the defendant to occupy part of the house. After the completion of the term of his service the plaintiff moved out and subsequently instituted an action to collect four months' rent from the defendant. The defendant claimed that he was in possession under B and that the plaintiff merely held as the servant of B. and had no right of action for rent. The court said: "Under the contract [plaintiff] had paid by his labor and services for the use of the house . . . ; and even if the occupancy of the dwelling during his eight months' service was that of a servant and not as a tenant, yet after he had performed that service, the relation existing between B. and [the plaintiff] was that of landlord and tenant. In order for a person to occupy as a servant, the occupancy must in some way be in aid of or necessary to the performance of service." In Reg. v. Lynn, 8 Ad. & El. 379, 35 E. C. L. 409, 3 N. & P. 411, it appeared that an employee who formerly occupied a house on the premises of his employer by agreement moved out and made arrangements with a third person for the renting of another house. While the arrangements were made with the employee, the owner of the house considered the employer as his tenant and the rents and charges were paid by the employer under the terms of the contract of employment. The court held that the employer occupied the house as a tenant and not as a servant and as such tenant was liable to be assessed for the poor rate. In State v. Smith, 100 N. C. 486, 6 S. E. 84, it appeared that the prosecutor occupied with his family a separate and distinct dwelling, several hundred yards from that of the defendant, and under a special contract by which, for his services as a laborer, he was to have furnished him a dwelling place and a monthly allowance of meal and meat as well as the privilege of cultivating a small strip of land for his own benefit. While in possession under the agreement he was driven out, by threats and a demonstration of deadly weapons and an array of numbers, against which resistance would have been useless. The court said: "There were created, in our opinion, the legal relations of lessor and lessee between the parties, which did not warrant this invasion of the prosecutor's possession of the premises, no more than if the house had been on other lands of [defendant] instead of the plantation whereon he lived."

If the person occupying the premises of his employer as a part of his compensation remains in possession after the termination of his employment he may become a tenant by sufferance or at will. Rex v. Collett, R. & R. C. C. 498; Eichengreen v. Appel, 44 Ill. App. 19; Grosvenor v. Henry, 27 Ia. 269; School Dist. v. Batsche, 106 Mich. 330, 64 N. W. 196, 29 L.R.A. 576; People v. Annis, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 304; Jennings v. McCarthy, 16 N. Y. S. 161, 40 N. Y. St. Rep. 678. Thus in Jennings v. McCarthy, supra, the court said: "With the termination, however, of the employment, whether by the servant's abandonment thereof or by his discharge therefrom, the servant's right to occupy his master's premises is also determined, and the master then has a present right to repossess himself thereof, and to use all necessary force to eject the servant therefrom. If the servant continues in possession without molestation, it is presumptively with the master's consent; and if such possession endures beyond the limit of a period of time sufficient to enable the former servant conveniently to remove, such possession is converted into a tenancy at will." In Kerrins v. People, 60 N. Y. 221, 19 Am. Rep. 158, it was held that a tenancy at will would not immediately result on the termination of the service of an employee occupying a house as a part of his compensation but that his holding over must be for a sufficient period to warrant an inference of consent to a different holding. However, in Doyle v. Gibbs, 6 Lans. (N. Y.) 180, it appeared that the plaintiff, while in the employ of the defendant, occupied certain premises as a part of his compensation. He was subsequently discharged and requested to move, but owing to the sickness of his wife he was permitted to remain until she was well enough to move. Subsequently the plaintiff and his wife left the premises for a day's visit with her father and while they were absent the defendant entered and removed their property. The court said: "It is necessary to ascertain the exact relation the parties occupied toward each other at the termination of the contract of hiring. That contract and the occupancy of the dwelling house under it did not create the relation of landlord and tenant, but that of master and servant only. . . . If the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist, the plaintiff was not in possession as a tenant holding over, after the expiration of his term, but he was in as a servant dismissed from service, but incapable by reason of the condition of his wife from removing. It was in this condition of things that the plaintiff asked permission to remain until his wife could get ready to leave, and that the plaintiff said he should look to him for rent. If an agreement is to be implied from the facts stated by the plaintiff, it must be an agreement that plaintiff remain, paying rent, until his wife was well enough to remove. No other time was talked of or desired by the plaintiff, and it is obvious that defendant only consented to plaintiff's occupancy until that event occurred. The plaintiff was not a tenant at will nor at sufferance, but until the happening of a future contingent event. It was shown that in December the wife was well enough to leave on a visit to her father, and that the plaintiff removed a part of his property to her father's. In the absence of all evidence to the contrary, these facts established the wife's ability to remove, and, if so, the time for which plaintiff had permission to occupy had expired, and the defendant had the right to enter and put out the plaintiff's goods."

TALBOTT ET AL.

Colorado Supreme Court—January 4, 1915.

58 Colo. 563; 146 Pac. 771.

Mechanics' Liens — Contract by Agent — Scope of Lien.

Rev. St. 1908, § 4025, giving mechanics, materialmen, etc., and persons performing labor or furnishing materials for the construction of any building, etc., a lien upon the property upon which they have rendered service or bestowed labor, or for which they have furnished materials or other fixtures, for the value of such services, labor, or material rendered or furnished at the instance of the owner or any person acting by his authority or under him as agent, contractor, or otherwise, for the work, labor, services, or materials done, furnished, or rendered at the instance of the owner of the building or other improvement, or his agent, gives a lien only upon the structure or improvement built or placed upon the land.

Same.

Rev. St. 1908, § 4025, which, after giving a lien to persons furnishing labor, etc., to be used in the construction, etc., of any building at the instance of the owner or his agent, provides that every contractor, architect, etc., or other person having charge of the construction, alteration, addition to, or repair of any building or improvement shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of that act, merely makes such person the statutory agent of the owner of the building or improvement, and does not make him the agent of the owner of the land upon which the improvement is placed.

Same.

Under Rev. St. 1908, § 4027, providing, relative to mechanics' liens, that such liens shall extend to and cover so much of the lands whereon the building or improvement shall be made as may be necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building or improvement, and that the lien for work or materials done or furnished for any entire structure shall attach to the building for or upon which the work is done or materials furnished in preference to any prior lien, incumbrance, or mortgage, that any person enforcing such lien may have the building sold, and that the lien shall extend to and embrace any additional or greater interest in any of the property acquired by the owner at any time subsequent to the making of the contract or the commencement of the work, and before the establishment of the lien by process of law, the land upon which a building or improvement is erected or placed cannot be subjected to a lien unless the owner of the land has some ownership in the building and acts affirmatively relative to its construction.

Improvements by Tenant — Right to Lien.

Under Rev. St. 1908, § 4029, providing that any building, etc., constructed, altered, etc., upon any land with the knowledge of the owner or reputed owner shall be held to have been erected, constructed, etc., at the instance and request of such owner, so as to subject his interest to a lien unless he shall within five days after obtaining notice of the erection, construction, etc., give notice that his interests shall not be subject to any lien personally, or by posting and keeping posted a written and printed notice to such effect in some conspicuous place upon the land, building, or improvement, provided that this shall not apply to any owner or person who shall have contracted for any erection, structure, or improvement, a lessor under a long-term lease which bound the lessee to erect a building upon the demised premises at his own expense, to become a part of the realty upon completion, is not required to post the statutory notice, as he had entered into a contract with reference to the construction of the improvement, and was by the very letter of the proviso exempted from the terms of that section.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A long-term lease requiring the lessee to erect a building at his own expense to become a part of the realty upon completion was not a contract with a contractor for the construction of such building within Rev. St. 1908, § 4025, providing, relative to mechanics' liens, that in case of a contract for the work between the reputed owner and a contractor the lien shall extend to the entire contract price, as a "contractor" is one who, as an independent business, undertakes to do specific jobs of work without submitting himself to control as to the petty details, especially as the contracts with the parties claiming the liens designated the lessee as owner and the lessors were not therefore the "reputed owners."

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under Rev. St. 1908, §§ 4025, 4027, 4029, a long-term lease binding the lessee to erect a building on the demised premises to become a part of the realty upon completion does not make the lessee the lessor's agent so as to invest him with authority to create a lien upon the lessor's interest in the fee, and persons doing work and furnishing materials under contracts with the lessee acquired no lien on the fee where the lessors neither participated in the erection or construction of the improvement nor approved the plans, and it does not appear that the rents reserved were greater than the reasonable worth of the vacant lots; since, if the improvements increased the value of the freehold estate, it was only as a future incident, and the lessor was not the owner of the building or structure, but would become such only upon the expiration of the lease or upon the completion of the building.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

If, under a long-term lease binding the lessee to erect a building on the demised premises at his own expense, to become a part of the realty, the lessee is presumptively the agent of the lessors within the mechanic's lien laws, the presumption is nullified and destroyed by a provision in the lease, which was duly recorded, that nothing therein should authorize the lessee or any person dealing with him to charge the lands or any interest of the lessors therein with any mechanic's lien or lien of any kind, notwithstanding a covenant by the lessee that it would not permit or suffer any bill of any mechanic, laborer, or materialman, or for furnishings or equipment, to remain unpaid, and that before commencing the erection and construction of the building it would furnish a bond guaranteeing due observance of the provisions of the lease relative to mechanics' liens, in view of Rev. St. 1908, § 694, providing that all deeds or agreements in writing affecting the title to real estate or any interest therein may be recorded, and that from and after the filing thereof for record they shall take effect as to subsequent bona fide purchasers and incumbrancers, and section 707, defining "deed," as used in that chapter, as including mortgages, leases, etc., as the lease was constructive notice to those subsequently acquiring an interest in the premises, and whatever agency it might be presumed was created thereby was necessarily subject to the conditions of the instrument creating the agency.

Error to District Court, City and County of Denver: ALLEN, Judge.

Action by A. M. Stewart et al., plaintiffs, against John O. Talbott et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs bring error. On rehearing. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Robinson & Robinson, Dines, Dines & Holme, Benedict & Phelps, Bartels, Blood & Bancroft, Raymond J. McPhee, L. Ward Bannister and L. McWhinney for plaintiffs in error.

C. H. Redmond, Goudy & Twitchell and J. H. Burkhardt for defendants in error.

[565] WHIRE, J.—Talbot and Mugivan, defendants in error, owners of four lots on Champa street between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets in the City of Denver, entered into a written contract by which they leased them to The American Music Hall Company, a corporation, for the term of ninety-nine years. The lease contract provided, inter alia. "That on or before the first day of July, A. D. 1910, the lessee will proceed to improve said premises by the erection, construction and maintenance of a building covering said premises, said building to cost, when completed, not less than one hundred fifty thousand dollars ($150,000.00); . . . and to be fully completed on or before the first day of January, A. D. 1911. . . . All buildings and improvements of every nature soever erected or placed upon said premises, when commenced and completed, shall at once become a part of the realty of the lessors, without right or authority of any person or corporation to remove the same, "provided, the lessee may alter, remodel, improve, repair or reconstruct the same at its pleasure, but not so as to [566] impair the value thereof; that at all times throughout the term of the lease the lessee shall maintain upon the said premises a building of the aforesaid character." The rental reserved to January 31, 1911, was $3,000 paid simultaneously with the execution of the lease, and $500 per month thereafter payable on the first day of each month, and the payment of taxes, assessments and governmental charges imposed upon the premises. The lessee was required to keep the improvements and fixtures insured, with the loss payable to the lessors, with the right reserved in the lessee in case of loss by fire to rebuild or repair, with reasonable diligence, the building so destroyed, and to use such insurance money therein. The contract obligates the lessee to bear all expense of the erection, construction, maintenance and operation of the building to the end that the rentals reserved to the lessors shall be met. Paragraph 6 thereof is as follows:

"It is expressly understood and agreed (and notice is hereby given), that nothing herein shall authorize the lessee or any person dealing through, with or under it, to charge said lands, or any interest of the lessors therein, or this lease, with any mechanic's lien, or lien or incumbrance of any kind whatever. On the contrary, (and notice is hereby given), the right and power to charge any lien or incumbrance of any kind against the lessors, or their estate, is hereby expressly denied, and the lessee covenants that it will not permit or suffer any bill of any mechanic, labor or material man, or for any furnishings or equipments of said premises, to be or remain unpaid. The lessee shall, before commencing the erection and construction of a building on said premises, furnish or cause to be furnished a bond in a bonding company satisfactory to lessors, guaranteeing the due observance of this clause 6."

April 15, 1910, the lease was filed for record and [567] duly recorded in the office of the county clerk and recorder of the county in which the lots are located, and thereupon possession of the premises delivered to the lessee. April 20, 1910, the lessee entered into a written agreement with James Stewart & Company, one of the plaintiffs in error, whereby the latter, acting as the agents of the former, who were therein designated as the owner, agreed "to build for the said owner a building to be used chiefly for theatrical productions on the premises leased by the owner from" Talbot and Mugivan, the defendants in error, describing the particular lease here in question, designating the book and page where it is recorded. The building was to be erected according to plans and specifications prepared by a designated architect representing "The American Music Hall Company as the owner of the premises." It authorized Stewart & Company to obtain prices and estimates for building materials and work that might be required in the erection of the building, and to submit to the architect a complete list of bids received, together with their recommendation thereon, and to "prepare proper and satisfactory contracts covering the same for execution by the owner or its authorized agent," containing a proviso that Stewart & Company might do and perform each particular portion of the work as might be determined by themselves, the architect and the owner, as most expedient. The American Music Hall Company was to furnish the necessary funds to carry on the work and pay Stewart & Company, for superintending the same, a percentage compensation depending upon the cost of the building. Bids were thereupon received for various portions of the work, and The American Music Hall Company, as owner, entered into written contracts therefor as follows: with F. H. Cowell for the brick work; with the Colorado Portland Cement Company for the cement; with Hugh Murphy for rock. A like contract [568] was prepared by Stewart & Company for execution by The American Music Hall Company, as owner, and the John Eichleay, Jr., Company, as contractor, for the structural steel, but, though approved by the architect, was never signed by either of the contracting parties. McPhee and McGinnity Company, a corporation, without any written contract, but upon orders from Stewart & Company, furnished certain lumber which was used for concrete forms, piling for shoring up adjacent ground and supporting the foundations of buildings jeopardized by the excavation. Work upon the structure proceeded for a while but certain bills became due and payable, and, default having been made therein, the work ceased early in August. Stewart & Company superintended that which was done by others, did a portion of the excavating, put in the concrete footings, placed some structural steel in the foundation, etc., paid certain bills; and herein claim a lien on the premises for $14,059.30 less $4,129.02 paid to them by the American Music Hall Company. The John Eichleay, Jr., Company fabricated and shipped to Denver from its works in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, consigned to The American Music Hall Company, ten cars of structural steel. Of these, five cars were delivered on the premises and incorporated into the foundation and basement portion of the intended building; the other five cars were tendered by the railroad company at Denver but were never received by Stewart & Company or The American Music Hall Company or delivered upon the premises, but remained in the possession of the railroad. The Eichleay Company also prepared, or partially prepared, other structural products ready for shipment for use in this building. It filed four separate lien statements. The first statement is for structural steel delivered to and incorporated into the structure, and is in the sum of $6,812.83. The second is for structural steel fabricated and shipped to Denver [569] for use in the structure, but never delivered to, nor incorporated therein because of a cessation of work thereon, and is in the sum of $7,316.10. The third statement is for certain steel either fabricated or partially so at Pittsburg, but not shipped because of cessation of work on the structure, and is in the sum of $7,840.69. The fourth statement is for steel designed for the structure but never cut, and for details made and bills of materials written for the work, and is in the sum of $1,088.86. F. H. Cowell claims a lien for $2,332.65 for brick, cement and sand furnished and placed in the basement walls. The Colorado Portland Cement Company furnished cement which was used in the foundation work of the building and claims a lien for a balance in the sum of $665. Hugh Murphy furnished crushed stone which was mixed with the cement and used in the foundation, and claims a lien therefor in the sum of $246.90. McPhee and McGinnity Company claims a lien for the material hereinbefore designated as furnished by them, in the sum of $495.80. At the time work ceased the excavation for the basement had been partially completed and a large portion of the foundation of the building constructed. Subsequent to the filing of the liens, but prior to the institution of the foreclosure proceedings, the lessors, after notice to the lien claimants of their intention so to do, forfeited the lease under the terms thereof and took possession of the premises; and the sole question here involved is the right of plaintiffs in error to fasten their respective liens upon the title of the lessors in and to the lots. The right claimed was denied by the trial court and the purpose of this action is to reverse that judgment.

Plaintiffs in error claim that they are entitled to, and may maintain their respective liens either under the provisions of § 4025 or those of § 4029, R. S. 1908.

§ 4025 gives, to the persons therein designated, "a lien upon the property upon which they have rendered [570] service or bestowed labor on for which they have furnished materials . . . for the value of such services rendered or labor done or material furnished," upon the condition, however, that they acted in that regard "at the instance of the owner" or of some person acting by his authority. Clearly here the word "owner" has reference to the word "property," and the latter signifies the character of the structure or improvement designated in the first part of the section, that is, building, mill, bridge, ditch, flume, aqueduct, reservoir, tunnel, fence, railroad, wagonroad, tramway or other structure or improvement upon land to which a lien attaches solely by virtue of this section. In other words, by this section the lien is given upon the structure or improvement built or placed upon the land. That this is the meaning of the section is made certain by its other provisions and that of the act. Further in the section the right to the lien is restated upon the same condition as above specified, except the word "owner" is followed immediately by the words "of the building or other improvement;" that is, the lien is given when, and only when, the work is done or services rendered or materials furnished "at the instance of the owner of the building or other improvement, or his agent." Moreover, the section contains the declaration that every "person having charge of the construction, alteration, addition to, or repair, either in whole or in part, of any building or other improvement, as aforesaid, shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this act," clearly meaning that the person having charge of the construction of the building or improvement, etc., is the statutory agent of the owner of the building or other improvement, but he is not thereby made such agent of the owner of the land upon which the improvement is placed. It is only by § 4027 that the land whereon such building, structure or improvement may be made, is subjected to the liens provided by the act. Therefore, ownership of the building, [571] structure or improvement, and the doing of the work thereon or the rendering services or furnishing material therefor at the instance of such owner or his agent, plus ownership in the same person of the land upon which such structure or improvement is erected or placed, are essential, under §§ 4025 and 4027, to the validity of a lien upon such land. This meaning is further evidenced by subsequent provisions of the latter section. It constitutes the lien, where it is for work done or material furnished for an entire structure, erection or improvement, superior thereon to prior liens or incumbrances of the land upon which the same is erected or placed, and authorizes in the enforcement of such lien the sale of such improvement and the removal of the same from the land upon which it stands. It further provides that the lien given by the act shall extend to any "conveyable interest of such owner or reputed owner in the land upon which such building, structure or improvement shall be erected or placed," or that he may thereafter acquire subsequent to the making of the contract or the commencement of the work upon such structure and before the establishment of such lien by process of law. It, therefore, follows that under § 4025, coupled with § 4027, it is a condition precedent to the validity of the lien that the person, whose interest in the real estate it is proposed to bind or affect thereby, must have acted affirmatively relative to the structure or improvement placed upon the land, and must have some ownership therein.

In Cornell v. Barney, 94 N. Y. 394, 398, under a statute in substantial effect the same as our §§ 4025 and 4027, materials were furnished by plaintiffs to a lessee (Salem), for an improvement in process of construction by the latter in pursuance of provisions in his lease by which he covenanted to erect a permanent building on the demised premises of, at least, a specified value, within a designated time, and in which the lessor (Barney), covenanted to loan a specified sum as [572] the building advanced, to be secured by mortgage on the lessee's interest in the premises, and the building, upon the termination of the lease, to revert to and become the property of the lessor. The right to the lien was denied on the interest of the lessor for the reason that the material for which the lien was claimed was not furnished under any contract with him or at his instance, and that he did not cause the building to be constructed. Upon this point the court, at page 398, said:

"Section 1 of the Lien Act, applicable to the city of New York (Chap. 379 of the Laws of 1875), provides that 'every person performing labor upon, or furnishing materials to be used in the construction, etc., of any building, etc., shall have a lien on the same for the work or labor done, or materials furnished by each, respectively, whether done or furnished at the instance of the owner of the building improvement, or his agent.' To give a lien under this section, the work must have been done or materials furnished at the instance of the owner of the building or the improvement, or at the instance of his agent, and the lien is upon the building or other improvement. Such is the plain language, and there is no room for construction. Here the iron was not furnished at the instance of Barney. His contract with Salem did not even require any iron to be used in the erection of the building, and it does not appear that he had anything whatever to do with Salem's contract with the plaintiffs, or with the procurement of the iron from them, or that he knew anything about it. It is true that Salem covenanted with Barney to erect the building, and that Barney agreed to advance money to be applied toward the erection of the same, and that he was to have a mortgage on the same; yet the building was not erected for Barney, and was not, before the termination of the lease, to belong to him, and in no proper sense could the material furnished for the same be said to be furnished at his instance. In harmony with this view is section 2 [573] of the act which provides that 'any person, who at the request of the owner of any lot, etc., grades, fills in, or otherwise improves the same, or the sidewalk or street in front of or adjoining the same, shall have a lien upon such lot for his work done and materials furnished.' Here the word 'request' is used in substantially the same sense as the word 'instance' in the prior section, and was intended to have the same scope.

"Section 1 having provided for a lien upon the building, section 3 provides for a lien upon the lot upon which the building stands, as follows: 'The land upon which any building, etc., is constructed, etc., shall be subject to the liens if at the time the work was commenced or materials for the same had commenced to be furnished, the land belonged to the person who caused said building, etc., to be constructed, etc.; but, if such person owned less than a fee-simple estate in such land, then only his interest therein shall be subject to such lien.' The plaintiffs can have no lien under this section upon Barney's interest in the land, because he did not in any proper sense cause the building to be constructed. Within the meaning of this section the building must be constructed for and at the expense of the owner of the land or under contract with him. Salem caused this building to be constructed, and the plaintiffs could have a lien upon his interest in the land under his lease."

This is not the case, however, under § 4029, coupled with § 4027. Thereunder a lien may attach to the lands of a person or his interest therein by his non-action, coupled with his knowledge that the building or structure was erected upon or removed to his land, or, being thereon, was altered, added to or repaired. Indeed, it does so attach under such circumstances, unless he is excluded from the application of the mechanic's lien law by reason of the provisos in the section, or within five days after he shall have obtained knowledge of the work or the intention to do the same he gives notice as required [574] therein that his interest shall not be subject to any lien for such work. The controlling distinction in this respect between §§ 4025 and 4027, on the one hand, and §§ 4029 and 4027 on the other, is, as hereinbefore stated, that in order to fasten a lien upon a person's interest in real estate under the provisions of the former sections, such person must have some ownership in the improvement constructed, etc., and must have, as such owner, contracted to have the same erected, either directly or through an agent thereunto authorized; while under the provisions of the latter sections, such contractual relation cannot exist; and the ownership in the structure or improvement essential to the validity of the lien is invested in the owner of the land by operation of law. In other words; the inception of the right to a lien under § 4025, coupled with § 4027, grows out of contract; while under § 4029, coupled with § 4027, it arises from estoppel. Nor is this distinction affected by the declaration in § 4025, that in default of filing the contract for the work, or a memorandum thereof, as therein required, the labor done and materials furnished by the parties named; prior to the filing of the same, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instances of the owner, and the person furnishing the same shall have a lien for the value thereof. It is still the affirmative contractual relation of the owner of the property to the improvement made or work performed upon which the claimant's right to the lien is based, and the effect of the default of the owner as to filing the contract or a memorandum thereof only removes the statutory restriction that the lien can extend only to the contract price and enlarges the right in that regard under the principle of estoppel so as to cover the value of the work performed or material furnished. Indeed, in Grimm v. Yates, 58 Colo. 268, 145 Pac. 696, decided at this term, we expressly declared that the purpose of § 4029 "is to require an owner, where another in possession of his property [575] is making improvements, which by the terms of the agreement between the owner and the party in possession, the latter is without authority to make, to give notice to those performing labor or furnishing materials for such improvements, within five days after he shall have obtained knowledge that they are being constructed, that his interest in the property, upon which such improvements are being placed, shall not be subject to any lien therefor, and that his failure to do so renders his interest subject to a lien for such improvements."

Applying the law to the facts of this case it follows that the liens sought to be established and enforced herein cannot be sustained under § 4029 as affected by § 4027. The defendants in error were under no obligation by virtue of those sections to give or post the notice therein required. They were in no wise engaged in constructing the improvement but had entered into a contract with reference thereto; and were, therefore, by the very letter of a proviso of the section not of the class to whom the section applies but of a class expressly exempted from its terms. Moreover, the lessee was the party in sole possession of the premises and was making no improvement thereon which the terms of its lease and contract with the defendants in error did not authorize it to make. The contract here involved possesses no element of that described in § 4025, supra, as a contract between the "owner" and a "contractor." By its terms nothing was to be paid by defendants in error but the work was to be done by the lessee at its own expense; and the acts of plaintiffs in error relative to the improvement were caused by the lessee and not by the lessors. Moreover, defendants in error were not the reputed owners of the structure or improvement, but, on the contrary, the lessee, in the contracts with plaintiffs in error, was designated as such owner. It cannot be seriously claimed that under the agreement the lessee contracted with the lessors to furnish materials or perform any of the labor or services [576] named in the foregoing section of the statute, by the doing of which it would, by that section, be known as a "contractor." A contractor is "one who as an independent business undertakes to do specific jobs of work without submitting himself to control as to the petty details."

Plaintiffs in error, however, contend that the well recognized rule declared in Shapleigh v. Hull, 21 Colo. 419, 425, 41 Pac. 1108, is applicable to the facts of this case, and that their liens attach to the fee of defendants in error in the premises by virtue of the provisions of § 4025. We held in that case that where a contract of sale of real estate expressly requires the vendee to make improvements thereon, the interest of the vendor in the land is subject to the Mechanic's Lien Law for the improvements so made. Whether the rule should apply and subject the title of the lessor to a lien where the lease requires the lessee to make permanent improvements upon the leased premises of not less than a stated value, without other conditions or limitations, has never been determined in this state. In Antlers Park Regent Min. Co. v. Cunningham, 29 Colo. 284, 286, 68 Pac. 226, counsel contended for the application of the rule but it was found unnecessary to decide the point therein. Williams v. Eldora-Enterprise Gold Min. Co. 35 Colo. 127, 130, 83 Pac. 780. That there is a clear distinction between the principles involved in the two classes of contracts is obvious. In the former the estate dealt with is one entity, and the contract of sale, containing the building requirements, can and does relate to no other thing. The vendor having required the vendee to erect the structure on the only estate that existed, and of which he was still the owner, the improvement likewise is his within the meaning of the law, and such owner's interest in the premises, by the terms of the statute, is, therefore, subject to the lien. There being but one estate in the land and both the vendee and vendor having an interest therein, the ownership of the permanent improvement placed thereon is likewise in both and the vendee in making the [577] improvement is necessarily the agent of the vendor. Under a lease, however, the estate is divided into term and reversion, and so is the ownership of the thing. In fact, there are two entities: the leasehold estate and the reversionary estate, with either of which, it would seem, parties should be permitted to deal independently of the estate of the other, and when they do so their rights and obligations in the premises, except as affected by statute based upon the doctrine of estoppel, should be measured accordingly. However, could it be said that this distinction does not logically exist, it is, nevertheless, certain that the mere fact, that the terms of a lease obligate the lessee to place permanent improvements upon the premises at his own expense, does not, of itself, constitute him the agent of the lessor in the erection of such improvements. The rule is clearly stated in Atlas Portland Cement Co. v. Main Line Realty Co. 112 Va. 7, 70 S. E. 536, 537, as follows:

"It is insisted that the appellants' claims are liens upon the lessor corporation's interest in the lot, because the lessee corporation was in effect the agent of the lessor in causing the building to be erected on the lot. The evidence fails to sustain this contention, unless in a contract of lease, where the lessee is by its terms required to erect a building upon the leased premises, the latter becomes the agent of the lessor. It is well settled that such relation does not make the tenant the agent of the landlord, and that it does not give him the implied authority to create a lien upon the landlord's interest therein for improvements made thereon, unless the law-making power expressly or by necessary implication enacts otherwise."

In Winslow Bros. Co. v. McCully Stone Mason Co. 169 Mo. 236, 69 S. W. 304, while the freehold interest was held subject to the mechanic's [578] lien for improvements erected upon the premises by the lessee under a covenant in the lease obligating him to do the same, the holding was not based upon the covenant alone, for the court on page 244, says: that the mere fact "that the tenant has contracted with the owner to make certain improvements on the leased premises, does not make the land, or the landlord's interest in the land subject to a mechanic's lien. For in such cases the tenant acts for himself and not as agent of the owner."

And in Dierks, etc. Lumber Co. v. Morris, 170 Mo. App. 212, 156 S. W. 75, based upon a statute requiring, as the ultimate foundation of the lien, a contract made with the owner of the land sought to be charged with the lien or with that owner's agent, it was held that the statute, together with the mere covenant in a ninety-nine year lease to make permanent improvements upon the leased premises, would neither constitute the lessee the statutory nor the contractual agent of the lessor in making such improvements. The court therein, on page 216, upon the latter point, used the following language:

"Now, can it be said that merely by reason of the fact that a lessee covenants with a lessor to make certain repairs and improvements which will become the property of the lessor at the end of the term, this necessarily makes the lessee the agent of the lessor so as to bind the latter's freehold interest with the lien for the materials used in the improvement? If so, then no matter what is the character and extent of the improvements, nor how strong the language of the lease denying to the lessee the authority to bind the lessor's interest with a lien, the latter will nevertheless be bound, because the lien is a creature of the statute; and whenever the lessee, in contracting for improvements, acts as the 'agent' of the lessor, within the meaning of that word as used in the statute, the freehold is bound by the lien regardless of the inhibitory terms of the lease."

The opinion cites with approval, Albaugh v. Litho-Marble [579] Decorating Co. 14 App. Cas. (D. C.) 113, and quotes therefrom the following:

The covenant "involves no theory of agency, but quite the reverse. The parties to the lease dealt with each other, not as principal and agent, but practically as adverse parties. To hold that a lessor covenanting with the lessee for the security of his interest under the lease, the payment of rent probably, should construct a building upon the land in the place of one to be demolished, would thereby and by virtue of such covenant make the lessee his agent and bind himself personally, as well as his property, for the contract of the lessee in the performance of his covenants, seems to us to be wholly without warrant either in law or in reason; we greatly question whether even the most positive legislation could impose liability upon one person for the obligation of another in such a contingency. Certainly no such liability is sought to be imposed by our mechanic's lien law. The covenant in question is itself evidence of the intention of all the parties that the lessor should not be bound."

Under this view of the matter it becomes necessary to ascertain: (1), whether the statute here under consideration has expressly or by necessary implication constituted the lessee the agent of the lessor and invested him with the authority to create a lien upon the lessor's interest in the fee for improvements made upon the leased premises; or, (2) of the covenants in the lease, coupled with the other facts of the case, constitute the lessee the agent of the lessor in making the improvements for which the liens are claimed?

Mechanic's lien statutes of our several states give but little aid in construing our own. They differ greatly in their terms and are subject to frequent amendment, and different provisions of the same statute often seem inconsistent and a lien may be sustained under one provision when other provisions would seem to negative the right thereto. Moreover, courts have too frequently applied, [580] as controlling precedents, the broad reasoning and declarations of a decision made under one statute to the facts of a case arising under an entirely dissimilar statute. By reason of these things the decisions and reasoning of the courts cannot always be accepted at their prima facie value, and should be cautiously considered and applied. However, much of the contradiction and confusion would disappear if the distinction between a contractual agent and a statutory agent, together with the particular facts of the case and statute under which such decisions were severally rendered, are kept clearly in mind in the consideration of each. Statutes giving liens for improvements made upon land "with the consent" or "with the permission" or "with knowledge" of the owner of such land, or where the owner of the land "knowingly permits improvements to be made" thereon, and statutes of like character, differ fundamentally from those where the lien must be founded on contract with the owner of the land. Under the former statutes the lien fastens upon the land through knowingly submitting or permitting it to be improved, plus the actual improvement thereof. These statutes, it would seem, discard the requirement of an actual contract and adopt the theory of estoppel. In other words, where by the statute the lien must be founded upon contract with the owner of the land, or his agent thereunto authorized by such owner, the true rule is that the lien claimant of a valid lien must establish, by proper proof, the fact that he is the contractual agent, either directly or indirectly, of such owner relative to the making of the improvement, or furnishing the material, for which the lien is claimed, while under statutes which fasten the lien by virtue of the fact that the improvements were placed upon the land "with the consent," "permission" or "knowledge of the owner" thereof, the person doing the work or furnishing the material therefor is essentially the statutory agent of the owner of the land who submitted or permitted it to be [581] improved. Section 4029, supra, with the provisos thereof eliminated, is of the latter class, while sec. 4025, supra, is of the former class. The fact that the latter section declares that any person having charge of the construction of the improvement is thereby constituted the agent of the owner, in no sense nullifies the previous requirement, as affected by Sec. 4027, supra, that the construction of the improvement by the owner of the land or by his contractual agent is essential to the inception of a lien thereunder. This is true because by that section there can be no statutory agent until the owner, either directly or through some contractual agent thereunto authorized, has moved forward in the construction of the improvement. In other words, there can be no statutory agent thereunder until subsequent to the creation of a contractual agent, and how far the lawmaking power could go in transforming the latter into the former would present a difficult question, for "there is no constitutional way for divesting a man's title except by his own act or default." Spry Lumber Co. v. Sault Sav. Bank Loan, etc. Trust Co. 77 Mich. 199, 43 N. W. 778, 6 L.R.A. 204, 18 Am. St. Rep. 396. We, therefore, decline to accept as sound the construction placed upon a statute of apparent similar import to our § 4025, by the Supreme Court of Oregon, that a lessee, obligated by the terms of the lease to build on the land and the building to revert to the lessor, thereby becomes a "contractor" and the statutory agent of the lessor in the construction of such improvements. Oregon Lumber, etc. Co. v. Nolan, 75 Ore. 69, 143 Pac. 935, 146 Pac. 474. The provisos in § 4029 and this construction of § 4025 harmonize and render the two sections consistent with each other and without which they would seem contradictory. Thus it is provided in the former that the contractor's lien extends only to the contract price, which also limits the lien rights of subcontractors, laborers, material men, etc., unless the owner [582] fails or neglects to file the building contract or a memorandum thereof for record, in which event the rights of the latter extend to the value of the services rendered or materials furnished, to the same effect as if the materials were furnished or the work done at the personal instance of the owner; while under § 4029 the owner, with knowledge that his property is being improved without his having contracted in relation thereto, can act affirmatively and avoid liability therefor.

The distinction between the two classes of statutes and the principles involved are clearly recognized and applied in the New York decisions, in which state the different classes of statutes have been in force and their effect considered and determined. In Cornell v. Barney, supra, the two classes are considered and the effect of each clearly stated and announced, and our conclusions are in conformity therewith. That case was under a contract statute of that state, being § 1 of Chap. 379, Laws of 1875, while Burkitt v. Harper, 79 N. Y. 273, and Otis v. Dodd, 90 N. Y. 336, were under statutes of the other class, as was that of Jones v. Menke, 168 N. Y. 61, 60 N. E. 1053, relied upon by plaintiffs in error herein. Indeed, in Schmalz v. Mead, 125 N. Y. 188, 191, 26 N. E. 251, 252, which was under a permission or knowledge statute, and which involved permanent improvements made by the lessee under a covenant in the lease, it is said: "Under the statute which formerly regulated mechanic's liens in the city of New York, it is no doubt true that parties, situate as the respondents in this case are, could not have acquired any lien, as it was then necessary to show that the labor was performed or the materials furnished by the party claiming a lien under, or by virtue of, some agreement or contract between him and the owner of the land, and hence the numerous cases decided under the statute, as it then stood, have no application to this case."

[583] The Illinois cases are also under the "consent," "permission" or "knowledge" class of statutes, though the court in Carey-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Jones, 187 Ill. 203, 58 N. E. 347, and Crandall v. Sorg, 198 Ill. 48, 61, 62, 64 N. E. 769, stated, substantially, that it would regard the law the same if the statute was only of the contract class. The cases, however, did not call for the remark and it is, therefore, of no force and effect. We think, however, that what the court meant was that the facts brought the respective cases within either class of statutes, because the facts and circumstances disclose that the improvements in each case were the joint undertaking of both the lessor and lessee. Moreover, an examination of the cases cited by the Illinois court in support of the statement shows that Burkitt v. Harper, 79 N. Y. 273, Schmalz v. Mead, 125 N. Y. 188, as we have hereinbefore seen, and Miller v. Mead, 127 N. Y. 544, 26 N. E. 251, were based upon either "consent," "permission" or "knowledge" statutes, and the last two named cases were likewise upon contracts of sale, as was O'Leary v. Roe, 45 Mo. App. 567, Hill v. Gill, 40 Minn. 441, 42 N. W. 294, Henderson v. Connelly, 123 Ill. 98, 14 N. E. 1, 5 Am. St. Rep. 490, and McCue v. Whitwell, 156 Mass. 208, 30 N. E. 1134. The other cases, Philip Gruner, etc. Lumber Co. v. Nelson, 71 Mo. App. 110, Hall v. Parker, 94 Pa. St. 109, and Barclay v. Wainwright, 86 Pa. St. 191, cited in support of the point or likewise irrelevant thereto, as will hereinafter appear. While there is a diversity of opinion under the contract statutes as to the proof essential to establish the contractual agency, and under the other class of statutes, on the question of what constitutes "consent," "permission" or "knowledge," it would seem that the courts have generally recognized and applied what we believe to be the true rule in such cases, that is, that where the facts and circumstances disclose that the improvement is the joint undertaking of both the lessor and lessee, the interest in the land of both may [584] be held under the mechanic's lien law for the improvements so made, but in the absence of such proof only the interest of the lessee is liable. Thus in Barclay v. Wainwright, supra, it is pointed out that the presence of an express covenant by the lessee to build at his own expense is not the criterion by which it must be determined whether the lessor's estate can be held for such improvements so made under contract with the lessee, but the determining factor in that regard is the special character of each contract. And in Dierks, etc. Lumber Co. v. Morris, supra, p. 212, it is said:

"So that in order to make such covenant (to build by the lessee) constitute an agency between the lessor and lessee we are necessarily bound to look at the facts to determine whether there was an agency or not. If on account of the shortness of the lease, the extent, cost and character of the improvements, or other facts in evidence, such as the participation by the lessor in the erection or construction thereof, it can be seen that the improvement is really for the benefit of the lessor and that he is having the work done through his lessee, then it can be said with justice that the lessee in such case is acting for the lessor. But, if the facts do not show this, it would seem to be untenable to say that the mere inclusion in a lease of a covenant to improve and repair on the part of the lessee will create the relation of agency between the tenant and the landlord, especially where the tenant is to do the work at his own expense and is expressly denied any authority to bind the landlord."

Philip Gruner, etc. Lumber Co. v. Nelson, supra, holds that the fee of the lessor is bound by the lien based upon an improvement made by the lessee pursuant to a covenant in the lease. This case, together with the other Missouri cases and certain Illinois cases, in which very broad language was likewise used, are reviewed and explained in Dierka, etc. Lumber Co. v. Morris, supra, pp. 219-222, as follows:

"Passing to our decision, we find that every one of [585] them, which hold that the fee is bound by the lien, do so only after examining the facts to see whether or not the lessee is in fact doing the work for the lessor, or whether the improvement is for the present or immediate benefit of the reversionary or freehold interest.

"In the cases of Dougherty-Moss Lumber Co. v. Churchill, 114 Mo. App. 578, 90 S. W. 405, and Curtin-Clark Hardware Co. v. Churchill, 126 Mo. App. 462, 104 S. W. 476, the lessee was bound to change a hotel into a theater at an expense of $20,000 and the property became the lessor's at the end of ten years. Besides, the lessor obligated the lessee to build and placed no restriction on his authority to bind with a lien. And the court held that presumptively the lessor made the lessee his agent to bind the whole property for the improvements. But in the case now before us the clause saying the lessee shall have no such authority takes away any such presumption.

"In the case of Winslow Bros. Co. v. McCully Stone Mason Co. 169 Mo. 236, 69 S. W. 304, the court bound the freehold interest because the evidence showed that the owner of the fee was really having the work done by the lessee as a mere straw man. On page 248 the court says the lessee was in reality the alter ego of the lessor, the Van Raake Investment Company. And on page 244 the court says the mere fact 'that the tenant has contracted with the owners to make certain improvements on the leased premises, does not make the land or the landlord's interest in the land subject to a mechanic's lien. For in such cases the tenant acts for himself and is not the agent of the owner.' In this case also the court held that it was proper to instruct the jury that if it was the intention, purpose and understanding between the fee owner and the lessee that the latter should complete the building for the immediate use, enjoyment and benefit of the lessor, and it was completed in pursuance to that understanding, then plaintiff was entitled to a lien against the fee.

"In Crandall v. Sorg, 198 Ill. 48, 64 N. E. 769, the [586] lessor was jointly interested with the lessee in erecting the improvements which were to cost $300,000 while the price of the lot on which they were erected was a much smaller sum. The court held that the defendant Sorg was not an ordinary lessor but was actively engaged in erecting the building, and did not provide that the lessee should have no authority to bind his interest with a lien, but merely contented himself with a stipulation that if any liens were created the lessee would pay them and hold him harmless.

"The case of Carey-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Jones, 187 Ill. 203, 58 N. E. 347, was decided under a statute of that State which authorized a lien against a lessor's freehold if the latter 'authorized or knowingly permitted' the lessee to improve the premises, a statute vastly different from ours. In addition to the statute in that case the court held that by the terms of the lease the right of the lessee to create a lien was recognized and a provision for forfeiture was made in case any were created. Furthermore, the improvements consisted of a building to cost not less than $6000 and the lease was for only five years with privilege of the lessor to terminate sooner and the lessor had in fact terminated the lease and the lessor was insolvent.

"We have carefully gone through all of the cases cited by appellant and find that in all of them there is either a statute which by its peculiar terms authorizes a lien against the freehold without reference to the question of agency, or the facts were such as to make the owner of the freehold directly responsible for the improvements.

"On the other hand the principle is laid down that a provision in a lease expressly requiring the lessee to make specified improvements or repairs does not make the lessee, in so doing, the agent of the lessor so as to bind the reversion of the lessor with a mechanic's lien therefor. 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 319; Cornell v. Barney, 94 N. Y. 394; Rothe v. Bellingrath, 71 [587] Ala. 55; Morrow v. Merritt, 16 Utah 412, 52 Pac. 667. It is true the text says there are decisions to the contrary, but those contrary decisions without exception, in the facts stated, show either a participation by the lessor in the building in addition to the mere covenant in the lease, thus making the lessee actually the agent of the owner to erect the building, or that the case was decided under statutes which so defined the word agent as to bring the persons ordering the improvements within the meaning of that term."

Measuring the facts of this case by the law so ascertained, it is manifest that the judgment of the trial court is right, as the liens claimed may not be sustained under the provisions of § 4025 as affected by § 4027. The lessors neither participated in the erection or construction of the improvement nor approved the plans therefor. They had nothing to say as to the size and architecture of the building or the material of which it should be built. While it was to cost not less than a substantial, designated sum, there is no allegation nor showing that the rents reserved were greater than the reasonable worth of the vacant lots upon which the improvements were to be constructed. If the improvements increased the value of the freehold interest, it was not primarily so but only as a future incident thereto, and the owner of the fee was not the owner of the building or structure within the meaning of the mechanic's lien law. He would become such owner only by operation of law through the expiration or termination of the lease, or at least only when the building was "commenced and completed," when, by the language of the lease, and not until then, it would become a part of the realty of the lessors.

However, should we assume that presumptively the lessors made the lessee their agent by reason of the covenant to build and certain other conditions in the lease, the clause therein expressly denying to the lessee the right and power to charge any lien or incumbrance of [588] any kind against the lessors or their estate, nullifies and renders non-effective such presumption. When a lease provides that the lessee shall erect a building on the premises and is silent as to the authority or want of authority of the lessee to subject the lessor's interest to a mechanic's lien, it is only by implication that it can be held that such authority exists. No such implication can arise in this case for the lease expressly denies to the lessee the authority to do anything with the premises that would bind the interest of the lessors therein with a mechanic's lien. The laws of this state do not prohibit or render non-effective a contract so limiting the power of a lessee, and it is unnecessary to inquire into the constitutionality of a law that should attempt to prohibit such contracts when the public health, safety, morals and welfare are in no wise involved. The power to contract with reference to one's property is a valuable right and courts should and will construe statutes as not abridging that right, when possible, in order to preserve the constitutionality of the law. Moreover, as a lease of real property is an instrument which, under the law may be recorded and thereupon constitutes constructive notice to those subsequently acquiring an interest in the premises, the rights and authority of the parties thereto and whatever agency it might be presumed was created thereby to deal with the estate, or the interest of either of such parties therein, is necessarily subject to the conditions and limitations expressed in the instrument creating the agency, unless otherwise provided by law. §§ 694, 707, Rev. Stat. 1908; Perkins v. Adams, 16 Colo. App. 98, 100, 63 Pac. 792; Delta County Land, etc. Co. v. Talcott, 17 Colo. App. 316, 321, 68 Pac. 985; Loser v. Plainfield Savings Bank, 149 Ia. 672, 126 N. W. 1101, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1112.

Thus, in Cornell v. Barney, supra, it was held that when the lease was recorded and permanent improvements constructed on the leased premises by the lessee [589] under a covenant in the lease obligating him to do so, lien claimants for such work were chargeable with notice of all the terms contained in the lease. And in Atlas Portland Cement Co. v. Main Line Realty Co. supra, upon the effect of the record of a lease, it is said: "It is true, as argued, that the contract of lease required the building to be erected; but it was to be erected by the lessee and the lessee alone and at its cost. The lease was of record and the appellants must be charged with notice of its contents."

Plaintiffs in error, however, contend that as the clause withholding from, and denying to, the lessee the power to charge the interest of the lessors with any mechanic's lien or incumbrances of any kind, contains a covenant upon the part of the lessee that "it will not permit or suffer any bill of any mechanic, labor or material man to be or remain unpaid," and requires the lessee, before commencing the erection and construction of the building, to furnish a bond satisfactory to the lessors guaranteeing the due observance of the clause, that thereby the contract recognizes that such liens might accrue, be filed, and be binding against the interest of the lessors. We do not concur in this view. On the contrary, we do not think it changes in any manner the meaning of that part of the clause which limits the authority of the lessee in the premises. The lessors were certainly interested in having all bills paid to the end that the lessee's interest in the premises be not subjected to a mechanic's lien and a new tenancy created by operation of law through the enforced assignment of the lease. And this is clearly the purpose of the requirement in that respect.

It is not conceivable that the legislature made provision, as it did by § 4029, supra, whereby an owner could protect his interest in land against mechanics' liens for improvements made thereon with his knowledge but in relation to which he had not contracted, and made like provision by § 4025, supra, whereby he could, when [590] entering into a certain class of contracts, that is, with a contractor or builder, limit to such contract price the lien liability of his land, and intended; as to all other contracts relative to improvements upon land, that an owner's rights in the premises and the liabilities that might be impressed thereon as a lien, could in no wise be protected and limited. Such a legislative enactment, if not unconstitutional, would be, at least, unjust and inequitable. We cannot sanction a rule of law, unless by legislative enactment we are so required to do, whereby one man's property may be taken for the debts of another and such person be without power to prevent it. We, therefore, withdraw the former opinion filed herein and affirm the judgment of the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

Decision en banc.

Hill and Scott, JJ., dissent.

MUSSEY, C. J. (specially concurring).—I agree that the judgment should be affirmed, but I rest my conclusion solely upon clause six of the lease, which is as follows:

"It is expressly understood and agreed (and notice is hereby given), that nothing herein shall authorize the lessee or any person dealing through, with or under it to charge said lands, or any interest of the lessors therein, or this lease, with any mechanic's lien, or lien or incumbrance of any kind whatever. On the contrary (and notice is hereby given), the right and power to charge any lien or incumbrance of any kind against the lessors, or their estate, is hereby expressly denied, and the lessee covenants that it will not permit or suffer any bill of any mechanic, labor or material man, or for any furnishings or equipments of said premises, to be or remain unpaid. The lessee shall, before commencing the erection and construction of a building on said premises, furnish [591] or cause to be furnished a bond in a bonding company satisfactory to lessors, guaranteeing the due observance of this clause 6."

If a mechanic's lien can be fastened upon the reversionary interest of the lessors it must be that the lease made the lessee the agent of the lessors with authority to so contract with reference to the erection of the contemplated building as to bind the interest of the lessors. The agency, if any, that existed between the lessors and lessees was created by the lease. Plainly that agency did not arise from that part of Sec. 4025 Rev. St. '08, which says that "every contractor, architect, engineer, subcontractor, builder, agent or other person having charge of the construction, alteration, addition to or repair, either in whole or in part, of any building or other improvement as aforesaid, shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this act." The lessee was not one of those enumerated in the statute who was to be deemed the agent of the owner for the purposes of the act unless the lease created such agency. If the lessee was at all the agent it was by virtue of the lease and not of the statute. It is elementary that the authority of an agent is limited and controlled by the instrument creating the agency and that any person dealing with an agent, and having knowledge of the limitations upon the latter's authority, must at his peril contract with the agent within the known limits of that authority. When a lease provides that the lessee shall erect a building on the real estate and is silent as to the authority or want of authority of the lessee to bind the lessor's interest with a mechanic's lien, it is only by implication, if at all, that it can be said that such authority exists. No such implication can be made in this case, for clause six of the lease, expressly and plainly, in words that need no other construction than their obvious meaning denotes, withholds from and denies to the lessee the authority to bind the interest of [592] the lessors with a mechanic's lien. There is no escape from this. The part of the clause which provides that the lessee would "not permit or suffer any bill of any mechanic, labor or material man, or for any furnishings or equipments of said premises, to be or remain unpaid," is only a personal covenant; that is, one that extends only to the lessors and lessees. Under the lease, a lien would attach to the leasehold interest of the lessee in the premises, and the lessors were interested in seeing that the bills for labor and material were paid. The part of the clause before that withholds from the lessee any and all authority to encumber the lessor's interest with a lien. Nor does the sentence of the clause which provides that the lessee shall furnish a bond guaranteeing the due observance of the provisions of the clause in any manner change the meaning of that part of the clause which limits the authority of the lessee. The lessors were certainly interested in having the provisions of the lease carried out and they had the right to exact a bond guaranteeing such consummation. Any contractor, subcontractor, material man or laborer who would read this clause of the lease could obtain therefrom no other idea than that it was the intention of the contracting parties, the lessors and the lessee, that the interest of the lessors should not be subject to mechanics' liens in consequence of the erection of the building contemplated in the lease.

When the intention of the parties to a contract is found in a contract then it is known what the contract is. What the parties intended by clause six is obvious and plain. If the contract that the interest of the lessors should not be subject to a mechanic's lien is valid then these plaintiffs in error were not entitled to a lien against the interest of the lessors and the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed. In order that it may be said that the plaintiffs in error had a right to mechanics' liens on the interest of the lessors it must be held that that part of the lease forbidding such a lien is void and without [593] effect; and then it must be implied (for there are no express provisions in the lease to that effect) that the lessee was the agent of the lessors with authority to encumber the interest of the latter with a lien. In order to reach that holding and implication it must be held first, that the mechanics' lien laws of this state prohibit such a contract between the lessor and lessee, and second, that it was within the constitutional authority of the legislature to prohibit such a contract when the public health, safety, morals and welfare were in no way involved. The lien laws of this state do not prohibit or render ineffective such a contract between a lessor and lessee, hence it is not at all necessary to inquire into the constitutionality of a law that should attempt to do so. The power to contract with reference to one's property when such a contract does not affect the public health, safety, morals or welfare (which matters are under the recognized cognizance of the legislature) is a very important right, and if it can be done, courts will construe statutes as not abridging that right so as to preserve the constitutionality of the law. In Illinois, it has been held that the right to so contract is clearly a property right and if the legislature should pass a statute prohibiting or restraining an owner and contractor from agreeing that the building should be relieved of liens, that such a statute would be unconstitutional.—Kelly v. Johnson, 251 Ill. 135, 95 N. E. 1068, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 573; Cameron-Schroth-Cameron Co. v. Geseke, 251 Ill. 402, 96 N. E. 222.

While I do not express any opinion as to the constitutionality of such a statute, it seems to me that the Illinois cases, and all other authorities are to the effect that the right to contract with reference to one's property is a property right. To say that a person cannot lease his property upon such terms and conditions as he may choose, is to restrain him of full dominion over his property, and certainly any law which so restrains him beyond matters which effect the public health, safety, [594] morals or welfare, must do so expressly or by necessary implication, even if it may be constitutional. If such a law is constitutional at all it must come from the legislature and not from the courts. Our Mechanics' Lien Act provides that its provisions shall be liberally construed in order that its purposes may be achieved, but this refers to a liberal construction of what is in the act. It does not mean that the courts, in order that a person may have a mechanic's lien, have authority to drag into the act that which is not there, nor to disregard elementary principles of law, nor by unnecessary implication or doubtful construction lessen that dominion over his property to which an owner is entitled. Sec. 4033 provides that "no agreement to waive, abandon or refrain from enforcing any lien provided for by this act shall be binding except as between the parties to such contract." That section cannot be applied here, for an agreement to waive, abandon or refrain from enforcing a lien must be made by a party entitled to a lien; that is, by a contractor, subcontractor, material man or laborer. There is no such a contract in this case. Sec. 4029 provides that any building, etc., constructed upon any land, with the knowledge of the owner, shall be held to have been erected at the instance and request of such owner, so far as to subject his interest to a lien, unless the owner shall, within five days after he shall have obtained notice of the construction, give notice in a certain manner that his interest shall not be subject to a lien, provided that the provisions of the section shall not apply to any owner who shall have contracted for such erection. Plaintiffs in error contend that because the notice prescribed was not given, the liens attached to the lessors' interest. Assume, for the sake of the argument, that the section would apply in the absence of any notice. That section must contemplate an owner who has not already, in some effectual way, given notice that his interest will not be subject to a lien. Certainly the legislature did not have [595] in mind that a person who had already given notice should give additional notice in a certain manner. Nor does the section say expressly, or by necessary or any implication, that a lessor who has already contracted with a lessee, in a manner of which the world must take notice, that the interest of the lessor shall not be subject to a lien, must nevertheless give further notice, as prescribed by the statute, in order that his property shall be free from a lien. Nor can it be reasonably said that the legislature intended that one who already has ample notice from a lessor that the latter's interest shall not be subject to a lien, shall nevertheless be given further notice of that fact in the particular manner prescribed in the section before he can be deprived of a lien. Such additional notice would be needless to one already notified and to say that, because it was not given in the particular manner prescribed in the statute, one who already knows of the fact to be imparted shall nevertheless have a lien, would be somewhat arbitrary to say the least.

Mechanics' lien laws can be sustained only upon the theory that the lien is engrafted upon the interest of the owner because he has consented to the improvement in such a way as to permit a lien. In order that a lien may attach, the circumstances must be such as to show consent of the owner or to justify an inference of it. Wheaton v. Berg, 50 Minn. 525, 52 N. W. 926. In order to sustain a lien for the plaintiffs in error in this case, under that section it must be taken that the consent of the lessors is conclusively presumed to have been given in such a manner as would cause their interest in the property to be subject to a lien, because they failed to give the prescribed notice. In the case last cited, the Minnesota court had under consideration a section of the lien laws of that state almost identical with Sec. 4029 of our statutes, and that court struggled manfully to reach the conclusion that the section was constitutional, [596] and in order to do so it held that the presumption that the owner had consented that a lien might attach to his interest in the premises, by failure to give the required notice was prima facie evidence that he had consented rather than conclusive, and that section prescribed a rule of evidence. The court said:

"Those who may be engaged in contributing labor or material which go to the improvement of the land may often have reason to suppose that the work is being carried on at the instance or with the consent of the landowner. It is important to such persons that, if possible, it be made known then if the owner's consent be wanting, and that, therefore, they cannot subject the property to liability for the labor or material supplied by them for its improvement. Hence the statute, in effect, makes it the duty of the owner, who knows of the improvement being made, to give the prescribed notice if he would avoid the inference that is done with his consent. From the neglect of the duty created by statute the inference follows. But it would seem to be impossible to construe this provision as making the mere neglect to give the specified notice conclusive upon the landowner in all cases. The circumstances must be such that he can comply with the statutory requirement, or he cannot be thus concluded."

It can be added with the same degree of force that the circumstances must be such that the persons interested in having a lien attach have not already received notice that the owner's interest shall not be subjected to a lien. The court further said that an owner who has knowledge of the erection of the building upon his premises may nevertheless show that he could not give the required notices and thus excuse his failure for giving them. Equally it can be said under this statute that the owner, in order to relieve his property of a lien may show that he has already given notice to that effect and that all interested did know that he had not consented [597] that his interest should be subject to liens, and that, therefore, it would be a needless thing to give the notice specified in the statute. It cannot be conclusively presumed that the lessors in this case consented that their interest might be subjected to a lien when they expressly contracted with the lessee that it should not be and gave full notice to the world of such contract before anything was done toward the erection of the building. It is to be observed that Sec. 4029 provides for actual or constructive notice at the option of the owner. It does not expressly or impliedly exclude other actual notice, which may be given, nor does it in any manner assume that other constructive notice provided by general statute or law would not be sufficient.

The Minnesota court, after showing that construing the section as conclusive against the landowner, would make it unconstitutional or of doubtful constitutionality, said:

"But some reasonable effect should be given to the statute if it be possible; and this may be done by construing the statutory presumption, which springs from the failure to give notice, as being of a prima facie nature rather than conclusive, and as imposing upon the landowner who, knowing the fact of the improvement, has failed to give the prescribed notice, the burden of relieving himself from the statutory imputation of having consented to what was being done, by proof of his inability to give the prescribed notice of his dissent, and that in fact the improvement was made without his authority or consent. As the statute was obviously intended to establish a rule of evidence, and as it cannot be sustained if the statutory presumption is to be construed as conclusive, but may be if it has the qualified effect which we have suggested, we conclude that it must be so construed. The language of the law does not forbid this construction, and there are apparent reasons which may have led the legislature to impose the burden of [598] proof on the party who has peculiar knowledge concerning the matters to which evidence is to be directed."

From what has been said, it follows that the section furnishes a rule of evidence, by which, in the first instance, the failure of an owner with knowledge to give the notice therein specified raises the presumption that the owner consented that his property be subjected to a lien, and to overcome this presumption that the owner consented that his property be subject to a lien, he must go forward with evidence to show that he could not reasonably give the notice, or that he had already effectually given actual notice, or such constructive notice as would be given by recording a lease with a provision similar to that in clause six of the present lease.

the act. Therefore, ownership of the building, [571] structure or improvement, and the doing of the work thereon, or the rendering services or furnishing material therefor at the instance of such owner or his agent, plus ownership in the same person of the land upon which such structure or improvement is erected or placed, are essential, under §§ 4025 and 4027, to the validity of a lien upon such land. This meaning is further evidenced by subsequent provisions of the latter section. It constitutes the lien, where it is for work done or material furnished for an entire structure, erection or improvement, superior thereon to prior liens or incumbrances of the land upon which the same is erected or placed, and authorizes in the enforcement of such lien the sale of such improvement and the removal of the same from the land upon which it stands. It further provides that the lien given by the act shall extend to any "conveyable interest of such owner or reputed owner in the land upon which such building, structure or improvement shall be erected or placed," or that he may thereafter acquire subsequent to the making of the contract or the commencement of the work upon such structure and before the establishment of such lien by process of law. It, therefore, follows that under § 4025, coupled with § 4027, it is a condition precedent to the validity of the lien that the person, whose interest in the real estate it is proposed to bind or affect thereby, must have acted affirmatively relative to the structure or improvement placed upon the land, and must have some ownership therein.

In Cornell v. Barney, 94 N. Y. 394, 398, under a statute in substantial effect the same as our §§ 4025 and 4027, materials were furnished by plaintiffs to a lessee (Salem), for an improvement in process of construction by the latter in pursuance of provisions in his lease by which he covenanted to erect a permanent building on the demised premises of, at least, a specified value, within a designated time, and in which the lessor (Barney), covenanted to loan a specified sum as [572] the building advanced, to be secured by mortgage on the lessee's interest in the premises, and the building, upon the termination of the lease, to revert to and become the property of the lessor. The right to the lien was denied on the interest of the lessor for the reason that the material for which the lien was claimed was not furnished under any contract with him or at his instance, and that he did not cause the building to be constructed. Upon this point the court, at page 398, said:

"Section 1 of the Lien Act, applicable to the city of New York (Chap. 379 of the Laws of 1875), provides that 'every person performing labor upon, or furnishing materials to be used in the construction, etc., of any building, etc., shall have a lien on the same for the work or labor done, or materials furnished by each, respectively, whether done or furnished at the instance of the owner of the building improvement, or his agent.' To give a lien under this section, the work must have been done or materials furnished at the instance of the owner of the building or the improvement, or at the instance of his agent, and the lien is upon the building or other improvement. Such is the plain language, and there is no room for construction. Here the iron was not furnished at the instance of Barney. His contract with Salem did not even require any iron to be used in the erection of the building, and it does not appear that he had anything whatever to do with Salem's contract with the plaintiffs, or with the procurement of the iron from them, or that he knew anything about it. It is true that Salem covenanted with Barney to erect the building, and that Barney agreed to advance money to be applied toward the erection of the same, and that he was to have a mortgage on the same; yet the building was not erected for Barney, and was not, before the termination of the lease, to belong to him, and in no proper sense could the material furnished for the same be said to be furnished at his instance. In harmony with this view is section 2 [573] of the act which provides that 'any person, who at the request of the owner of any lot, etc., grades, fills in, or otherwise improves the same, or the sidewalk or street in front of or adjoining the same, shall have a lien upon such lot for his work done and materials furnished.' Here the word 'request' is used in substantially the same sense as the word 'instance' in the prior section, and was intended to have the same scope.

"Section 1 having provided for a lien upon the building, section 3 provides for a lien upon the lot upon which the building stands, as follows: 'The land upon which any building, etc., is constructed, etc., shall be subject to the liens if at the time the work was commenced or materials for the same had commenced to be furnished, the land belonged to the person who caused said building, etc., to be constructed, etc.; but, if such person owned less than a fee-simple estate in such land, then only his interest therein shall be subject to such lien.' The plaintiffs can have no lien under this section upon Barney's interest in the land, because he did not in any proper sense cause the building to be constructed. Within the meaning of this section the building must be constructed for and at the expense of the owner of the land or under contract with him. Salem caused this building to be constructed, and the plaintiffs could have a lien upon his interest in the land under his lease."

This is not the case, however, under § 4029, coupled with § 4027. Thereunder a lien may attach to the lands of a person or his interest therein by his non-action, coupled with his knowledge that the building or structure was erected upon or removed to his land, or, being thereon, was altered, added to or repaired. Indeed, it does so attach under such circumstances, unless he is excluded from the application of the mechanic's lien law by reason of the provisos in the section, or within five days after he shall have obtained knowledge of the work or the intention to do the same he gives notice as required [574] therein that his interest shall not be subject to any lien for such work. The controlling distinction in this respect between §§ 4025 and 4027, on the one hand, and §§ 4029 and 4027 on the other, is, as hereinbefore stated, that in order to fasten a lien upon a person's interest in real estate under the provisions of the former sections, such person must have some ownership in the improvement constructed, etc., and must have, as such owner, contracted to have the same erected, either directly or through an agent thereunto authorized; while under the provisions of the latter sections, such contractual relation cannot exist; and the ownership in the structure or improvement essential to the validity of the lien is invested in the owner of the land by operation of law. In other words; the inception of the right to a lien under § 4025, coupled with § 4027, grows out of contract; while under § 4029, coupled with § 4027, it arises from estoppel. Nor is this distinction affected by the declaration in § 4025, that in default of filing the contract for the work, or a memorandum thereof, as therein required, the labor done and materials furnished by the parties named; prior to the filing of the same, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instances of the owner, and the person furnishing the same shall have a lien for the value thereof. It is still the affirmative contractual relation of the owner of the property to the improvement made or work performed upon which the claimant's right to the lien is based, and the effect of the default of the owner as to filing the contract or a memorandum thereof only removes the statutory restriction that the lien can extend only to the contract price and enlarges the right in that regard under the principle of estoppel so as to cover the value of the work performed or material furnished. Indeed, in Grimm v. Yates, 58 Colo. 268, 145 Pac. 696, decided at this term, we expressly declared that the purpose of § 4029 "is to require an owner, where another in possession of his property [575] is making improvements, which by the terms of the agreement between the owner and the party in possession, the latter is without authority to make, to give notice to those performing labor or furnishing materials for such improvements, within five days after he shall have obtained knowledge that they are being constructed, that his interest in the property, upon which such improvements are being placed, shall not be subject to any lien therefor, and that his failure to do so renders his interest subject to a lien for such improvements."

Applying the law to the facts of this case it follows that the liens sought to be established and enforced herein cannot be sustained under § 4029 as affected by § 4027. The defendants in error were under no obligation by virtue of those sections to give or post the notice therein required. They were in no wise engaged in constructing the improvement but had entered into a contract with reference thereto; and were, therefore, by the very letter of a proviso of the section not of the class to whom the section applies but of a class expressly exempted from its terms. Moreover, the lessee was the party in sole possession of the premises and was making no improvement thereon which the terms of its lease and contract with the defendants in error did not authorize it to make. The contract here involved possesses no element of that described in § 4025, supra, as a contract between the "owner" and a "contractor." By its terms nothing was to be paid by defendants in error but the work was to be done by the lessee at its own expense; and the acts of plaintiffs in error relative to the improvement were caused by the lessee and not by the lessors. Moreover, defendants in error were not the reputed owners of the structure or improvement, but, on the contrary, the lessee, in the contracts with plaintiffs in error, was designated as such owner. It cannot be seriously claimed that under the agreement the lessee contracted with the lessors to furnish materials or perform any of the labor or services [576] named in the foregoing section of the statute, by the doing of which it would, by that section, be known as a "contractor." A contractor is "one who as an independent business undertakes to do specific jobs of work without submitting himself to control as to the petty details."

Plaintiffs in error, however, contend that the well recognized rule declared in Shapleigh v. Hull, 21 Colo. 419, 425, 41 Pac. 1108, is applicable to the facts of this case, and that their liens attach to the fee of defendants in error in the premises by virtue of the provisions of § 4025. We held in that case that where a contract of sale of real estate expressly requires the vendee to make improvements thereon, the interest of the vendor in the land is subject to the Mechanic's Lien Law for the improvements so made. Whether the rule should apply and subject the title of the lessor to a lien where the lease requires the lessee to make permanent improvements upon the leased premises of not less than a stated value, without other conditions or limitations, has never been determined in this state. In Antlers Park Regent Min. Co. v. Cunningham, 29 Colo. 284, 286, 68 Pac. 226, counsel contended for the application of the rule but it was found unnecessary to decide the point therein. Williams v. Eldora-Enterprise Gold Min. Co. 35 Colo. 127, 130, 83 Pac. 780. That there is a clear distinction between the principles involved in the two classes of contracts is obvious. In the former the estate dealt with is one entity, and the contract of sale, containing the building requirements, can and does relate to no other thing. The vendor having required the vendee to erect the structure on the only estate that existed, and of which he was still the owner, the improvement likewise is his within the meaning of the law, and such owner's interest in the premises, by the terms of the statute, is, therefore, subject to the lien. There being but one estate in the land and both the vendee and vendor having an interest therein, the ownership of the permanent improvement placed thereon is likewise in both and the vendee in making the [577] improvement is necessarily the agent of the vendor. Under a lease, however, the estate is divided into term and reversion, and so is the ownership of the thing. In fact, there are two entities: the leasehold estate and the reversionary estate, with either of which, it would seem, parties should be permitted to deal independently of the estate of the other, and when they do so their rights and obligations in the premises, except as affected by statute based upon the doctrine of estoppel, should be measured accordingly. However, could it be said that this distinction does not logically exist, it is, nevertheless, certain that the mere fact, that the terms of a lease obligate the lessee to place permanent improvements upon the premises at his own expense, does not, of itself, constitute him the agent of the lessor in the erection of such improvements. The rule is clearly stated in Atlas Portland Cement Co. v. Main Line Realty Co. 112 Va. 7, 70 S. E. 536, 537, as follows:

"It is insisted that the appellants' claims are liens upon the lessor corporation's interest in the lot, because the lessee corporation was in effect the agent of the lessor in causing the building to be erected on the lot. The evidence fails to sustain this contention, unless in a contract of lease, where the lessee is by its terms required to erect a building upon the leased premises, the latter becomes the agent of the lessor. It is well settled that such relation does not make the tenant the agent of the landlord, and that it does not give him the implied authority to create a lien upon the landlord's interest therein for improvements made thereon, unless the law-making power expressly or by necessary implication enacts otherwise."

In Winslow Bros. Co. v. McCully Stone Mason Co. 169 Mo. 236, 69 S. W. 304, while the freehold interest was held subject to the mechanic's [578] lien for improvements erected upon the premises by the lessee under a covenant in the lease obligating him to do the same, the holding was not based upon the covenant alone, for the court on page 244, says: that the mere fact "that the tenant has contracted with the owner to make certain improvements on the leased premises, does not make the land, or the landlord's interest in the land subject to a mechanic's lien. For in such cases the tenant acts for himself and not as agent of the owner."

And in Dierks, etc. Lumber Co. v. Morris, 170 Mo. App. 212, 156 S. W. 75, based upon a statute requiring, as the ultimate foundation of the lien, a contract made with the owner of the land sought to be charged with the lien or with that owner's agent, it was held that the statute, together with the mere covenant in a ninety-nine year lease to make permanent improvements upon the leased premises, would neither constitute the lessee the statutory nor the contractual agent of the lessor in making such improvements. The court therein, on page 216, upon the latter point, used the following language:

"Now, can it be said that merely by reason of the fact that a lessee covenants with a lessor to make certain repairs and improvements which will become the property of the lessor at the end of the term, this necessarily makes the lessee the agent of the lessor so as to bind the latter's freehold interest with the lien for the materials used in the improvement? If so, then no matter what is the character and extent of the improvements, nor how strong the language of the lease denying to the lessee the authority to bind the lessor's interest with a lien, the latter will nevertheless be bound, because the lien is a creature of the statute; and whenever the lessee, in contracting for improvements, acts as the 'agent' of the lessor, within the meaning of that word as used in the statute, the freehold is bound by the lien regardless of the inhibitory terms of the lease."

The opinion cites with approval, Albaugh v. Litho-Marble [579] Decorating Co. 14 App. Cas. (D. C.) 113, and quotes therefrom the following:

The covenant "involves no theory of agency, but quite the reverse. The parties to the lease dealt with each other, not as principal and agent, but practically as adverse parties. To hold that a lessor covenanting with the lessee for the security of his interest under the lease, the payment of rent probably, should construct a building upon the land in the place of one to be demolished, would thereby and by virtue of such covenant make the lessee his agent and bind himself personally, as well as his property, for the contract of the lessee in the performance of his covenants, seems to us to be wholly without warrant either in law or in reason; we greatly question whether even the most positive legislation could impose liability upon one person for the obligation of another in such a contingency. Certainly no such liability is sought to be imposed by our mechanic's lien law. The covenant in question is itself evidence of the intention of all the parties that the lessor should not be bound."

Under this view of the matter it becomes necessary to ascertain: (1), whether the statute here under consideration has expressly or by necessary implication constituted the lessee the agent of the lessor and invested him with the authority to create a lien upon the lessor's interest in the fee for improvements made upon the leased premises; or, (2) of the covenants in the lease, coupled with the other facts of the case, constitute the lessee the agent of the lessor in making the improvements for which the liens are claimed?

Mechanic's lien statutes of our several states give but little aid in construing our own. They differ greatly in their terms and are subject to frequent amendment, and different provisions of the same statute often seem inconsistent and a lien may be sustained under one provision when other provisions would seem to negative the right thereto. Moreover, courts have too frequently applied, [580] as controlling precedents, the broad reasoning and declarations of a decision made under one statute to the facts of a case arising under an entirely dissimilar statute. By reason of these things the decisions and reasoning of the courts cannot always be accepted at their prima facie value, and should be cautiously considered and applied. However, much of the contradiction and confusion would disappear if the distinction between a contractual agent and a statutory agent, together with the particular facts of the case and statute under which such decisions were severally rendered, are kept clearly in mind in the consideration of each. Statutes giving liens for improvements made upon land "with the consent" or "with the permission" or "with knowledge" of the owner of such land, or where the owner of the land "knowingly permits improvements to be made" thereon, and statutes of like character, differ fundamentally from those where the lien must be founded on contract with the owner of the land. Under the former statutes the lien fastens upon the land through knowingly submitting or permitting it to be improved, plus the actual improvement thereof. These statutes, it would seem, discard the requirement of an actual contract and adopt the theory of estoppel. In other words, where by the statute the lien must be founded upon contract with the owner of the land, or his agent thereunto authorized by such owner, the true rule is that the lien claimant of a valid lien must establish, by proper proof, the fact that he is the contractual agent, either directly or indirectly, of such owner relative to the making of the improvement, or furnishing the material, for which the lien is claimed, while under statutes which fasten the lien by virtue of the fact that the improvements were placed upon the land "with the consent," "permission" or "knowledge of the owner" thereof, the person doing the work or furnishing the material therefor is essentially the statutory agent of the owner of the land who submitted or permitted it to be [581] improved. Section 4029, supra, with the provisos thereof eliminated, is of the latter class, while sec. 4025, supra, is of the former class. The fact that the latter section declares that any person having charge of the construction of the improvement is thereby constituted the agent of the owner, in no sense nullifies the previous requirement, as affected by Sec. 4027, supra, that the construction of the improvement by the owner of the land or by his contractual agent is essential to the inception of a lien thereunder. This is true because by that section there can be no statutory agent until the owner, either directly or through some contractual agent thereunto authorized, has moved forward in the construction of the improvement. In other words, there can be no statutory agent thereunder until subsequent to the creation of a contractual agent, and how far the lawmaking power could go in transforming the latter into the former would present a difficult question, for "there is no constitutional way for divesting a man's title except by his own act or default." Spry Lumber Co. v. Sault Sav. Bank Loan, etc. Trust Co. 77 Mich. 199, 43 N. W. 778, 6 L.R.A. 204, 18 Am. St. Rep. 396. We, therefore, decline to accept as sound the construction placed upon a statute of apparent similar import to our § 4025, by the Supreme Court of Oregon, that a lessee, obligated by the terms of the lease to build on the land and the building to revert to the lessor, thereby becomes a "contractor" and the statutory agent of the lessor in the construction of such improvements. Oregon Lumber, etc. Co. v. Nolan, 75 Ore. 69, 143 Pac. 935, 146 Pac. 474. The provisos in § 4029 and this construction of § 4025 harmonize and render the two sections consistent with each other and without which they would seem contradictory. Thus it is provided in the former that the contractor's lien extends only to the contract price, which also limits the lien rights of subcontractors, laborers, material men, etc., unless the owner [582] fails or neglects to file the building contract or a memorandum thereof for record, in which event the rights of the latter extend to the value of the services rendered or materials furnished, to the same effect as if the materials were furnished or the work done at the personal instance of the owner; while under § 4029 the owner, with knowledge that his property is being improved without his having contracted in relation thereto, can act affirmatively and avoid liability therefor.

The distinction between the two classes of statutes and the principles involved are clearly recognized and applied in the New York decisions, in which state the different classes of statutes have been in force and their effect considered and determined. In Cornell v. Barney, supra, the two classes are considered and the effect of each clearly stated and announced, and our conclusions are in conformity therewith. That case was under a contract statute of that state, being § 1 of Chap. 379, Laws of 1875, while Burkitt v. Harper, 79 N. Y. 273, and Otis v. Dodd, 90 N. Y. 336, were under statutes of the other class, as was that of Jones v. Menke, 168 N. Y. 61, 60 N. E. 1053, relied upon by plaintiffs in error herein. Indeed, in Schmalz v. Mead, 125 N. Y. 188, 191, 26 N. E. 251, 252, which was under a permission or knowledge statute, and which involved permanent improvements made by the lessee under a covenant in the lease, it is said: "Under the statute which formerly regulated mechanic's liens in the city of New York, it is no doubt true that parties, situate as the respondents in this case are, could not have acquired any lien, as it was then necessary to show that the labor was performed or the materials furnished by the party claiming a lien under, or by virtue of, some agreement or contract between him and the owner of the land, and hence the numerous cases decided under the statute, as it then stood, have no application to this case."

[583] The Illinois cases are also under the "consent," "permission" or "knowledge" class of statutes, though the court in Carey-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Jones, 187 Ill. 203, 58 N. E. 347, and Crandall v. Sorg, 198 Ill. 48, 61, 62, 64 N. E. 769, stated, substantially, that it would regard the law the same if the statute was only of the contract class. The cases, however, did not call for the remark and it is, therefore, of no force and effect. We think, however, that what the court meant was that the facts brought the respective cases within either class of statutes, because the facts and circumstances disclose that the improvements in each case were the joint undertaking of both the lessor and lessee. Moreover, an examination of the cases cited by the Illinois court in support of the statement shows that Burkitt v. Harper, 79 N. Y. 273, Schmalz v. Mead, 125 N. E. 188, as we have hereinbefore seen, and Miller v. Mead, 127 N. Y. 544, 26 N. E. 251, were based upon either "consent," "permission" or "knowledge" statutes, and the last two named cases were likewise upon contracts of sale, as was O'Leary v. Roe, 45 Mo. App. 567, Hill v. Gill, 40 Minn. 441, 42 N. W. 294, Henderson v. Connelly, 123 Ill. 98, 14 N. E. 1, 5 Am. St. Rep. 490, and McCue v. Whitwell, 156 Mass. 205, 30 N. E. 1134. The other cases, Philip Gruner, etc. Lumber Co. v. Nelson, 71 Mo. App. 110, Hall v. Parker, 94 Pa. St. 109, and Barclay v. Wainwright, 86 Pa. St. 191, cited in support of the point or likewise irrelevant thereto, as will hereinafter appear. While there is a diversity of opinion under the contract statutes as to the proof essential to establish the contractual agency, and under the other class of statutes, on the question of what constitutes "consent," "permission" or "knowledge," it would seem that the courts have generally recognized and applied what we believe to be the true rule in such cases, that is, that where the facts and circumstances disclose that the improvement is the joint undertaking of both the lessor and lessee, the interest in the land of both may [584] be held under the mechanic's lien law for the improvements so made, but in the absence of such proof only the interest of the lessee is liable. Thus in Barclay v. Wainwright, supra, it is pointed out that the presence of an express covenant by the lessee to build at his own expense is not the criterion by which it must be determined whether the lessor's estate can be held for such improvements so made under contract with the lessee, but the determining factor in that regard is the special character of each contract. And in Dierks, etc. Lumber Co. v. Morris, supra, p. 212, it is said:

"So that in order to make such covenant (to build by the lessee) constitute an agency between the lessor and lessee we are necessarily bound to look at the facts to determine whether there was an agency or not. If on account of the shortness of the lease, the extent, cost and character of the improvements, or other facts in evidence, such as the participation by the lessor in the erection or construction thereof, it can be seen that the improvement is really for the benefit of the lessor and that he is having the work done through his lessee, then it can be said with justice that the lessee in such case is acting for the lessor. But, if the facts do not show this, it
